Study On Nicotine Raises Calls For Heightened Regulation. The New York Times (1/19, Harris) reports, "A Harvard study concluding that cigarette makers have for years deliberately increased nicotine levels in cigarettes to make them more addictive led to renewed calls Thursday for greater federal oversight of the industry. … 'Given the harm that tobacco causes, it shouldn't be a game of cat-and-mouse to figure out what the industry is doing to cigarettes,' said Dr. Josh Sharfstein, commissioner of health for the City of Baltimore." The Times continues, "Senator Edward M. Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who is now chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, promised to reintroduce within weeks a bill that would allow the Food and Drug Administration to regulate cigarettes. … Mr. Kennedy said the Harvard study, which was released this week, 'is dramatic new proof that Big Tobacco is addicted to addicting millions of young smokers.'" The Times adds, "Mr. Kennedy's bill passed the Senate in 2004 but failed in the House. With Democrats now in control of both houses, public health advocates said they had new hope that the legislation — debated for more than a decade — could pass. … Philip Morris, the nation's largest cigarette maker, released a statement Wednesday taking issue with the Harvard study but saying the company supported Mr. Kennedy's bill. … The company, which is owned by the Altria Group, said its own reports showed that nicotine yields for its top-selling Marlboro brand were the same in 2006 as they were in 1997. Changes between those years, it said, "reflect that there are random variations in cigarette nicotine yields." … Cigarette makers have for decades denounced scientific efforts to measure the byproducts and effects of cigarette smoking. And for decades, experts have been arguing over the best ways to measure smoke from smoking. … One common way has been to use machines to mimic smoking. For years, these tests were done at the Federal Trade Commission. … In recent years, however, government regulators have asked cigarette makers to do these machine tests themselves. And beginning in 1997, Massachusetts regulations required cigarette makers to file an annual report with health regulators on the results of these tests. … In August, in a racketeering suit brought by the Justice Department against the tobacco industry, a federal judge found that tobacco companies had for decades 'manipulated the use of nicotine so as to increase and perpetuate addiction.' … In ordering strict new limitations on tobacco marketing, the judge, Gladys Kessler of Federal District Court for the District of Columbia, also said that for decades, tobacco companies had "lied, misrepresented and deceived the American public.""

WPost Says FDA Should Regulate Tobacco Industry. The Washington Post (1/19, A18, 690K) editorializes that Massachusetts Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's (D) "plans to reintroduce the 2004 legislation before the end of the month," are a "good idea that has languished for too long." The FDA "would have the power to require reasonable changes in the composition of the product so that it would be less dangerous to smokers and those around them." These "common-sense policies such as high cigarette excise taxes and smoking bans reduce the prevalence of smoking nationwide," and the FDA "should be allowed to do the same to tobacco's harmful effects."

Jury Sentences Truck Driver In Immigrant Deaths To Life In Prison. The AP (1/19, Lozano) reports from Houston, "A truck driver was sentenced to life in prison Thursday, avoiding a death sentence for his role in the United States' deadliest human smuggling attempt in which 19 illegal immigrants died from dehydration and suffocation inside an overheated tractor-trailer." The AP continues, Tyrone Williams, 36, was convicted last month on 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting immigrants. … A jury deliberated for 5 1/2 days before sentencing Williams, himself an immigrant from Jamaica." The AP adds, "Williams was sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole for each of the 19 counts of transporting the illegal immigrants who died. U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal will sentence Williams on Aug. 23 for the remaining 38 counts of harboring and transporting immigrants and for the conspiracy count. The maximum sentence for the conspiracy count is life in prison. … Williams looked down as the verdict was read and gave no visible reaction. His attorney, former U.S. Rep. Craig Washington, wept and wiped his eyes with a tissue. … Prosecutor Daniel Rodriguez looked grim after the sentence was announced as his boss, U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle, spoke to reporters. … 'We did everything we could to impose a sentence of death. Nineteen life sentences is not something to be disappointed about,' DeGabrielle said. 'One human being had the chance to let those people out. That was Tyrone Williams.'"

The New York Times (1/19, Blumenthal) reports, "On one count of conspiracy, the jury left it up to Judge Lee H. Rosenthal to impose sentence. She set Aug. 23 for a sentencing hearing." The Times adds, "The lead prosecutor, Daniel C. Rodriguez, presented anguished testimony of survivors and argued that Mr. Williams was the only one who could have saved the victims. But Mr. Washington repeatedly questioned why Mr. Williams, the only major African-American defendant among the ring of human smugglers, should be singled out for execution when co-conspirators made deals to testify for the government. … Mr. Williams was convicted on Dec. 4 of all 58 counts of human smuggling. Mr. Washington said he would appeal. … A first trial ended in March 2005 with the jury's finding of guilty on 38 counts but deadlocking on 20 others, including some eligible for death. The incomplete verdict was thrown out by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit."

Government's Expert Grilled By Defense Attorney In Mississippi Voting Rights Trial. The AP (1/19, Dellenger) reports from Jackson, MS, "Attorneys for Noxubee County Democratic Party official Ike Brown continued a rigorous cross-examination of a government witness on Thursday in an attempt to find flaws in the witness' testimony." The AP continues, "Theodore Arrington, a University of North Carolina political science professor testifying for the U.S. Justice Department, examined the politics of Noxubee County and found that Brown and the county's Democratic Executive Committee are disenfranchising white voters. … He took the witness stand early Wednesday morning and finished at 4 p.m. Thursday after sometimes heated exchanges with Brown's defense attorney. … 'I think we destroyed the expert,' Brown said after testimony concluded." The AP adds, "The department accuses Brown of violating the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which was written to protect racial minorities when Mississippi and other Southern states strictly enforced segregation. … It is the first use of the act to allege discrimination against whites. Noxubee County is a rural area along the Alabama line with a majority black population. … While on the stand, Arrington said the government pays him $150 an hour during his investigations. Over the last five years, he has made hundreds of thousands of dollars, he said. … 'The weight of the government and their resources are against us,' said Brown, whose attorney is working for free. … Arrington testified Wednesday that Brown, the county Democratic Executive Committee's chairman, and others used racial slurs to alienate blacks who support white candidates. He also referred to six lawsuits prompted by complaints of voter irregularity in Noxubee County." The AP notes, "Brown's attorney, Wil Colom, closely questioned Arrington on Thursday about his earlier testimony and his investigative documents. Of the six election complaints cited by Arrington, five were overturned. The one upheld was the only election that took place under Brown's supervision as head of the executive committee."

The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (1/19, Gates) reports, "Ike Brown mobilizing black voters in Noxubee County isn't illegal. It's admirable, a government expert testified Thursday on cross-examination. … But University of North Carolina Political Science chairman Theodore Arrington reiterated earlier testimony that he believes evidence shows Brown and his associates have engaged in a pattern of racial activities that discriminate against white voters in the majority-black county." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "In the first lawsuit of its kind in the United States, the Department of Justice is accusing black political leaders in Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters. … Arrington testified Wednesday for the Justice Department in federal court in Jackson that Brown, chairman of the Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee, uses race to get his way and bully people who don't agree with the candidates he supports. … Also, Arrington said Brown and his associates had formed racial intent and discriminated against white voters in their actions. … But Thursday, Arrington said he couldn't identify any black person given preferential treatment over a white person at a Noxubee County polling place."

Bush Sees Possibility Of Pardon For Convicted Border Agents. The AP (1/19, Gamboa) reports, "President Bush on Thursday left open the possibility of a pardon for two Border Patrol agents serving federal prison sentences for shooting a Mexican drug dealer as he fled and covering up the crime." The AP continues, "Bush said 'there's a process for pardons' and the case has to work its way through the system. In an interview with KFOX-TV in El Paso, Bush said the White House will review the case, and he urged people to 'take a sober look at the case.' … 'People need to take a tough look at the facts, the evidence a jury looked at, as well as the judge. And I will do the same thing,' he said." The AP adds, "Several lawmakers have urged the president to pardon former Border Patrol agents Jose Alonso Compean and Ignacio Ramos for the shooting of Osvaldo Aldrete Davila, who retreated to Mexico after he was shot and later admitted he was transporting marijuana while in the country illegally. … The agents began serving their sentences Wednesday — 11 years and one day for Ramos and 12 years for Compean. Both were fired after their convictions on several charges, including assault with a deadly weapon, obstruction of justice, and a civil rights violation. … Rancor over the convictions and sentencing of the agents has been simmering for months, and the two have become a cause celebre among conservatives and on talk shows. Their supporters have said they were defending themselves and have called them heroes. The agents' prosecution occurred as the issue of illegal immigration was being debated in Congress and amid campaigns for last November's midterm elections."

Lawmakers Call For DOJ Probe Into Duke Lacrosse Prosecutions. The Washington Times (1/19, Seper) reports, "Did a North Carolina prosecutor, members of his staff, Durham police and a DNA testing laboratory conspire to violate the civil rights of three Duke University lacrosse players in bringing high-profile rape charges against them? … That is what Rep. Peter T. King, New York Republican and former chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, wants to know, calling on Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales this week to assign Justice Department attorneys and the FBI to find out. … 'I have been following with great interest and deepening concern the prosecution by Durham County District Attorney Michael B. Nifong,' Mr. King said in a terse letter to Mr. Gonzales. 'I have done so not only because members of Collin Finerty's family are my constituents but because I have been accorded the privilege of representing all the citizens in this country and their interest in guaranteeing not only the appearance of justice but its actual implementation.'" The Times adds, "Mr. King said a review he conducted of documents and summaries of Mr. Nifong's investigation, along with discussions with other members of Congress, led to his call for the Justice Department probe. … 'I am deeply disappointed by your apparent decision to defer a decision whether to investigate Mr. Nifong's prosecution of this case,' Mr. King said, referring to rejections last week of probe requests by Reps. Walter B. Jones, North Carolina Republican, and Carolyn McCarthy, New York Democrat. … 'I urge you to reconsider your decision.'" The Times notes, "Mr. King said the Justice Department probe should target Mr. Nifong and members of his staff, including investigator Lindell Wilson; the Durham Police Department, including Officers Mark Gottlieb and Benjamin Himan; and DNA Security Inc., including its director, Brian Meehan."

Cardin Asks For DOJ Probe Of Maryland Republican Campaign Tactics. The DC Examiner (1/19, Fowler) reports, "U.S. Sen. Ben Cardin is calling on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to investigate instances of voter intimidation and election fraud the senator says occurred in Maryland before the November election. … Cardin, D-Md., made the request Thursday during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing." The Examiner continues, "The accusations involve former Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich and then Lt. Gov. Michael Steele. Ehrlich was seeking re-election, while Steele was competing with Cardin for an open Senate seat. Both candidates lost. … Democrats blasted Ehrlich and Steele on Election Day after their campaigns sent out a last-minute voter guide titled 'Ehrlich-Steele Democrats' that targeted black voters. … Called an 'Official Voter Guide' for 'Ehrlich-Steele Democrats,' the Ehrlich and Steele campaigns mailed a 'Democratic Sample Ballot' to residents, encouraging them to vote for Ehrlich, Steele and a variety of Democrats, including state attorney general candidate Douglas Gansler and comptroller candidate Peter Franchot." The Examiner adds, "Cardin told The Examiner Thursday said he wants Gonzales to look at the situation in Maryland and around the country. … 'I would like to see election officials know and candidates know that there is a price to pay if they do not conduct their responsibilities as election officials properly, and as candidates there is a limit to what you can do,' Cardin said. … In predominantly black Prince George's County, the sample ballot cover featured pictures of three black Democrats — former U.S. Rep. Kweisi Mfume, former Prince George's County Executive Wayne Curry and Prince George's County Executive Jack Johnson."

DOJ Studying Washington City's Elections After Report Raises Questions. The Yakima (WA) Herald-Republic (1/19, Muir) reports from Sunnyside, WA, "The U.S. Justice Department is looking into the way this city elects its leaders after a recent Whitman College report said the city's system violates the Voting Rights Act and keeps Hispanics from being elected." The Herald-Republic continues, "Four people -- including a former city councilwoman and a community activist -- say they've been in contact with a Washington D.C. attorney from the department's civil rights division about the study." The Herald-Republic adds, "In December, Whitman College released a report by Ian Warner, an undergraduate, showing that Sunnyside's at-large council elections create barriers to more equitable representation, a violation of the federal Voting Rights Act. Under the 1964 Act, a violation can be proven if there is a discrepancy in representation and there is racially polarized voting -- if people of one race vote predominantly for candidates of the same race. … Warner says he proved this by comparing thousands of voting records against a Hispanic surname list that showed Hispanic candidates got more votes in precincts with high Hispanic populations. … Warner and the professor who oversaw the research both say the Justice Department attorney, Sean O'Donnell, contacted them after an article about the study was published in the Yakima Herald-Republic. … 'He's obviously taking it seriously and thinks there are some legal implications,' said Paul Apostolidis, chairman of Whitman's politics department and the professor for whom Warner wrote the report. The Herald-Republic notes, "Former Sunnyside Councilwoman Bengie Aguilar and local Hispanic activist Hector Franco say they too have talked about Warner's study with O'Donnell. The attorney was in Yakima County last month to talk with them about bilingual voting materials when the article was published. O'Donnell took an interest in the story, Aguilar and Franco said. … O'Donnell declined to comment for this story. A spokeswoman for the Justice Department said it's the agency's policy not to comment on such matters."

Abortion Rights Backers Lower Expectations. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that as "the Roe v. Wade decision reaches 34-year anniversary, abortion-rights activists press the Democratic Congress for enhanced access to emergency contraception for rape and incest victims, and parity in health-plan contraception coverage." Nancy Keenan, chief of NARAL Pro-Choice America, "cautions, 'One election can't change everything,' as clear opponents of abortion rights still outnumber advocates by 219 to 165 in the House and 48 to 35 in Senate; other lawmakers have mixed positions."

Robert E. Lee's Legacy Under Reevaluation. The Washington Post (1/19, B01, Schulte) reports, "Today, the United Daughters of the Confederacy plan to fly a Confederate flag on Washington Street in Alexandria, on the statue of a rebel soldier who faces South. The Virginia Sons of Confederate Veterans will gather for dinner in Richmond to honor the man they hail as 'one of the greatest Americans.' … It's the 200th birthday of Robert E. Lee, the Confederate general who is revered by some and reviled by others. Commemorations and protests are planned across Virginia and other Southern states, proving that more than 140 years after the end of the Civil War, Lee is still a pivotal, controversial and complicated figure in American history and continuing race and culture wars." The Post continues, "In Virginia, where Lee was born, fought in the Civil War and died -- no matter whether he's viewed as a hero who fought brilliantly and valiantly for state's rights or as a traitor bent on protecting his state's right to own slaves -- his legacy looms large. Lee highways crisscross the state, including in the Washington region, Lee bridges cross rivers, high schools are named for him and the phone book lists hundreds of Robert E. Lees. … But beyond the heat and noise created by Lee's 21st-century defenders and detractors, there is a new move to reevaluate Lee and his legacy." The Post adds, "The premise of the new look is perhaps as controversial as Lee's image: As the South has become more racially and ethnically diverse and has prospered economically, perhaps the South doesn't need Lee so much anymore. Or at least not in the same way. Perhaps it is time to let him pass from marble icon and touchstone of white Southern identity into the annals of history as a charismatic and important human figure.'"

ANTITRUST:

FBI Raids Florida Citrus Firm Offices In Antitrust Probe. The Treasure Coast (FL) Palm (1/19, Turner) reports from Fort Pierce, FL, "FBI agents served warrants and inspected computer records at citrus businesses on the Treasure Coast at the request of the antitrust division of the U.S. Department of Justice." The Palm continues, "DNE World Fruit Sales in Fort Pierce and Seald Sweet International in Vero Beach are alleged to have colluded to set prices, according to Richard Carnell, general counsel for fruit importer DNE. … Carnell dismissed the allegations. They 'ultimately will be seen to be meritless and have no substance to it,' he said." The Palm adds, "Federal officials weren't talking about the charges. … Justice spokeswoman Gina Talamona said Thursday evening that she could not confirm the nature of the warrants, and agents for the FBI in Miami and Atlanta deferred comment to the department." The Palm notes, "Carnell said he knew little of the claims, but that it appears the investigation is the result of a disgruntled competitor in the citrus industry. … 'Frankly, it's a pretty litigious society and people try to air their grievances by filing claims,' he said. 'The investigators came in this morning and are looking at records, primarily involving the import programs from South Africa and Australia.'"

Mittal Discussing Sale Of Weirton Steel To Esmark. The Baltimore Sun (1/19, Connolly) reports, "Sparrows Point owner Mittal Steel Co. NV said yesterday it is in negotiations with Esmark Inc. of Chicago to sell part or all of its plant in Weirton, W.Va., a sale that would likely keep the Baltimore County steel mill in the hands of the world's largest steel conglomerate." The Sun continues, "Netherlands-based Mittal has previously said it would sell either Weirton or Sparrows Point to satisfy Justice Department concerns that Mittal would have a monopoly on tin production in the United States after its $33 billion merger with Arcelor SA of Luxembourg. The combined company, to be named Arcelor Mittal, would be the world's largest steel producer with annual output of more than 110 million tons. … But the Justice Department has the final say, and it wants Mittal to sell another subsidiary, Dofasco Inc., by Jan. 28. … 'The matter is still open and pending,' Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona said yesterday. She declined to comment about Mittal's negotiations with Esmark, which took control late last year of nearby Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp." The Sun adds, "Dofasco, a profitable Canadian company that makes high-grade metal sheet for the North American auto industry, is tied up in a Dutch trust, and Mittal said last week that it will not sue to release it. … During its nearly six-month pursuit of Arcelor, Mittal had promised to sell Dofasco to German steelmaker ThyssenKrupp AG if it were successful. However, in an effort to thwart Mittal's advances, Arcelor transferred Dofasco to a Dutch foundation. … Despite agreeing to the merger in June, Arcelor has no control over the trust, which prevents a sale for five years unless the trustees approve."

Microsoft Seeks To Question Iowa Class-Action Plaintiffs. The Des Moines Register (1/19) reports, "The focus of the Microsoft trial in Polk County District Court shifted Thursday to the named plaintiffs and their relationship to Des Moines lawyer Roxanne Conlin, who is one of the attorneys representing the four individually named plaintiffs, as well as all other Iowans who purchased certain Microsoft products between 1994 and 2006." The Register continues, "With no jury present, lawyers for Microsoft renewed an earlier request that they be allowed to ask the individual plaintiffs about their connections with Conlin. The earlier request was turned down last year by Judge Scott Rosenberg, who indicated he might rule on the new request as early as Friday." The Register adds, "Conlin was visibly angered by the request and acknowledged that some of the four named plaintiffs were friends of hers before the case began. She said the request was unfair and a 'propaganda move' by Microsoft. … 'Microsoft is trying to show that the people with the most to gain are the lawyers, and that is not proper in this law suit or any law suit,' Conlin said." The Register notes, "Conlin and Minneapolis attorney Richard Hagstrom are co-lead counsels in the class-action, antitrust suit which is seeking as much as $330 million in damages from Microsoft for Iowa consumers. … In a similar case in Minnesota in 2004, in which Conlin and Hagstrom were the lead counsels, Microsoft settled the case, after a jury trial had begun, for about $175 million, which was less than half what the plaintiffs were seeking in that case."

Delta Pilots Seek To Testify At Airline Merger Hearing. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/19, Grantham) reports, "Delta Air Lines' pilots union is angling to put its objections to US Airways' hostile takeover bid in the national spotlight next week at a Senate hearing on airline mergers." The AJC continues, "Lee Moak, chairman of the Delta unit of the Air Line Pilots Association, said Thursday that the union has asked to testify on the at the Senate commerce committee hearing scheduled for Wednesday. … 'We're not leaving this to chance. ...We will not stop until this [deal] is dead.'" The AJC adds, "The union, which opposes US Airways' $10 billion-plus bid for Delta, last week announced that it temporarily moved its officers to Washington D.C. and budgeted $15 million for its lobbying, legal and public relations fight against the deal. … Delta's unsecured creditors committee, which will have a large say in whether Delta is acquired or emerges from bankruptcy this spring as an independent carrier, has remained mum since US Airways boosted its bid last week by 20 percent. The pilots union is a major creditor on the committee. … While creditors mostly weigh the financial aspects of a buyout, they must also consider the chances that a Delta-US Airways merger would be approved by the U.S. Justice Department, and political sentiment could play a role in that calculation."

GE's Deal With Abbott Labs Shows CEO's New Strategy. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, C3, Kranhold, Johnson) reports, "General Electric Co.'s $8.13 billion deal with Abbott Laboratories is the latest step in GE Chairman Jeffrey Immelt's strategy to redouble investment in the conglomerate's market-leading businesses, from aviation to health care." The Journal continues, "The companies confirmed that GE had agreed to acquire Abbott's laboratory-testing unit and a smaller blood-analysis division. The deal, which needs regulatory approval, is expected to close in the first half of the year. … The acquisition would mark GE's entry into what is known as "in vitro" diagnostics, or laboratory testing, while Abbott sheds a unit growing more slowly than other parts of its business. … 'In vitro' diagnostics generally test blood or urine for diseases from cancer to HIV. Germany's Siemens AG, a GE rival in medical equipment, entered the market last year by paying $5.3 billion for Bayer AG's diagnostic unit." The Journal notes, "The Abbott unit had sales of roughly $2.5 billion last year. GE would also acquire Abbott's smaller point-of-care diagnostic group, which makes testing tools used at the bedside in hospitals, among other diagnostic tools. … The proposed deal is comparable to one of Mr. Immelt's boldest moves since taking over in 2001 -- the $9 billion-plus acquisition of Britain's Amersham PLC, which took GE into bioscience and molecular diagnostics. Most of GE's $17 billion in annual health-care sales stems from diagnostic equipment such as sophisticated X-ray machines, ultrasounds and MRI."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Coalition Of Industry, Environmentalists To Push For Action On Climate Change. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, A10, McKinnon, 2.04M) reports, "A new coalition of environmental groups and major corporations such as Alcoa Inc., General Electric Co., DuPont Co. and Duke Energy Corp. will boost pressure on Congress and President Bush next week to address climate change more rapidly." The informal coalition "will suggest that Congress and the administration move quickly to address global warming through steps such as capping greenhouse-gas emissions and discouraging construction of conventional coal-burning power plants." Although the US "rejected the Kyoto accord that created greenhouse-gas caps and an emissions-credit trading system for developed countries in Europe and elsewhere, some U.S. executives believe such regulation is inevitable here. They want more certainty about the future, as they plan for capital investments."

The New York Times (1/19, Barringer, 1.16M) says, "The diversity of the coalition — some members had already come out for other forms of emissions control, like a carbon tax or voluntary controls, but others had been silent on climate-change issues until now — could send a strong signal that businesses want to get ahead of the increasing political momentum for federal emissions controls, in part to ensure that their long-term interests are protected." The Times adds, "Many energy producers and manufacturers have expressed concern that various state efforts, if not coordinated, could lead to a scattershot system of regulation. Others worry that harsher measures, like a stiff tax on fossil fuels, the biggest contributor to global-warming gases, could be imposed if they do not reach a consensus on a legislative approach." The group is to be formally announced "the day before President Bush is to deliver his State of the Union address and offer the administration's newest basket of proposals to promote energy security and combat global warming."

Pelosi Says Climate Change Next On Democrats' Agenda. The Financial Times (1/19, Daniel) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "Thursday vowed to make energy independence and climate change legislation the next focus of Democrats' congressional agenda." She "said she would create a new select committee to focus attention on energy independence and global warming. 'I want a package of legislation through the committees by July 4 towards fully declaring our energy independence.'" The Times adds, "In the clearest sign the White House is responding to international and domestic pressure to act on climate change, Tony Snow, White House spokesman, on Thursday said that in the president's State of the Union on Tuesday Mr Bush would seek to 'balance the needs of security and, at the same time, also the environment. And you can expect him to make that linkage in the speech.' Making a more explicit link between energy security and the environment would be a significant step for the administration."

Global Warming "Catastrophe" Said To Be Unfolding In Antarctica. NBC Nightly News (1/18, story 8, Williams, 9.87M) reported on a trip to Antarctica "to see in dramatic fashion the impact of climate change on planet earth. Correspondent Lawrence McGinty of our British partner ITN reports tonight from the stunning landscape of Antarctica, a place he says where a catastrophe is unfolding slowly but surely." NBC (McGinty) added, "If you want to see global warming in action this is the place to come. The Antarctica peninsula is now three degrees warmer than it was 50 years ago. Once this glacier was surrounded by a huge ice shelf floating on the sea. Because of warming that has collapsed." NBC added, "Scientists fear we could be approaching a point of no return. A tipping point that would irreversibly change our climate and our world."

Industrialized World Using Less Oil. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, Bahree, 2.04M) reports that "a largely overlooked factor in the recent plunge in oil prices may portend an end to the multiyear rise in crude: For the first time in years, the developed world is burning less of it. Fresh data from the International Energy Agency show oil consumption in the 30 member countries of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development fell 0.6% in 2006." It is "the first annual drop in more than 20 years among the OECD countries." The "fall in oil use by the industrialized world is a sign that the reactions to higher oil prices by businesses and consumers from the U.S. to Germany to Japan may be adding up to a cycle-turning downdraft in demand." Other signals "have been popping up for some time: Demand for gas-guzzling sport-utility vehicles has been falling, while investment in and sales of alternative fuels such as ethanol are booming. Even the Bush administration is vowing to reduce America's dependence on crude."

Climate Change Seen As Key 2008 Issue. The Washington Times (1/19, Bellantoni, 88K) reports, "Presidential candidates for 2008 mostly agree that global warming is a problem that merits government action, a signal that debate on the issue will be more practical than conceptual. Democrats actively seeking the nomination or thought to be considering White House bids say climate change is real and promise plans to curb carbon emissions, a view shared by several Republican hopefuls." The Times adds, "Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, are co-authors of a bill aimed at drastically reducing greenhouse gas emissions." Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "has said climate change is a pressing problem." And Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. "this week introduced a resolution calling on the United States to negotiate to join the Kyoto Protocol treaty."

Friedman Calls For "Green New Deal." In his New York Times (1/19, 1.16M) column, Thomas L. Friedman writes, "Al Hubbard, the president's economic adviser, says Mr. Bush will soon unveil an energy independence strategy that will produce 'headlines above the fold that will knock your socks off.' Since everything the president has done on energy up to now has left my socks firmly in place, I will be eager to hear what Mr. Bush says." Friedman adds, "Neither the White House nor the Democratic Party seems to grasp that the public and business community are miles ahead of them on this energy/environment issue. The presidential candidate who finally figures that out, though — and comes up with a compelling energy/environment agenda — is going to have a real leg up in 2008." The "right rallying call is for a 'Green New Deal.' ... If we are to turn the tide on climate change and end our oil addiction, we need more of everything: solar, wind, hydro, ethanol, biodiesel, clean coal and nuclear power -- and conservation." Friedman concludes, "[W]hen the president unveils his energy proposals, if they don't call for higher efficiency standards and higher prices for fossil fuels — take your socks off yourself. It's going to get hot around here."

House Approves Pursuit Of Lost Oil Royalties. The Washington Times (1/19, Debose) reports, "The House yesterday passed an energy policy aimed at getting back more than $10 billion in federal royalty payments and eliminating tax relief and other subsidies that oil companies have enjoyed for the past decade." The Times continues, "The Clean Energy Act, which passed on a 264-123 vote, would create a fund called the Strategic Energy Efficiency and Renewables Reserve using the recouped oil dollars. The reserve also would be used to fund more investment in renewable ethanol, wind, hydrogen and biofuels technologies, as well as energy conservation programs." The Times adds, "The energy bill represented the fulfillment of Democrats' promise to pass a package of six bills in the first 100 legislative hours of Congress. … House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said her party wasn't finished and announced that she would create a Select Committee on Energy Independence and Global Warming." The Times notes, "Democrats for years have targeted oil companies that bought and signed federal land leases in 1998 and 1999. Because of a congressional oversight, these companies did not have to pay the royalty fee for oil when its price went above $34.73 a barrel or natural gas when its price rose higher than $4.34 for every million thermal units. … The prices for both oil and natural gas have been well above the royalty thresholds for years, with the loss of more than $10 billion in fees. Democrats say their energy bill will recoup those dollars."

Indian Tribes Hiring More Big Law Firms. The California Recorder (1/19, Elinson) reports, "When the Pojoaque Pueblo in New Mexico decided to go ahead with a huge $245 million casino, resort and infrastructure development last year, they turned to the capital markets for financing instead of the bank loans or government grants traditionally used by tribes. … They also turned to mega law firm Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe for legal advice on the financing instead of a more traditional legal resource -- Indian law boutiques. … 'When I started, it was a practice area that only a few boutique firms were involved in,' said Townsend Hyatt, who advised on the Pojoaque financing and, a decade after entering the practice, now heads Orrick's tribal finance group. 'As tribes have expanded economically, politically, numerically -- and certainly, as their socio-economic status has risen -- they have the economic means to hire law firms that they would not have hired before.'" The Recorder adds, "To serve this need, larger firms are increasingly organizing formal Indian law practice groups. Holland & Knight, Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, Dorsey & Whitney and Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman are some of the other Am Law 100 firms with similar practice groups, most of which range from 10 to 30 lawyers. … Those lawyers are kept busy. Tribes have to deal with federal law, state and local laws, large business partners such as Las Vegas casino operators and major financial institutions. … Litigation that ends up in a federal court is complex enough, but transactional lawyers face an added challenge -- they often have to learn the particular laws governing each tribe. Any detail of a proposed transaction may be governed by a unique tribal regulation. … The trend doesn't just mean more business for the tribes' lawyers. Large companies and financiers are increasingly interested in doing business with the tribes …"

Sioux Tribe Asks U Of Illinois To Return Mascot's Tribal Regalia. The Chicago Tribune (1/19, Cohen, Keller), reports, "In a 1982 halftime ceremony at Memorial Stadium, a 93-year-old Oglala Sioux chief and medicine man presented the University of Illinois with tribal regalia for use by the university's mascot, Chief Illiniwek. … The university paid $3,500 for the moccasins, blanket, peace pipe pouch, breastplate and war bonnet with 90 eagle feathers, all owned by Sioux Chief Frank Fools Crow, according to the university's archives." The Tribune continues, "On Thursday, Oglala Sioux tribal members, including Fools Crow's grandson, asked for it all back. … The tribe's demands are the latest in a growing campaign by students, faculty, Native American groups and the National Collegiate Athletic Association—which has already penalized the U. of I.—to dump the mascot." The Tribune notes, "A resolution passed Thursday by the Oglala Sioux asks the university to stop using the mascot and return the attire, including the original feathers. … Eagle feathers were replaced on the mascot's headdress with painted turkey feathers by 1990, according to the school's sports media guide. Where the original eagle feathers now are is unclear, both with the university and with tribal headquarters on the Pine Ridge Reservation in South Dakota. … University officials, already mulling the future of Chief Illiniwek, first learned of the demand at a trustees meeting Thursday."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller, Los Angeles Officials Announces Crackdown On Gangs. Under the headline "FBI Joins L.A. Policing Effort In War On Gang Crime," the Los Angeles Times (1/19, McGreevy, Winton, 850K) reports, "FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III joined local law enforcement officials Thursday as they announced a campaign for the 'strategic dismantling' of two street gangs after the killing last month of 14-year-old Cheryl Green in the Harbor Gateway area." Mueller "stood with Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, Police Chief William J. Bratton, [Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee] Baca and others in front of a market in the tiny gang-plagued neighborhood as officials outlined their multi-agency attack on the 204th Street group and an affiliate, the Eastside Torrance gang. … Federal agents will provide electronic surveillance of gang activity and operate observation posts in the neighborhood; the U.S. attorney may use federal hate crime and civil rights laws to put violators in federal prison, where sentences are longer, officials said. 'We will be working shoulder to shoulder with police officers in these areas,' Mueller said." The Times notes, "Earlier in the day, Mueller told about 100 members of the Los Angeles Area Chamber of Commerce that increases in gang violence were being seen across the nation but that the problem was a special challenge in Southern California. 'Los Angeles, for better or worse, is ground zero for modern gang activities,' Mueller said. 'Here in Los Angeles the ratio of gang members to police officers is overwhelming,' he added. 'This is where we in the FBI can help.'"

The Los Angeles Daily News (1/19, Orlov, Anderson) reports Mueller "pledged to work with local and state law enforcement agencies to crack down on gangs and use federal resources, intelligence and laws to crush gang leadership. 'Taking apart a gang is much like demolishing a building,' Mueller said. 'Hacking away at individual walls and beams only does so much. But using federal drug and racketeering statutes is akin to dynamiting the foundation. Once the gang's leadership infrastructure implodes, all members are weakened. It becomes more difficult for the gang to operate, and eventually it crumbles.'" At the Chamber luncheon, Mueller told Bratton "that his 700 agents in Los Angeles would work more closely with the LAPD, the Sheriff's Department and other agencies. … Mueller also plans to use emerging technologies to investigate gangs, including databases that show the geographic locations of gang members, their bench warrants, shootings and those overstaying their visas." However, "Connie Rice, co-director of The Advancement Project, said smart law enforcement techniques are only part of the solution to reducing gang violence. … 'The best research shows that gangs do not exist in a vacuum. They have to have conditions to brood in. If you don't get rid of those conditions, the gang will simply perpetrate.'"

The AP (1/19, Marquez) reports, "'Our intention is ... to look at each gang individually to determine who we can best attack them,' said Bratton, who was joined by…Mueller and other law enforcement officials. Mueller, who earlier in the day called Los Angeles 'ground zero for modern gang activity,' said he would bring to bear the federal government's resources in gang investigations. … Mueller said there were more than 30,000 gangs and 800,000 members nationwide. 'Like a cancer,' he said earlier in the day, 'gangs are spreading across America.'" The New York Times (1/19, Archibold, 1.16M) notes, "The announcement was made in the heart of the gang's territory…by Mayor Antonio R. Villaraigosa; Chief William Bratton of the Los Angeles police; the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Robert S. Mueller III; and city and county prosecutors." The Times adds, "Gang crackdowns have in the past yielded mixed results at best. Typically, the violence subsides until the police pull back as pressure to patrol other areas increases. 'It's like a ship passing in water,' said Wes McBride, executive director of the California Gang Investigators Association." KNBC-TV Los Angeles (1/18) also reported on the crackdown, on its Web site and in a broadcast story.

Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (1/19, Wood, 59K), not mentioning Mueller's visit or yesterday's announcement, reports on the rise in racially-charged gang violence, noting, "Los Angeles police are ratcheting up enforcement with tactics such as 'Top Ten' lists – one of 'worst gangs' and one of 'worst leaders' – to target the most egregious suspected offenders of the city's 720 street gangs and their 40,000 members. They are increasing the use of injunctions to prevent public gathering of gangs and nuisance-abatement lawsuits that target their permanent hangouts. New collaborations with federal, state, and local agencies will pool money and resources. Among new ideas: better tracking of gang members who reenter neighborhoods after release from prison. But officials say they have come to realize that the gang epidemic here is largely immune to increased crime crackdowns."

Lawmakers Ask DOJ To Back Off Of Reporters' Subpoenas In BALCO Probe. The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Weinstein) reports, "The new chairman of the House Judiciary Committee and an influential Republican congressman asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales on Thursday to withdraw grand jury subpoenas to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters facing 18 months in federal prison for refusing to disclose their confidential sources of information about steroid use in professional sports." The Times continues, "In 2004, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams wrote articles quoting closed-door testimony of Barry Bonds of the San Francisco Giants, Jason Giambi of the New York Yankees and sprinter Tim Montgomery about the use of drugs supplied by the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, known as BALCO. … Five defendants, including Victor Conte, BALCO's founder, have pleaded guilty to illegal drug distribution. Another grand jury is investigating whether Bonds committed perjury by denying that he knowingly used steroids. … 'There can be no doubt that the work of' Fainaru-Wada and Williams 'has been significant,' Rep. John Conyers, D-Michigan, and Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., ranking minority member on the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, wrote to Gonzales. … 'This coverage spurred Congress to action ... and forced Major League Baseball, among others, to announce an historic change in their steroid rules and policies,' the congressmen added. 'The subpoenas issued to those reporters and their newspaper seeking confidential source information are troubling both on the specific facts of their case and because of the great damage they could cause to our nation's press and the First Amendment.' … Although a protective order is 'an important interest,' they said, 'this case is significantly different from others involving a breach of national security, terrorism of serious criminal conduct.'"

The San Francisco Chronicle (1/19, Coile) reports, "The Justice Department was still reviewing the letter late Thursday, but a spokeswoman insisted the agency 'issues subpoenas to members of the media only when absolutely necessary.' … The unusual bipartisan letter showed that Congress is closely watching the case of the two Bay Area journalists, who could be ordered to jail for refusing to comply with a federal judge's order to divulge their sources. Lawmakers and legal experts say it's a crucial test of far the government will be allowed to go to extract information from journalists. … 'It sends a message that really goes beyond these two courageous reporters,' Conyers said in an interview Thursday. 'It sends a message to all reporters that this could happen to you.'" The Chronicle notes, "The Chronicle case has become Exhibit A for lawmakers pushing a federal shield law that would protect journalists from efforts by the government to force them to name their sources or turn over notes. The measure stalled in the Republican-controlled Congress last year, partly because of Justice Department opposition. Democrats are vowing to revive efforts to pass the law, but it still faces major hurdles. … Some lawmakers believe that if the two reporters are sent to jail, it could actually increase the chances that Congress would approve a media shield bill this year."

USA Today/AP (1/19) reports, "Conyers sent a letter to Gonzales asking the attorney general to withdraw the subpoenas. Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., also signed the letter. … 'Like most Americans, we have watched with great concern as the Department of Justice issued grand jury subpoenas to the reporters and their newspaper to learn the identities of their confidential sources on some of the most significant reporting in the history of professional sports,' Conyers and Davis wrote. 'We write to you now to express my deep concern over the issuance of these subpoenas and to urge you to withdraw them.' … Davis, as chair of the House Government Reform Committee, held a steroids hearing in March 2005, when the witnesses included former baseball players Mark McGwire, Rafael Palmeiro and Jose Canseco. Davis was one of a handful of representatives and senators who sponsored bills proposing to mandate stronger steroid testing and penalties for U.S. pro sports."

FBI Launches Email Alert System. US News & World Report (1/18, Ragavan) reported on its Web site, "The FBI has sent out 600,000 E-mail alerts to a base of 14,000 subscribers, the bureau tells U.S. News. The E-mail alert program was launched in October to provide the public, businesses, and law enforcement agencies with timely information on everything from terrorists to fugitives, scammers, and crooks, as well as updated information on terrorist threats. John Miller, FBI chief spokesman, said the system can also be used for crisis communication during a disaster or terrorist attack. To sign up, one clicks on red envelope icons on the FBI's main website or its 56 field office websites and provides an E-mail address. No personal information is required." US News added, "Miller said the FBI expects the alert system will also help them catch criminals. 'It's a fast, effective way of keeping our partners and the public informed,' he said."

Weapons Stolen From FBI Vehicle. The Washington Post (1/19, B3, Lengel, 690K) reports, "Seven weapons, including two submachine guns, were stolen last weekend from an FBI agent's vehicle in Southwest Washington, the agency said yesterday. … The theft triggered an intensive search for the property and whoever took it. The FBI decided yesterday to seek the public's help by offering a $25,000 reward." The Post notes, "A second bureau-issued car belonging to an agent at the FBI's headquarters also was vandalized, but nothing of importance was taken, authorities said. Both FBI agents live in the area and were issued vehicles to take home because of their assignments." FBI Washington Field Office chief Joseph Persichini Jr. said that the agent "stored equipment in his vehicle… because he has to be in a 'ready position 24-7' as part of a special response team."

The Washington Times (1/19, Taylor, 88K) reports, "The car was one of about 20 that were vandalized in a public parking lot…sometime between midnight and 3 a.m. Saturday, the FBI said." FBI spokeswoman Debbie Weierman said yesterday, "We have some very good leads and we're working on those leads trying to solve this crime as soon as possible."

Mitchell Pushes For Cooperation From Baseball Players, Owners In Steroids Investigation. There are more than 350 media references to former Sen. George Mitchell seeking better cooperation in the investigation of steroid use in baseball. For example, the Los Angeles Times (1/19, Shaikin) reports Mitchell "urged owners and players to cooperate with his probe or face the possibility of a new round of congressional subpoenas. … Mitchell's investigators spoke with club officials and former players last year and plan to talk to active players this year. Mitchell cannot force anyone to speak with his investigators. … Agent Barry Axelrod said he understands the union and management have agreed on guidelines for active players willing to cooperate, but such guidelines have not been distributed. Axelrod said he represents two former players who were asked to speak with Mitchell's investigators last year; one accepted and one declined." The Los Angeles Times (1/19) also has posted Mitchell's remarks on its Web site.

The AP (1/19, Bagnato) reports Mitchell "said he intends to interview active players and raised the possibility that Congress or other government authorities could compel testimony. 'I believe it will be in your best interests, and the best interests of baseball, if I can report that I have received full cooperation from your organizations, and from others, in conducting this investigation,' Mitchell said in remarks that were released to reporters." ABC News, USA Today, Forbes, the New York Times, Washington Post, Arizona Republic, San Francisco Chronicle, and Houston Chronicle, are among the news outlets that used the widely-reported AP story.

The Arizona Republic (1/19) reports Mitchell "told the owners that he and his staff already had reviewed 'tens of thousands of documents and conducted hundreds of interviews.' But he said the investigation was dragging because 'cooperation with our requests for information has been good from some, less good from others.'"

The Baltimore Sun (1/19, Barker) reports Mitchell "suggested that baseball, which unsuccessfully challenged the committee's subpoena power in 2005, would be wise to avoid tangling with Congress again. If a governmental entity gets involved, Mitchell warned, 'the burdens, the risks, the time involved and the resources required will be much greater than they are now.'"

Bloomberg (1/18) reported Mitchell "pointed to results of the last week's Hall of Fame voting as an indication that the steroid cloud over baseball won't fade away. Mark McGwire, whose 583 career home runs are tainted by steroid suspicions, received 23.5 percent of the vote, less than a third of what's needed for induction. A lack of cooperation would further extend the length of the investigation, Mitchell said."

Ohio Drug Trafficker Sentenced To Life In Prison. The Cincinnati Enquirer (1/19, Horn, 209K) reports, "Clarence 'The General' Remble left Los Angeles for Ohio several years ago to run a drug trafficking network. He'll spend the rest of his life in prison instead. A federal judge imposed the life sentence Thursday after prosecutors described him as the ringleader of a gang that operated in Middletown, Zanesville and other southern Ohio communities. … Rather than target Cincinnati or larger cities, prosecutors say, Remble and other gang members tried to build up their drug network in smaller towns." The Enquirer notes, "The FBI arrested Remble in July 2005 after tracking a shipment of 44 pounds of cocaine from California to southern Ohio, prosecutors say."

The Middletown (OH) Journal (1/19, Greber) adds, "Remble is one of 20 people who have been arrested and charged in a major drug bust that was coordinated by the FBI, Middletown Division of Police and several other law enforcement agencies. The joint federal, state and local investigation in Middletown began in January 2005, spearheaded by the local department. To date, 18 of the 20 individuals involved in the drug ring have been convicted."

Protest Follows Marijuana Dispensary Raids In Los Angeles County. The Los Angeles Times (1/18) reported about 100 people "demonstrated outside West Hollywood City Hall [Thursday], protesting a series of federal raids that shut 11 outlets for medical marijuana in the county. … The simultaneous raids, part of an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, were the largest such operation in the county in recent memory. Five dispensaries in West Hollywood were raided with the other six in Venice, Hollywood, Sherman Oaks and Woodland Hills. … Sarah Pullen, spokeswoman for the DEA's Los Angeles field division, said agents seized large quantities of marijuana-laced edibles that included 'anything from ice cream bars to lollipops to cookies to candies and candy bars.'"

The Los Angeles Daily News (1/18) reported the raids "came a day after Los Angeles Police Chief William Bratton denounced the storefront medicinal clinics as crime magnets that have begun to prey on teenagers - including passing out fliers at Grant High School in Van Nuys this past summer - and called for a moratorium on the facilities. '(These) enforcement operations send a message to these drug traffickers,'" said Pullen. The number of clinics "has exploded from five in 2005 to 143 by the end of last year. Bratton said many of the clinics are lucrative operations aimed at recreational users."

On its Web site, KCAL-TV, Los Angeles (1/18) reports Pullen "said that about 20 people were detained. She did not have immediate numbers regarding possible arrests or how much marijuana was seized. … The West Hollywood City Council voted Tuesday night to strengthen restrictions on marijuana outlets, but some council members have sympathized with those who contend they need pot as medicine."

KNBC-TV, Los Angeles (1/18) reports on its Web site that during the raids, about 50 protesters "shadowed DEA agents …as they carted away evidence." KNBC notes that Los Angeles County "has an estimated 200 marijuana outlets."

Advocacy Group's Headquarters Raided. The Washington Times (1/19, Seper) reports federal agents in California and Washington state "have raided several medical marijuana distribution centers, seizing thousands of pounds of the drug, marijuana-laced edibles, weapons and cash. There were no arrests. … In California, according to the DEA, there is no state regulation or standard of the cultivation or distribution of medical marijuana. The state leaves the establishment of any guidelines to local jurisdictions, which can vary widely." Drug enforcement agents "also raided the Everett, Wash., headquarters of an advocacy group for medical marijuana patients, confiscating what police documents said were more than 1,000 marijuana plants and computers whose owners said contain personal information on 200 people authorized to use the drug for medicinal purposes."

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (1/18) reported a detective "assigned to the federally funded West Sound Narcotics Enforcement Team, which launched Friday's raid, scoffed at the notion that CannaCare -- run out of the home of medical marijuana advocate Steve Sarich -- was anything other than a drug-dealing enterprise. Detective Roy Alloway said it was 'absurd' to think that the number of plants Sarich was tending would be covered by his medical authorization. 'It's clear that Sarich is a guy that's selling drugs,' said Alloway, who noted that state law allows no more than a 60-day supply of marijuana for medical use."

The Kitsap Sun (1/18) reported the seizure "has angered CannaCare's members, who believe federal authorities are attempting to undermine the state's medical marijuana law, passed as an initiative by Washington voters in 1998. … The case is being examined by the federal Drug Enforcement Administration. Charges against Sarich, who was not arrested in the raid, and other CannaCare members may be coming."

On its Web site, KING-TV, Seattle (1/18) reports investigators "raided members of a medical marijuana advocacy group called CannaCare, saying it was the home of a big-time drug dealer. But resident Steve Sarich said it's a home of compassion."

In New York, Three Face Charges For Roles In Heroin-Smuggling Ring. The New York Times (1/19) reports three people "have been extradited and charged with participating in an international heroin-smuggling operation, federal prosecutors said yesterday. The three…are charged with involvement in a smuggling operation that bought heroin in Thailand and moved it through various routes to cities in the United States, including New York." Authorities said the ring "recruited couriers who smuggled heroin by swallowing it or using false compartments in suitcases."

Colombian Brothers Highlight Divide Between Guerillas, People. In a front page article, the Wall Street Journal (1/19, A1, Moffett, 2.04M) reports that "millions of Colombian families find themselves divided by the country's interminable conflict, but few are at such odds as the Sáenz brothers. While Roberto collects signatures to put a disarmament referendum on the ballot," his brother Guillermo "faces criminal charges from the Colombian government of blowing up pipelines and bombing villages." Guillermo currently "faces a US indictment alleging that he helped 'set the FARC's cocaine [trafficking] policies' and arranged the murder of hundreds of people who got in his way." However, Roberto works with the Reconciliation Network, which offers classes for community leaders and "helps run a protest and public-information campaign to press conservative President Álvaro Uribe to swap FARC prisoners held by the government for hostages held by the guerrillas."

TAX:

New Hampshire Man Holes Up In Home After Tax Conviction. The AP (1/19, Elliott) reports from Concord, NH, "A man who has holed up with armed supporters in his cement-walled house for most of his tax evasion trial was found guilty Thursday, along with his wife, of failing to pay federal income taxes for a decade." The AP continues, "Ed Brown has said he will defend himself against capture if necessary. … U.S. Marshal Stephen Monier said Thursday that members of his staff continued talking by telephone with Brown and had no plans to confront him. … Ed Brown's wife, Elaine, a dentist who earned most of the couple's income, has been staying with a son in Massachusetts and attended the trial." The AP adds, "The Browns, of Plainfield, contend the law does not require them to pay federal income tax, while the government says the Browns owe more than $625,000. The Browns stopped paying income taxes in 1996 and stopped filing returns in 1998, a prosecutor said. They could each face decades in prison. … A jury decided they employed a scheme to hide their income and avoid taxes in part by using postal money orders in increments just below the reporting threshold to pay for their hilltop compound. Courts have routinely rejected similar attempts by other taxpayers. … Marshals now have to consider how to seize the Browns' assets. The jury was deliberating whether the Browns should lose their home."

Businesses Critical Of Bush "Withholding Tax" Provision. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that some businesses say "provision signed by Bush for 3% 'withholding tax' on payments to federal contractors represents interest-free loan to the government. Some in Congress move to accelerate 2011 effective date. 'In an environment where they are looking for revenue, it will be difficult' to stop, says Dorothy Coleman of National Association of Manufacturers."

Senate Democrats Want To Increase Tax Collections. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that Senate Democrats want to "jump-start administration proposals to shrink tax gap." To "finance small-business tax breaks in a minimum wage bill," Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus "embraces two Bush ideas that languished under Republican control. One would make it easier for the Internal Revenue Service to collect from employers who don't make payroll tax payments; another intensifies scrutiny of firms that 'lease' employees to others."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Address Iraq, Domestic Issues In State Of The Union. USA Today (1/19, Jackson, 2.27M) reports that when President Bush "delivers his State of the Union address Tuesday, he'll be facing a new audience on an old issue: a Democratic majority in Congress that is strongly opposed to his new plan for the Iraq war." White House spokesman Tony Snow said "explaining the proposal to boost U.S. troop strength by 21,500 in Iraq is a major goal of Bush's speech," even as "Democrats and some Republicans push forward a non-binding resolution against it." Snow said, "We understand it's going to be a skeptical audience." Snow also said the State of the Union "'has a large domestic component' that will be crafted to find common ground with the Democrats who control Congress. The agenda includes immigration, education and energy."

The Washington Times (1/19, Curl, 88K) reports Bush "will deliver a stripped-down State of the Union address, leaving out the usual laundry list of policy initiatives, and emphasizing common ground with Democrats in a nod to the new political reality on Capitol Hill, the White House said yesterday." White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "Some of the old State of the Union formulas have kind of run their course." Snow said Bush "will focus on a few broad themes, including the war on terrorism, energy, health care, immigration and education."

The AP (1/19, Riechmann) reports Bush's speech "will avoid the traditional laundry list of initiatives and focus on a few issues, such as energy and health care, where he might find common ground with the Democratic-controlled Congress." Bush is "considering ways to make health care affordable and seek the power to raise gas mileage standards for passenger cars, according to former administration and industry officials." With Bush's "low approval ratings, a narrowly tailored national address might keep the public from tuning out or reaching for the remote, White House officials reason." The President "plans to highlight the war in Iraq and the fight against terrorism as well as immigration and education, Snow said." On the school front, Bush is "expected to urge that Congress renew the No Child Left Behind law, the signature domestic policy of his first term."

"Real" State Of The Union Seen As Bleak. In his Washington Post column (1/19, A19), Eugene Robinson writes his version of the "real state of the union: A president who reduces the near-infinite variety of humankind to 'with us' or 'against us' has mired the nation in a disastrous, unnecessary war. Comparisons to Vietnam are imprecise -- the American casualties in Iraq are lower, the geopolitical stakes are much higher and the damage to our nation's standing in the world has been incalculable." Only "recently has the president begun to pay grudging lip service to global warming, while firmly resisting measures -- such as capping carbon emissions -- that might actually mitigate the pressure humans are putting on the climate system." And "more than a year after the president pledged to rebuild New Orleans, the city is still a ghost of its former self."

Democrats Finish 100 Hours Agenda With Time To Spare. The AP (1/19, Kuhnhenn) reports the House "wrapped up the Democrats' '100 Hours' legislative sprint Thursday with time to spare, voting to recoup billions of dollars in lost royalties from oil and gas companies and roll back industry tax breaks." The energy bill "capped a two-week drumbeat of votes on legislation that, while popular with voters last fall, awaits a sketchy fate in the Senate." Democrats "accomplished their early legislative goals in 87 hours, adopting new ethics rules and passing bills raising the minimum wage, expanding taxpayer financed research into embryonic stem cells, forcing more homeland security measures, directing the federal government to negotiate for cheaper Medicare prescription drugs and lowering interest rates on subsidized student loans."

ABC World News (1/18, story 5, 1:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "A short while ago, the Democratic part of the House declared its final measure of its first 100 hours in office." Rep. Nancy Pelosi, House Speaker: "The bill is passed." Gibson: "It was an energy bill that would encourage investment in alternative energy sources and lower oil industry subsidies. The House began its legislative sprint by voting to make more 911 Commission recommendations reality. And then, in this order, an increase in the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour. A bill that would expand stem cell research and overturn President Bush's restrictions. A measure requiring the government to negotiate lower prescription drug prices on behalf of Medicare patients. And they agreed to cut interest rates on student loans. The bills are headed to the Senate, where most of them face an uphill battle. The House completed their 100 hours of work, in just about 42 hours. They can put the other 58 in the bank."

The New York Times (1/19, Hulse, 1.16M) reports House Democrats claimed "their successes proved they could govern. Republicans derided the hurry-up nature of the effort as a bit of one-sided political showmanship that undercut the Democrats' pledge that the new Congress would be more bipartisan." But the "easy approval of the half-dozen measures in the 100-hour agenda — dealing with the minimum wage, embryonic stem cell research, health care, national security, education and energy — was celebrated by the new majority as a validation of the blitz, an idea born on the campaign trail that blossomed into a central House Democratic theme." Speaker Nancy Pelosi said, "It was a way to say that this Congress will no longer be a place where optimism and good ideas come to die."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/19, 59K) reports that in the 110th Congress's "first 100 legislative hours, which wrapped up Thursday, House Democrats drew a significant number of GOP votes on their 'Six for '06' agenda, despite giving minority Republicans little voice in shaping the legislation." The "bipartisan, problem-solving mantra is one that lawmakers of both stripes say they took straight from voters in the midterm election."

Poll Finds Bipartisan Support For Democrats' Agenda. The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Hook, 850K) reports a "bipartisan majority of Americans strongly supports the bills that whisked through the House in the first days of the Democratic-controlled Congress, but many remain uncertain about where the party wants to lead the nation, a new Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll has found." Only "25% of those surveyed believed that Democrats have formulated a clear direction for the country; 58% said they had failed to." Overall, the poll "found 36% approve of how Congress is doing its job - hardly a mandate, but up from 30% in September." The Times/Bloomberg poll "surveyed 1,344 adults by telephone Saturday through Tuesday. It has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points."

Pelosi Favorability Ratings On Rise. Bloomberg (1/19, Przybyla) reports, "Americans are warming to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, and they give the Democratic-led Congress high marks for its initial legislative priorities." A "new Bloomberg/Los Angeles Times poll shows positive views of Pelosi, 66, climbed over the past month and are considerably higher than the marks Americans gave one of her highly publicized predecessors, Republican Newt Gingrich, in the first weeks of his tenure as speaker in 1995." Thirty-four percent gave Pelosi "a favorable rating, up from 27 percent who did so in a poll conducted in December." By contrast, "a Los Angeles Times poll in January 1995 found that Gingrich, who engineered the Republican congressional landslide in 1994, had more unfavorable ratings, at 39 percent, than favorable, at 26 percent."

Senate Passes Ethics Bill 96-2. The AP (1/19, Abrams) reports Senate leaders "worked to resuscitate an ethics and lobbying measure Thursday, with the new Democratic majority trying to stave off defeat on its first major bill and Republicans wanting to avoid being blamed for obstructing an overhaul." The dispute arose "over an attempt by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., to get a vote on a modified version of a line-item veto. It would allow the president to single out spending items for elimination." The two sides "were working on an agreement under which Gregg would be guaranteed consideration of his bill at a later date."

USA Today (1/19, Schouten, 2.27M) reports Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "called it the 'most significant legislation in ethics and lobbying reform we've had in the history of this country.'" Earlier, Reid and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell "worked behind the scenes to broker a compromise that would allow lawmakers to move forward on the bill. It is the first measure being pushed by the Democrats who won control of the Senate in November's elections." The changes, "which have bipartisan support, bar senators from taking meals, gifts and sports tickets from lobbyists. They also restrict lobbyist-funded travel and impose new limits on senators' travel on private planes."

The New York Times (1/19, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports the Senate "on Thursday overwhelmingly passed sweeping changes to ethics and lobbying rules, overcoming bipartisan reluctance to ban many of the favors that lobbyists do for lawmakers and to illuminate the shadowy legislative practice of earmarking money for special projects." The Senate's action "makes the start of the 110th Congress a watershed moment in the history of K Street and Capitol Hill." The measure "passed around 9 p.m. by a vote of 96 to 2. Senators Orrin Hatch of Utah and Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, both Republicans, were the only members to vote against the bill." Of "all the bill's provisions, it was the disclosure requirements for bundled checks that met the stiffest resistance behind the scenes in the Democratic caucus because of the potential to make it harder for incumbent lawmakers to tap K Street lobbyists as surrogate fund-raisers, aides involved in negotiations over the bill said."

The Washington Post (1/19, A1, Weisman, Birnbaum, 690K) reports in a front page story that the Senate Democrats and Republicans "broke a difficult stalemate last night and approved 96 to 2 expansive legislation to curtail the influence of lobbyists, tighten congressional ethics rules and prevent the spouses of senators from lobbying senators and their staffs." The Senate legislation, "hailed by proponents as the most significant ethics reform since Watergate, would ban gifts, meals and travel funded by lobbyists, and would force lawmakers to attach their names to special-interest provisions and pet projects that they slip into bills."

The Washington Times (1/19, Miller, 88K) reports the Senate "overwhelmingly passed an ethics bill after breaking a day-long stalemate over a Republican proposal on earmarks that had threatened to kill the legislation." The impasse "had centered on an amendment by Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican, that would authorize the president to remove earmarks -- provisions in a bill to fund specific projects, often used by members of Congress to pay for pet projects in their home districts or states -- and send the legislation back to Congress for a second look and another vote. Republicans wanted to vote on their amendment as part of the ethics bill, but Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, had been single-handedly blocking a deal." The Senate "also voted 55-43 to adopt a Republican amendment that deleted a provision of the ethics bill that would have expanded the definition of lobbyist to include grass-roots organizers, possibly including ministers and neighborhood groups."

The Washington Post (1/19, A2, Milbank, 690K) recounts the debate over the Senate ethics bill, which was nearly sidetracked on Wednesday by Sen. Gregg's amendment. While senators "engaged in a bench-clearing brawl over ethics legislation, Reid and fellow Democrats abandoned the Senate floor and went to the television studio to condemn the Republicans. 'What they wanted -- and they were afraid to spew it out of their mouths -- they hate this legislation!' Reid sputtered." After a "day of bitter exchanges, the two sides finally reached a deal behind closed doors and then went to the Senate floor last night in a public act of reconciliation. Reid praised the Republicans he had just berated. McConnell hailed a 'successful example of good negotiating, though it took a while, for a favorable result.'" It "did seem to be a needlessly difficult journey for legislation that in the end was opposed by only two senators."

GSA Head Sought To Give Friend's Firm No-Bid Contract. The Washington Post (1/19, A1, Higham, O'Harrow, 690K) reports in a front page story that runs about 2200 words that the chief of the US General Services Administration "attempted to give a no-bid contract to a company founded and operated by a longtime friend, sidestepping federal laws and regulations, according to interviews and documents obtained by The Washington Post." Administrator Lurita Alexis Doan, "a former government contractor appointed by President Bush, personally signed the deal to pay a division of her friend's public relations firm $20,000 for a 24-page report promoting the GSA's use of minority- and woman-owned businesses, the documents show." The contract was "terminated last summer after GSA lawyers and other agency officials pointed out possible procurement violations, including the failure to adequately justify the no-bid deal or have it reviewed in advance by trained procurement officers, officials said."

Kerry Seeks Probe Into DOD Surplus Sales. The AP (1/18, Theimer) reports Sen. John Kerry is calling for an "investigation into security weaknesses in the Defense Department's surplus sales that have let buyers for Iran and China acquire aircraft parts and other valuable military gear. ... The surplus sales include parts for F-14 'Tomcat' fighter jets, a plane retired last year by the United States and now flown only by Iran," which bought the jets in the 1970s. Kerry said, "There is no way that Iran should be getting these sensitive military parts, especially with the situation in the Mideast so turbulent."

House Bill Would Rescind $14 Billion Energy Industry Tax Breaks. The New York Times (1/19, Andrews, 1.16M) reports House Democrats "easily passed legislation on Thursday that would rescind $14 billion in tax breaks and subsidies for oil drillers and reserve the money to develop alternative energy projects and conservation technologies." The measure "passed 264 to 163, with many Republicans joining a bloc of Democrats. Passage came despite opposition from the oil industry and the Bush administration, which said the bill singled out the companies for higher taxes and could increase the country's dependence on foreign oil." The bill will "rescind $7.6 billion in tax breaks for oil drillers that Congress passed in 2004 and 2005 and will add $6.3 billion in royalties from companies that pump oil and gas in publicly owned waters of the Gulf of Mexico and off Alaska."

The Washington Post (1/19, A4, Mufson, 690K) reports House Democrats "capped their '100 hours' agenda with the passage of an energy bill yesterday, the sixth piece of legislation approved in two weeks, and Democratic leaders said the package marked "a beginning, not an end" to their legislative ambitions." The measure would repeal a tax break oil and gas firms received in 2004 that effectively lowered their corporate tax rates. It would also bar oil companies from bidding on new federal leases unless they pay a fee on or renegotiated improperly drafted leases from 1998 and 1999 that did not require royalty payments on Gulf of Mexico production."

The Washington Times (1/19, DeBose, 88K) says the energy bills are "aimed at getting back more than $10 billion in federal royalty payments and eliminating tax relief and other subsidies that oil companies have enjoyed for the past decade." The "Clean Energy Act, which passed on a 264-123 vote, would create a fund called the Strategic Energy Efficiency and Renewables Reserve using the recouped oil dollars. The reserve also would be used to fund more investment in renewable ethanol, wind, hydrogen and biofuels technologies, as well as energy conservation programs."

Methodist Ministers Oppose Bush Library At SMU. The AP (1/19, Brown) reports a "group of Methodist ministers from across the nation launched an online petition drive Thursday urging Southern Methodist University to stop trying to land George W. Bush's presidential library." The petition, "on a new Web site, http://www.protectsmu.org, says that 'as United Methodists, we believe that the linking of his presidency with a university bearing the Methodist name is utterly inappropriate.'" Brad Cheves, SMU's "vice president for external affairs and development, said Thursday that the Methodist church is diverse in its membership and opinions and that those involved with the petition reflect only one view." The AP adds President Bush "said Thursday that he was 'leaning heavily toward SMU' and was close to a decision."

SMU's Selection For Bush Library Questioned. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (1/19, W13), Naomi Schaeffer Riley, the Journal's deputy Taste editor, says, "Certain members of the SMU faculty did not react well to the news of their campus's selection. In an op-ed article for the college newspaper, two professors from the university's theology school asked: 'Do we want SMU to benefit financially from a legacy of massive violence, destruction and death brought about by the Bush presidency in dismissal of broad international opinion?'" A letter "sent to SMU's president last week, signed by 68 current and past members of the faculty, echoed this theme." Which "raises the question: Why would Mr. Bush want to have anything to do with such hostile -- not to mention graceless and cliché-obsessed -- people?"

Brill Expected To Replace Joseph At State Department. The Washington Post's (1/19, A17) Al Kamen writes in his "in the Loop" column that Kenneth C. Brill, "a career diplomat who has been in the director of national intelligence's office as the director of the National Counterproliferation Center, is rejoining his pal, Deputy Secretary of State-designate John Negroponte." Brill is said to be "the likely pick to replace the outgoing undersecretary for arms control and international security, Robert Joseph." The move is seen as "a potentially huge change on nonproliferation stances, focusing more on diplomacy and less on confrontation." Kamen notes that Brill "frequently crossed swords with Bush administration harder-liners on policies toward North Korea and Iraq."

House Democrats Want Tougher Trade Restrictions. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that eleven Democrats "on House Ways and Means Committee press US Trade Representative Schwab to renegotiate pacts with Peru and Colombia; they seek specific steps against trade in illegal logging. Thirty-nine freshmen House Democrats push Ways and Means Chairman Rangel 'to deliver on the promise' in 2006 campaign with tougher trade stance against Bush."

Hospitals Worry Bush Budget Will Cut Medicare Payments. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column hospitals are bracing "for deep Medicare cuts in Bush's budget next month. Some lobbyists expect administration to seek up to $90 billion over five years from hospitals and other health providers as White House pursues balanced budget by 2012."

Official Says NTEU Should Be Certified To Represent Customs, Border Workers. Under the headline, "NTEU Closer To Representing Customs And Border Workers," the Washington Post's (1/19, D3, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The Washington regional director of the Federal Labor Relations Authority, in a decision issued late Wednesday, said the National Treasury Employees Union should be certified to represent about 30,000 workers in Customs and Border Protection, a major bureau in the Homeland Security Department. NTEU defeated the American Federation of Government Employees" for "the right to represent the employees. AFGE filed objections to the election, but a review conducted by Robert P. Hunter, the Washington FLRA regional director, found no merit to the claims." The Post notes, "Bush administration officials have closely followed the election battle because the union that is certified as the winner will gain a larger voice in workplace issues and perhaps even policy debates on Capitol Hill."

White House Usher Says Bush Is "Steadfast." In the Washington Post (1/19, A17, 690K), Chief White House Usher Gay Walters gives his reflections of the presidents and first ladies in the White House. On President Bush, he said, "The steadfastness of his beliefs in what he's doing. ... In his mind, this is the road to go down, and he has not wavered." He also said that First Lady Laura Bush "knows what she wants, but is…willing…to sit and look at something for a while before she makes a decision." He reflected on presidents dating back to Richard Nixon.

Ignatius Examines "Cheney's Enigmatic Influence." In the Washington Post (1/19, A19, 690K), David Ignatius writes a column titled "Cheney's Enigmatic Influence," in which he says that one of "Washington's enduring mysteries," is "how does Vice President Cheney shape decisions in the tight inner circle of the Bush administration?" After Bush's first term was known as the "OVP," there's a "sense that Cheney's influence is on the rise again, at least with Iraq policy, but that's after many months in which his allies say his role was diminished." The mystery of his influence "may finally be clarified in the coming trial of Libby," where he will give his testimony.

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke Warns Entitlement Costs Could Weaken US Economy. The AP (1/19, Aversa) reports Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke "warned on Thursday that the economy could be gravely hurt if Social Security and Medicare aren't revamped, and he urged lawmakers to tackle the nation's thorny fiscal issues sooner rather than later." In testimony before the Senate Budget Committee, Bernanke said, "If early and meaningful action is not taken, the U.S. economy could be seriously weakened." He said "future generations…will bear much of the cost." The AP adds it "marked the Fed chief's most forceful warning to date on the potential problems facing the United States with the looming retirement of 78 million baby boomers, the oldest of whom will start retiring next year. This huge wave of retirees will hit the U.S. budget as well as the economy, Bernanke said." He said "absent policy changes by Congress and the White House, rising budget deficits are likely in the years ahead to increase the amount of federal debt outstanding to unprecedented levels."

The Financial Times (1/19, Guha, Callan, Tassell) reports Bernanke "stepped up the pressure on Congress to address the budgetary impact of soaring spending on entitlement programmes on Thursday, warning that they could one day cause a 'fiscal crisis' in the US." Bernanke "told the Senate budget committee that the recent improvement in US public finances was only the 'calm before the storm.' He urged immediate action to head off the looming Medicare and Social Security funding gap, saying the right time to start was 'ten years ago.' But Mr Bernanke refused to comment on whether this should be done by curbing spending, raising taxes or some combination of the two, saying that was for elected officials to decide."

The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports Bernanke "delivered a stern warning to members of Congress this morning to address the national debt, which has spiraled due to spending on federal programs, especially Social Security and Medicare, and threatens to harm the national economy." Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad "described his comments as 'a clarion call.'"

The Wall Street Journal (1/19, Ip, 2.04M) reports Bernanke "warned that rising health-care and Social Security spending could create a 'vicious cycle' of rising debt and interest payments and an eventual fiscal crisis." Though Bernanke "lacks the stature of his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, his strong language, coupled with what appears to be a growing respect for his views from lawmakers in both parties, could add impetus to efforts to overhaul entitlement programs, principally Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid." Since taking office last year, Bernanke "has met extensively with members of both parties, and the outreach appears to be paying off. Budget Committee Chairman Sen. Kent Conrad of North Dakota yesterday thanked Mr. Bernanke for insights he provided over lunch a few weeks ago."

The New York Times (1/19, Weisman, 1.16M) reports Bernanke warned "against complacency over the federal deficit," saying "that recent positive trends on the budget were a 'calm before the storm,' masking a long-term danger posed by looming deficits in Social Security and Medicare." Bernanke's "comments were consistent with his past warnings, and those of his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, about the unfinanced cost of the postwar generation's retirement. But his tone was more urgent, and it seemed aimed at the arrival of a new Democratic-led Congress that is just now setting its priorities."

The Washington Post (1/19, D2, Henderson, 690K) reports Bernanke "cited Congressional Budget Office projections that spending on the big entitlement programs -- Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid -- will equal 15 percent of the nation's gross domestic product by 2030, double last year's level." Bernanke, "who was a top White House economic adviser until last year, declined to take a position on whether to extend President Bush's tax cuts, many of which are set to expire by 2010. He said he would be nonpartisan as Fed chairman, offering general economic analysis but no specific recommendations on taxes or spending."

Fed Vacancies Make Rate Predictions Harder. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that Cathy Minehan's "retirement from the Boston Fed and the expected retirement of Chicago's" Michael Moskow "mean nine of 12 banks will have changed presidents since 2003. Changes make it harder to predict rates and Fed rhetoric." Another "opening: Fed's top monetary policy staff job in Washington, as veteran Vincent Reinhart retires in September."

Inflation Falls In 2006 To Lowest Level In Three Years. The Washington Post (1/19, D1, Henderson, Schneider, 690K) reports inflation "fell in 2006 to its lowest rate in three years, as tumbling fuel prices and a slowing economy cooled the pace of consumer price increases." Meanwhile, other data "released yesterday showed unexpected signs of improvement in the housing market, adding to an overall picture of an economy that ended the year in relatively good health." Ebbing inflation "means that the Federal Reserve may avoid raising interest rates this year, holding them at levels likely to keep unemployment low and encourage economic growth. Several analysts said, however, that inflation trends in recent years have mirrored swings in oil prices -- which have fallen lately but could go up again. The analysts also said the unusually warm weather last month might have encouraged more hiring, shopping and home construction, temporarily brightening the economic picture in December."

The New York Times (1/19, Uchitelle, 1.16M) reports the economy "seems to be shaking off a slowdown brought on by the precipitous drop in housing, the latest economic data suggested yesterday." More new home construction "was started in December than in November, the Census Bureau reported, and the Consumer Price Index, the nation's best-known inflation gauge, rose at its fastest pace in eight months — on the surface, at least, an indication of robust demand. Fine print in the reports, however, signaled that the five-year-old recovery is far from being on solid ground."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/19, Scherer, 59K) reports, "Now, economists are wondering if the 2.6 percent rate may be about as low as it's going to get for a while." While this "does not mean that inflation will become a dominant issue for the economy, it probably means that the Federal Reserve is going to continue to fret about it. And that may mean that instead of cutting rates this spring, the Fed sits tight until at least midyear."

Stock Markets Down On Apple Inc. Concerns. NBC Nightly News (1/18, story 10, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Before we continue here, a quick look at stocks. They were down today. The Dow was off just over nine points [to close at 12,567.93]. Nasdaq lost more than 36 points [to close at 2,443.21] on the day's trading."

The Wall Street Journal (1/19, C1, McKay, 2.04M) reports a "6.2% decline in the consumer-electronics giant" Apple's "shares led technology shares lower, in a selloff that spread to other areas of the market. Apple Inc.'s earnings announcement late Wednesday included fiscal first-quarter profits that beat analysts' expectations but a lukewarm second-quarter outlook." The stock market's "losses came despite another big drop in crude-oil prices, which flirted with the first close under $50 a barrel in more than 1½ years." The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "fell 0.3%, or 4.25 points, to 1426.37, up 0.6% on the year."

Judge Declares Mistrial In California Vioxx Cases. The Wall Street Journal/AP (1/19, A2) reports from Los Angeles, "A hung jury forced a mistrial Thursday in lawsuits by two men who blamed their heart attacks on Vioxx, the once-popular painkiller made by pharmaceutical company Merck & Co." the AP continues, "The two cases were tried together before a Superior Court jury that deadlocked when they reached the third question on a lengthy verdict form." The AP adds, "The jury did answer 'yes' to the first two questions, finding that Vioxx did have potential risks or side-effects that were known or knowable and that they presented a substantial danger to users of Vioxx. The third question asked if the plaintiffs' physicians would have recognized the potential risks or side-effects. … The first two answers were rendered moot when Judge Victoria G. Chaney declared a mistrial." The AP notes, "The jury had sent a note to the court saying it was having trouble with the third question and lawyers were allowed to reargue that point. The jury then went back for more talks, but ultimately said there was an impasse. … It wasn't clear when there might be a retrial of the lawsuits brought by Lawrence Appell, of Scottsdale, Ariz., and Rudolph Arrigale, of Westminster, Calif. … Mr. Arrigale sought to recover more than $177,000 in medical costs as well as additional compensatory and punitive damages. Mr. Appell sought compensatory damages on behalf of himself and his wife, plus punitive damages and more than $105,000 to cover medical expenses."

Personal Attacks Mark Rancor On Michigan High Court. The New York Times (1/19, Liptak) reports, "In a recent series of written dissents, Justice Elizabeth A. Weaver of the Michigan Supreme Court has accused four of her colleagues of 'bully tactics,' 'abuses of power and grossly unprofessional conduct' and trying to censor her. … In response, in a confidential draft opinion, the court's chief justice has accused Justice Weaver of behaving like 'a child engaging in a tantrum.' In the opinion, Chief Justice Clifford W. Taylor suggested that she continue her protests with a hunger strike, as that 'seemed to have the potential for everyone to be a winner.'" The Times continues, "Students of judicial history in Michigan and elsewhere said they could not remember a similar judicial melee. … 'The justices of the Michigan Supreme Court are making spectacles of themselves,' said Richard D. Friedman, a law professor at the University of Michigan. 'They really should start acting like grown-ups.'" The Times adds, "The justices' exchanges, which continued this week, have been fueled by personal animus. But their disagreements involve serious issues, including First Amendment principles and judicial ethics. … The justices differ about whether they may disclose the details of the court's internal deliberations, about whether lawyers are free to criticize them personally and about how motions seeking their disqualification should be treated." The Times notes, "Judicial deliberations are almost universally protected from outside scrutiny. There is not much law, however, on the question of whether participants in the deliberations may themselves be forbidden to disclose exchanges in which they participated. … Justice Weaver wrote last month that the immediate purpose of the new rule was to suppress a dissent that she had written in a disciplinary case. She added that her primary obligations were to the public rather than her colleagues."

New York Bar Panel Urges Law Firms Not To Force Retirements. The New York Times (1/19, Creswell) reports, "A special committee of the New York State Bar Association is calling on law firms to end the practice of mandatory retirement for partners." The Times continues, "In a strongly worded report that is to be released today, the committee concluded that 'mandatory retirement — requiring a partner to leave the firm upon reaching an arbitrary age — is not an acceptable practice.'" The Times adds, "Retirement practices at law firms is becoming a hot topic as many of the nation's lawyers enter their 60s and face policies aimed at pushing them out the door. About 57 percent of law firms with more than 100 lawyers reported having a mandatory retirement age, ranging from 65 to 72, according to a 2005 survey conducted by Altman Weil, a law firm management consulting company. … But firms that push lawyers out at an arbitrary age without taking into consideration the individual's productivity and contribution to the firm could be missing out, said Mark H. Alcott, 67, a lawyer with Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison, who is president of the bar association and who formed the special committee. … Law firms that have adopted more-corporate structures have long argued that older partners needed to be moved out to give more opportunities and a bigger chunk of profits to younger lawyers. … But members of the special committee said that some firms adopted the policies simply to avoid uncomfortable discussions with a senior partner whose skills may be diminishing."

Groups Unveil Plan To Cover Uninsured. The New York Times (1/19, Pear, 1.16M) reports, "A broad coalition of business and consumer groups, doctors, hospitals and drug companies laid out a major proposal on Thursday to provide health coverage to more than half of the nation's 47 million uninsured by expanding federal benefit programs and offering new tax credits to individuals and families." The proposal arrived at a "possible turning point in the debate over national health insurance…" Senior vice president of UnitedHealth Group, Dr. Reed V. Tuckson, said, "It's a careful balance of public and private solutions."

Healthcare Seen As Emerging As A Top Political Issue. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, A1, Solomon, Wessel,

2.04M) reports, "Suddenly, the long-festering issue of providing health coverage to the one in six Americans who lack it seems to have leapt to the top of the national to-do list." Even President Bush is "is expected to talk about his ideas for shrinking the ranks of the uninsured." This "increases the chances that Washington will try to tackle at least a piece of a health-care problem," but "it still doesn't necessarily mean anything big will happen, at least nationally, in the next couple of years." The "primary reason" is that "there's nothing approaching a consensus on what to do." However, Andrew Stern, president of the Service Employees International Union, says that with the current Congress, "It's the perfect time…You have everyone lined up on the side of universal coverage."

Martinez Faces Potential Revolt From RNC Members. The Washington Times (1/19, Hallow, 88K) reports Republican National Committee members "think they will get a secret ballot on today's election of a new general chairman, which would protect members opposed to the White House's push to fill the new slot with an advocate of an amnesty for illegal aliens." RNC member Curly Haugland of North Dakota said, "If we get the secret ballot as promised, then every member will feel free to express his or her view without the fear of coercion or intimidation." The move "to create a new top office on the committee and fill it with Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida is scheduled to take place today, on the third day of the annual RNC winter meeting here. Mr. Martinez supports President Bush's plans for what conservative critics call amnesty for illegal aliens." The RNC leadership's "desires historically almost always carry the day, especially when a Republican is in the White House, but some members yesterday said they saw hope that things might turn out differently this time."

The New York Times (1/19, Broder, 1.16M) reports Martinez is "expected to win the job by a large margin, but a handful of dissidents plan to vote against him because of his support for liberalized immigration laws." One Martinez opponent, Randall Pullen, "Republican national committeeman from Arizona, said that illegal immigration was the biggest problem in Arizona 'and it's not getting any better.'"

Mehlman Urges RNC To Work With Democrats, Independents. The Washington Post/AP (1/19, Sidoti) reports Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman "challenged his GOP brethren to work with Democrats and independents to defeat terrorism and solve the country's problems, a call for bipartisanship at a time of intense political polarization." Speaking at the Republican National Committee's winter meeting, Mehlman said, "Let's work to put aside our differences on other issues and march together to defeat this common enemy, who threatens our common values -- values that aren't red or blue, but red, white and blue. This doesn't mean we abandon our philosophy. But on many issues, we can follow the example of Ronald Reagan, and think broadly about how to work better with Democrats and independents to accomplish our mission." The Post adds the remarks, "in Mehlman's final major speech as party chairman, were a nod to the new reality on Capitol Hill -- Democrats in charge of both the House and Senate while Republicans continue to control the White House, a potential recipe for legislative gridlock."

The New York Times (1/19, Broder, 1.16M) reports Mehlman "warned on Thursday that his party would suffer even more devastating losses in 2008 than it did in 2006 if it did not reach out to minorities and address voter concerns about ethics." Mehlman said "that the 2006 elections, in which Republicans lost control of both houses of Congress, was not a fluke that could be attributed to the calendar, a few scandal-tainted candidates and the tough going in Iraq." Mehlman said, "Each of these factors combined to create an environment that was unfavorable for Republicans. But, folks, these factors cannot be an excuse."

Purchasers Of Edwards' DC House Focus Of Corporate Probe. The Washington Post (1/19, A1, Solomon, Romano, 690K) reports in a front page story that when "former North Carolina senator and Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards finally succeeded last month in selling his imposing Georgetown mansion for $5.2 million after it had languished on the market, the names of the buyers were not publicly disclosed." At the time, Edwards's spokeswoman "told reporters that the house had been sold to an unidentified corporation. In reality, the buyers were Paul and Terry Klaassen, according to several sources and confirmed by Edwards's spokeswoman yesterday." The "wealthy founders of the nation's largest assisted-living housing chain for seniors, the Klaassens are currently cooperating with a government inquiry in connection with accounting practices and stock options exercised by them and other company insiders. They are also the focus of legal complaints by some of the same labor unions whose support Edwards has been assiduously courting for his presidential bid."

Edwards' Approach To Budget, Healthcare Praised. In his Washington Post column (1/19, A19), E.J. Dionne says, "Edwards's ideas on the budget have the additional virtue of reminding us that the argument over arriving at a balanced budget by 2012 is largely phony. The real issue, given the burgeoning costs of health care and the retirement of the baby boomers, is how to put policies in place now that achieve sustainable fiscal balance -- meaning low if not zero deficits -- over the next 30 years. What needs to be done? Hint No. 1: Extending President Bush's tax cuts to eternity will make the long-term problem much worse. Hint No. 2: The hardest part will be how -- simultaneously -- to meet the fiscal need to rein in health costs and the social need to get health insurance to everyone. Hint No. 3: Most Democrats don't like to talk about it, but somebody's taxes are going to have to go up." Edwards, "at least, is willing to say which taxes he would raise to keep the deficit from going through the roof. He would start by eliminating Bush's tax cuts for the top 2 percent of income earners, which he defines roughly as those earning more than $180,000 to $200,000 a year." Edwards "deserves points for honesty and for stating the politically difficult truth that both fiscal and social balance demand a comprehensive health-care fix."

Some Black Leaders Remain Unswayed By Potential Obama Bid. The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Wallsten, 850K) reports, "As pastor of the Mt. Zion Missionary Baptist Church in tiny Sumter, S.C., the Rev. James Blassingame feels pride at the thought of electing the country's first black president. But Blassingame, one of his state's most prominent black ministers, will not support Sen. Barack Obama's bid to achieve that historic goal." He will instead "campaign for one of Obama's white rivals," ex-North Carolina Sen. John Edwards (D). Blassingame said that Obama "is a 'stranger' with a faraway home and little-known biography, while Edwards -- 'he's a homeboy.' Other black leaders are wary that the relatively untested Obama might prove weak in the general election. 'Obama's ambition could bring all of black America down,' said state Sen. Robert Ford of South Carolina." Meanwhile, "actor Bill Cosby told the Chicago Defender, a black newspaper, that the country is ready for a black president, but he suggested that Obama might not be the best candidate in the 2008 race."

Gingrich Sees Fundraising As Major Barrier To '08 Run. Newt Gingrich said on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (1/18), "We're in an era where, because of the McCain-Feingold bill, it is so hard for a middle-class candidate to raise money that that's always going to be -- that's part of the reasons you see these guys out here so early. They have to raise so much money in such small units that most of them will spend 90% of the time raising money. That's part of why, frankly, I don't want to even look at a candidacy. I don't want to go around for the next eight months and go to six meetings a day begging for money." Asked if he can win the Republican nomination if he waits until September to decide on a bid, Gingrich said, "I don't know. I think Ronald Reagan got in October, in November. Bill Clinton got it in October. ... If the American people decided to promote somebody, which is very different than hiring consultants and promoting yourself, that could be a 10-day phenomenon. That could be a three-week phenomenon. Remember that Howard Dean was everybody's candidate of choice to win Iowa until 10 days before the caucus."

McCain Campaign Said To Lack Clear Lines Of Authority. The Wall Street Journal (1/19, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that a "Republican veteran warns 'no one's in charge' of McCain's campaign, as strategist John Weaver, 2000 manager Rick Davis, Senate chief of staff Mark Salter, and ex-Bush hand Terry Nelson all play major roles." But one McCain adviser said "Nelson has 'hiring and firing authority.'" The Journal adds "war woes jeopardize the Arizona senator's appeal to wary conservatives: as Republican best-positioned to beat Hillary Clinton. An unaffiliated Democratic strategist notes Obama's entry has dented Clinton's aura of inevitability, too."

US Launches "Intensive" Diplomatic Effort To Restart Mideast Talks. AFP (1/19, Lanteaume) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "said she hoped to meet Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas by February 15 in a bid to revive the peace process." However, ahead of a meeting Thursday with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Rice noted that "the next couple of weeks will be pretty intensive on the diplomatic front." On February 2 Rice will host talks with members of the Quartet "to agree steps on how to revive the peace process." The following week Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Abul Gheit will travel to the United States with Egyptian intelligence chief Omar Suleiman. Other officials from the region could also travel to Washington, Rice said. Meanwhile, "David Welch, the US State Department's top Middle East envoy, and Elliott Abrams, the White House national security adviser on the Middle East, will then travel to the region to prepare for informal trilateral talks."

USA Today (1/19, Slavin, 2.27M) notes Rice "said conditions were better for a deal now than they were six years ago when President Bush first took office," and that a peace agreement "would help the US position in the region because of the priority America's Arab allies place on creation of a Palestinian state."

The AP (1/19, Gearan) notes Rice said Israel and the Palestinians "can pick any agenda they want for a preliminary peacemaking summit with the United States, but it is too early to tackle the toughest issues." Speaking to reporters at the end of her week-long trip to the Mideast and Europe, Rice said, "We're not yet at the point where I think we can determine what we would do about formal negotiations, when and if" they can occur. The AP also notes that Rice's "second in command planned another round of diplomatic calls in the region next week."

Rice's Trip Seen As Accomplishing Little. In a news analysis, the New York Times (1/19, A8, Shanker, 1.16M) says Secretary Rice "flies home on Friday…with just enough progress to shield herself from criticism that the trip was a bust." The Palestinian president and the Israeli prime minister "promised to join her for three-way talks within a month" and "powerful Arab states gave their blessing, however reserved, to Mr. Bush's initiatives to try to snatch victory from the growing chaos that is Iraq." However, the Times observes, "Rice's Israeli and Palestinian negotiating partners have been weakened," and the White House "is also struggling" as Bush's new plan for Iraq "is meeting deep resistance from Democrats in Congress and even from the Iraqi prime minister."

In its own analysis of the Secretary's trip, the Washington Post (1/19, A14, Kessler, 690K) says the "results after six stops on the ground in the Middle East did not match her lofty rhetoric." Although Rice announced that she had arranged a three-way meeting to discuss the contours of a Palestinian state, she "sidestep[ed] questions about the political weakness of the Israeli and Palestinian leaders who would make a deal." She also found "generally tepid support" from Arab leaders in the region for Bush's Iraq plan, while "shrug[ing] off a request from the emir of Kuwait that the United States engage directly with Iran and Syria."

Under the headline "How Rice Uses History Lessons," the Wall Street Journal (1/19, A4, King, 2.04M) writes, Secretary Rice "often calls herself 'a student of history.' And increasingly, she is using history -- or her chosen slice of it -- both to explain and justify the Bush administration's Middle East policy." The Journal notes that "when Ms. Rice talks about the challenges the US faces across the Mideast, she points, somewhat surprisingly, to Europe after World War II and to the West's decades-long face-off against the Soviet Union, which happens to be her area of expertise." Citing the Cold War's "denouement as context for today's bloodshed and tumult may seem far-fetched to some. But Ms. Rice uses the analogy both to beg for patience -- the Cold War, after all, consumed decades -- and to try to elucidate a diplomatic strategy that is increasingly assailed for its lack of assertiveness."

Rice Comments Linked To Episode Of "The Simpsons." The Washington Post's (1/19, A17) Al Kamen writes in his "in the Loop" column that Secretary Rice "didn't seem to be trying to make much news on her swing this week through the Middle East. Still, she offered an interesting take on what she called 'a challenging time' in the region." Kamen notes that on Tuesday Rice "pontificated" that although she doesn't read Chinese, "I am told that the Chinese character for crisis is weiji, which means both danger and opportunity." Rice "did not say where she learned this aphorism," but Kamen notes that "oddly enough it was once featured on 'The Simpsons.'" Kamen observes, "Echoing Lisa Simpson on the Middle East or on the Chinese language may not be a great idea."

Former State Adviser Decries Rice's Claim That Diplomacy Isn't About "Making Deals." Aaron David Miller, former adviser to secretaries of state from George Schulz to Colin Powell, writes in the Los Angeles Times (1/19, 850K), "Having worked for six secretaries of State on Arab-Israeli negotiations, I nearly fell off my chair the other day when I read Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's comment to reporters that diplomacy wasn't about making deals. Maybe 'making deals' is too glib a phrase for her, but it's precisely what effective American diplomacy in the Middle East is mostly about." Miller welcomes Rice's decision to make the Israeli-Palestinian conflict a priority as "a good beginning," but warns that in order "to have any chance of succeeding, the administration will have to change its software, develop a sustained two-year effort and a strategy that -- for both sides -- is balanced, tough and reassuring. In the end, it will require Rice to accept the obvious fact that diplomacy -- and its hundreds of hours of problem solving -- is really about making deals after all."

Former State Official Says Cheney Rejected Iran Concessions. The AP (1/19) reports Vice President Dick Cheney rejected "an Iranian offer to help the United States stabilize Iraq and end its military support for Hezbollah and Hamas" in 2003, a former top State Department official told the British Broadcasting Corp. The State Department was "open to the offer, which came in an unsigned letter sent shortly after the American invasion of Iraq," Lawrence Wilkerson, former Secretary of State Colin Powell's chief of staff, told BBC's Newsnight in a program broadcast Wednesday night. But according to Wilkerson, Cheney "vetoed the deal." Wilkerson said State Department officials "thought it was a very propitious moment" to strike a deal, "but as soon as it got to the White House, and as soon as it got to the vice president's office, the old mantra of 'We don't talk to evil'...reasserted itself." State Department spokesman Tom Casey said Thursday he "wasn't aware of any letter from the Iranians to the US government in 2003."

Ahmadinejad Condemns US Military Buildup In Gulf. The AP (1/19, Dareini) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "lashed out at a US military buildup in the Gulf" Thursday, saying Iran is "ready for any possibility in the standoff over its nuclear program." He "made clear he was not backing down in his tough rhetoric toward the United States, despite criticism at home."

However, the New York Times (1/19, A8, Cloud, 1.16M) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates Thursday "played down the possibility of American military action against Iran but said it was not the right time for diplomatic engagement, either." Speaking to reporters while traveling in the Persian Gulf, Gates said, "Frankly, right at this moment there's really nothing the Iranians want from us, and so in any negotiation right now we would be the supplicant." His comments were seen as "a blunt acknowledgment that the Bush administration, despite its increasingly tough comments toward Iran in recent weeks, has limited options to compel its leaders to halt their nuclear program or to play a more supportive role in Iraq."

The AP (1/19, Burns) reports when asked about the prospects for military conflict with Iran, Gates said, "There are many courses of action available that do not involve an open conflict with Iran — there's no need for that." The Washington Times (1/19, Sands, 88K) also reports on Gates' comments.

Meanwhile, the Financial Times (1/19, Dinmore) reports, "Increasingly tough talk on Iran from the Bush administration…has rattled politicians and diplomats in Washington worried that the war in Iraq is set to widen." While "few lay claim to understanding what George W. Bush has in mind," there is "a widespread sense that the likelihood of some kind of military clash or conflict with Iran…has risen since the US president accused Tehran last week of 'providing material support for attacks on American troops' in Iraq." Departing Saudi Ambassador Price Turki al-Faisal told the Times, "The air is filled with the possibility of action against Iran's nuclear capability," warning that the consequences would be "catastrophic." Prince Turki said there was concern "in the region" that Bush's authority "had been eroded by the Republicans' loss of Congress in November's elections."

In Iran, the New York Times (1/19, A1, Fathi, Slackman, 1.16M) reports on its front page, that Ahmadinejad "appears to be under pressure from the highest authorities…to end his involvement in its nuclear program, a sign that his political capital is declining as his country comes under increasing international pressure." Two "hard-line newspapers, including one owned by the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, called on the president to stay out of all matters nuclear," in a "public rebuke" seen as "a sign that the supreme leader…might no longer support the president as the public face of defiance to the West." It is also the "first sign that Mr. Ahmadinejad has lost any degree of Ayatollah Khamenei's confidence, a potentially damaging development for a president who has rallied his nation and defined his administration by declaring nuclear power Iran's 'inalienable right.'"

US Lawmakers Ask Bush To Consult Congress Before Invading Iran. AFP (1/19) reports a House bill has been introduced calling on President Bush "to obtain approval from Congress before using military force against Iran." The bill, introduced by Republican Rep. Walter Jones and five other US lawmakers, "calls on the president obtain authorization for an attack on Iran, unless the United States or US interests are attacked first."

Germany Proposes Wider Iran Sanctions. The Financial Times (1/19, Schmid, Dombey) reports the European Union "could expand the range of sanctions against Iran beyond United Nations-mandated measures," according to a document obtained by newspaper. A proposal by Germany, holder of the EU's revolving presidency, "would ban individuals linked to Iran's nuclear and missile programmes from visiting the EU and reaffirm the EU's opposition to selling arms to Tehran." The EU proposals, put forward ahead of a foreign ministers meeting on Monday, "would also ban travel to the EU of the individuals on the UN list and take steps to restrict Iranians studying proliferation-sensitive subjects within the EU."

Diplomats Warn Iran May Start Enrichment. The AP (1/19, Jahn) reports Iran is "ready to start assembling thousands of centrifuges to produce enriched uranium…after finishing most preliminary work on an underground facility housing such machines," a diplomat and a U.N. official said Thursday. The two officials "said much, but not all, of the hardware needed for the installation of the centrifuges was now in place at the Natanz facility." The revelations, which are based on reports by inspectors of the International Atomic Energy Agency visiting Natanz this week, "appeared to strengthen claims from Tehran that it is moving toward large-scale enrichment involving 3,000 centrifuges."

Pyongyang Says "Agreement" Reached With US. The AP (1/19, Herman) reports Pyongyang said Friday that it had reached an agreement with the US during talks this week in Germany, "but the top American envoy said it had yet to be seen whether progress could be made at six-nation disarmament negotiations." North Korea's Foreign Ministry said the talks between Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill and North Koreans negotiator Kim Kye Gwan had been held "in a positive and sincere atmosphere and a certain agreement was reached there." No further details were given. But Hill, who arrived Friday in Seoul, "said he wasn't sure what agreement the statement was referring to." He called the talks in Berlin "very useful discussions" and "added he was pleased that it appeared the North was also positive about them."

On its front page, the Washington Times (1/19, A1, Kralev, 88K) says Pyongyang "expressed interest in a US-backed proposal that it suspend its nuclear program and allow U.N. inspectors to verify the suspension as an initial step toward dismantling its nuclear capabilities," diplomats said yesterday. During three days of talks in Berlin that ended yesterday, Kim reportedly asked Hill "what the United States would be willing to do if the North turned off its nuclear reactor." However, "A US response, if any, was not made public."

US Denies Meetings Signal Policy Shift. Meanwhile, AFP (1/19, Millikin) reported earlier Thursday that US officials denied that the "rare series of meetings" held this week in

Berlin "marked a break with the Bush administration's long-standing refusal to negotiate directly with the Stalinist regime." White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "This is not an instance of bilateral negotiations." The spokesman and "other officials insisted the Berlin contacts broke no new ground and were part of an ongoing set of six-party negotiations."

WSJournal Editor Urges Scrutiny Of UN's Operations In North Korea. Melanie Kirkpatrick, deputy editor of paper's editorial page, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/19, A15, 2.04M) that "Saddam Hussein managed to pull off the $100 billion Oil for Food scam right under the noses of the United Nations officials charged with administering it. Now another dictator with nuclear ambitions has succeeded in a similar trick, this time manipulating the United Nations Development Program in North Korea." The details of the UNDP's "lack of oversight" of its operations in North Korea are "revealed in previously undisclosed documents and an exchange of letters between US and U.N. officials." American officials "have been pushing for months for more transparency in UNDP operations in North Korea, while the UNDP has resisted." Kirkpatrick says "an independent, outside audit" of the program "is an essential first step," but "a full-scale investigation along the lines of the Volcker Commission's Oil for Food probe would be even better." She also notes that the "North Korean operations of other U.N. agencies -- Unicef, the World Food Program, the Population Fund -- also deserve scrutiny."

In an editorial responding to Kirkpatrick's claims, the Wall Street Journal (1/19, A14, 2.04M) writes, "The U.N.'s Oil for Food disgrace rolls on, with this week's indictment by a federal prosecutor in New York of the program's former administrator Benon Sevan. But now a new dollars-for-dictators scandal is breaking into the open, this one involving the U.N. Development Program (UNDP) and North Korea's Kim Jong Il." The Journal says the situation provides "one more chance to make the U.N. shape up, and to stop financing a global menace in the bargain."

China Faces Broad Criticism Over Anti-Satellite Weapons Test. The AP (1/18) reports the US "criticized China on Thursday for conducting an anti-satellite weapons test in which an old Chinese weather satellite was destroyed by a ballistic missile." National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said, "The United States believes China's development and testing of such weapons is inconsistent with the spirit of cooperation that both countries aspire to in the civil space area. We and other countries have expressed our concern to the Chinese." The New York Times (1/19, Broad, Sanger, 1.16M) says China "successfully carried out its first test of an antisatellite weapon last week, signaling its resolve to play a major role in military space activities and bringing expressions of concern from Washington and other capitals." Only the US and the USSR "previously destroyed spacecraft in antisatellite tests, most recently the United States in the mid-1980s."

The Washington Post (1/19, Kaufman, Linzer, 690K) reports on its front page that China's action "drew sharp protests from other nations with satellite programs -- a predictable response that experts said dramatically illustrates Chinese willingness to face broad international criticism when it comes to space, which Beijing considers a key part of the push to modernize its military and increase its ability to compete in high-tech warfare." The Los Angeles Times (1/19, Spiegel, Gerstenzang, 850K) says the "shoot-down has rattled U.S. defense officials, who are concerned both about the commercial crafts and government spy and military satellites that operate at that height."

Somalia Seeks US Aid For Military, Intelligence Services. The AP (1/19, Gedda) reports Somalia "is asking the US government for help in building efficient police, military and intelligence organizations." The requests were contained in a three-page memo submitted to the State Department by Dahir Mirreh Jibreel, a US representative of the Transition Federal Government in Somalia." On top of the list of Somali requests "was the appointment of a US ambassador to Somalia." There was no immediate comment Thursday from the State Department on the request, but the AP says "large-scale assistance seems unlikely until Somali authorities are able to create a stable environment in the country."

Somali Warlords Provide Protection As Violence Continues. The New York Times (1/19, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports, "Somalia may be at a turning point, with a potentially viable government for the first time since 1991. But senseless violence is still the norm." The Times notes that Somalia's "warlord issue is complicated." While "some people call them thugs," in "a world with no police and no security, the clan warlord was sometimes the only protection."

European Court Says Russia Failed To Investigate Chechen Torture Claims. The Washington Post (1/19, A14, Finn, 690K) reports the European Court of Human Rights "ruled Thursday that two Chechen brothers were tortured in their strife-torn Russian republic and that authorities there failed to investigate their allegations of abuse." It was "the first decision on torture in Chechnya issued by the court," but human rights groups "have long contended that torture is widespread in Chechnya." Thursday's ruling "follows a series of judgments against Russia concerning disappearances and the indiscriminate use of force by the Russian military and its proxies in the southern republic," the Post notes.

South American Leaders Debate Future Of Mercosur Under Pressure From Chavez. The New York Times (1/19, Rohter, 1.16M) reports South American leaders began gathering in Brazil Thursday "for discussions focused on a single, contentious issue: should the Mercosur trade group continue to emphasize economic integration, as Brazil and Argentina prefer, or transform itself into a political alliance with an 'anti-imperialist' tint, the path President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela favors?" The conference's Brazilian hosts "tried to minimize the prospect of tensions," with Foreign Minister Celso Amorim talking of a "reinforced Mercosur" that he said "belongs to everybody." However, Chávez "declined to play along with diplomatic niceties, bluntly staking out his position the instant he got off the plane on Thursday morning." Chávez said his goal is "to contribute with something we consider to be absolutely necessary: the reformatting of Mercosur" and "decontaminating the contamination of neoliberalism."

Colombian Brothers Highlight Divide Between Guerillas, People. In a front page article, the Wall Street Journal (1/19, A1, Moffett, 2.04M) reports that "millions of Colombian families find themselves divided by the country's interminable conflict, but few are at such odds as the Sáenz brothers. While Roberto collects signatures to put a disarmament referendum on the ballot," his brother Guillermo "faces criminal charges from the Colombian government of blowing up pipelines and bombing villages." Guillermo currently "faces a US indictment alleging that he helped 'set the FARC's cocaine [trafficking] policies' and arranged the murder of hundreds of people who got in his way." However, Roberto works with the Reconciliation Network, which offers classes for community leaders and "helps run a protest and public-information campaign to press conservative President Álvaro Uribe to swap FARC prisoners held by the government for hostages held by the guerrillas."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Wiretap Review Plan Is Still Unclear (LAT)

Bush and Gonzales say the domestic spying program is essentially unchanged except for its legal justification.

WASHINGTON — A day after announcing that it had scrubbed a controversial warrantless surveillance program, the Bush administration refused to provide details to Congress of how a new court-review process for terror-related wiretaps would work, triggering a fresh round of complaints and suspicions from Democrats about what the administration was doing.

At the same time, President Bush and other administration officials indicated that little had changed in the electronic eavesdropping program, originally launched after the Sept. 11 attacks, other than the fact that a court had finally blessed it.

Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales revealed Wednesday that the secret court created by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to supervise wiretaps approved orders authorizing the surveillance last week.

Bush said the approval vindicated his position that he was justified in launching the surveillance. "Nothing has changed in the program except the court has said we've analyzed it and it's a legitimate way to protect the country," Bush said in an interview with Tribune Broadcasting.

Pressed during a hearing Thursday before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Gonzales said the administration had changed the legal justification for the surveillance program but not the essential elements of the operation.

Disputing the suggestion that the warrantless program, run by the National Security Agency, had been "terminated," Gonzales said, "It took us a period of time to develop what we thought would be an acceptable legal argument that would be acceptable to the FISA court."

When asked to explain the legal argument, Gonzales refused. "I don't want to get into a public discussion about the deliberations and work of the court," he said.

The surveillance issue has become the first major battlefront between the new Congress and an administration that Democrats consider overly secretive and reluctant to share power.

With Gonzales and other officials mum about the program's details, Democrats refused to accept their assurances. It was not immediately clear how that stalemate might be resolved. The administration supplied classified briefings to several members of Congress, but lawmakers said they continued to have questions.

"I don't think there were any assurances today" that the White House is not still bypassing parts of FISA, Rep. Anna G. Eshoo (D-Atherton), a member of the House Intelligence Committee, said in a telephone interview. When administration officials briefing her committee Thursday, including Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, were asked about the matter, she said, "I think they were quite skittish."

The Senate Judiciary Committee chairman, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), and the ranking Republican, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), said the chief judge of the FISA court had promised them late Wednesday access to the court orders approving the surveillance. But Gonzales indicated at the hearing that the administration might attempt to block the move because of concerns that the documents contained classified information.

The administration's decision appeared to leave Congress with few options. Legal experts said the ruling appeared to render moot a series of private lawsuits challenging the program. The main option Congress has left is to change the FISA law under which the court has acted, although lawmakers acknowledge they have too little information at this point to know whether that would be necessary.

Gonzales said the idea of bringing the program under the FISA law had long been discussed in the White House, and that he made the issue a priority shortly after he became attorney general in early 2005.

Government officials familiar with the matter said the Bush administration's negotiations with the FISA court accelerated after Democrats won control of Congress in November.

The officials also said the negotiations centered on securing an agreement that would allow the administration to seek warrants on groups of people in certain circumstances, rather than being required to obtain separate court orders for every individual under suspicion.

One official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said this was the "innovative" new interpretation that Justice officials had described when briefing reporters on the new guidelines.

The changes appear to require individual warrants when the target is a U.S. citizen or has permanent legal resident status. But the changes could make it easier to obtain multiple warrants rapidly when the targets are in the country on temporary visas, as was the case with the Sept. 11 hijackers.

The new arrangement is likely to continue to be a source of controversy because the ability to obtain a "bundle" of warrants, as one official put it, could be seen as undermining the intent of the law to require the government to show cause in individual cases.

Seeking to target members of a group as a whole, even Al Qaeda, would be unusual, legal experts said.

"That would be novel and controversial," said Michael Woods, a former chief of the FBI national-security law division. "But that would explain why you got something new without having to have changes in the FISA statute."

The FISA law does distinguish between U.S. citizens and certain foreigners living in the United States.

When Congress passed the law in 1978, it was concerned with protecting Americans from being spied on by U.S. intelligence agencies. At the same time, lawmakers wanted the CIA and NSA to monitor Soviet spies and other foreign agents in the United States.

FISA says the government must seek a warrant first before "intentionally targeting a United States person" by listening to their phone calls. These persons are defined as U.S. citizens and lawful permanent residents.

The law is less clear, and less demanding, for other persons in the United States. That distinction could give the administration justification for arguing that it seeks to intercept the calls of foreign terrorists and foreigners who are living in the United States, but it was not "intentionally targeting" U.S. citizens.

The FISA judges may have been persuaded that kind of surveillance did not violate the 1978 law and therefore could be authorized legally.

Senators Blast Bush Security Policies (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, January 19, 2007

Influential senators on Thursday demanded that the Bush administration provide more details about its move to place its controversial National Security Agency domestic spying programme under supervision by a special court.

Patrick Leahy and Arlen Specter, the top Democrat and Republican on the Senate judiciary committee, told Alberto Gonzales, the US attorney-general, that the Bush administration needed to provide some more information about the surprise decision this week to allow a secret intelligence court to monitor electronic domestic spying.

“This reversal is a good step, but there are still several outstanding questions that remain,” said Mr Leahy, who assumed the chairmanship of the committee after the Democrats regained control of Congress in November.

“To ensure the balance necessary to achieve both security and liberty for our nation, the president must fully inform Congress and the American people about the contours of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court order authorising this surveillance programme and the programme itself.”

In a major policy reversal announced on Wednesday, the US Justice Department said that President George W. Bush would not re-authorise the so-called Terrorist Surveillance Programme. Justice Department officials said that the administration had reached an agreement whereby any electronic eavesdropping would in future be monitored by a special intelligence court.

Mr Bush authorised the controversial eavesdropping programme – which permitted the NSA to eavesdrop without court warrant on the international communications of Americans with links to al-Qaeda – after the September 11 attacks in New York and Washington in 2001.

Critics had accused him of illegally circumventing the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which requires the government to seek a warrant from an intelligence court before it can spy on Americans.

Mr Specter, who has been a fierce critic of the programme, questioned why the administration had not informed Congress last year about its attempts to bring the programme into line with FISA. In contentious exchanges, the senators asked Mr Gonzales to provide them with the authorisation the administration received from the intelligence court.

When Mr Gonzales refused to say whether he would comply with their request, Mr Leahy shot back, "Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us a decision that you publicly announced...Are we Alice in Wonderland here?"

A federal court last year ruled that the programme was unconstitutional, and rebuked Mr Bush, saying there were "no hereditary kings" in America.

The policy U-turn comes just weeks before an appeals court was scheduled to hear the case, but Mr Gonzales denied that the administration's switch was related to the legislation.

Mr Leahy and Mr Specter also criticised the administration over a host of issues, including Guantanamo Bay and secret CIA renditions of prisoners.

"In the 32 years since I first came to the Senate – during the era of Watergate and Vietnam – I have never seen a time when our constitution and fundamental rights as Americans were more threatened by their own government," said Mr Leahy. "The [Justice] department has also played a pivotal role…in eroding basic human rights and undercutting America's lead role as an advocate for human rights throughout the world."

Senators Press Gonzales On Delay In Getting Court OK On Surveillance (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was grilled Thursday by senators who questioned why it took the Bush administration more than four years to allow a court to oversee the National Security Agency's electronic eavesdropping of Americans and others in terrorism investigations.

During his first appearance before a Senate panel since Democrats took over Congress in the November elections, Gonzales also faced a series of questions from Democrats and some Republicans over how the NSA's program will operate now that agents' surveillance requests must be approved by a special court of federal judges that monitors classified intelligence gathering within the USA.

Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said he was encouraged by Gonzales' announcement Wednesday that President Bush no longer would authorize the NSA to conduct warrantless surveillance of communications coming into or going out of the USA in terrorism probes. Leahy and other lawmakers had blasted the administration's eavesdropping program, saying it illegally sidestepped judicial oversight and violated privacy rights.

However, Leahy and other senators made it clear that they remained unhappy about the administration's handling of surveillance issues. They said they will be watching how the program operates now that surveillance requests will be vetted by the court established in 1978 by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA).

"For years, the administration has engaged in warrantless wiretapping of Americans, I believe contrary to the law," Leahy said.

"The Justice Department has been complicit in advancing these government policies, which threaten our basic liberties and overstep the bounds of our Constitution," he said.

Gonzales insisted the administration had the power to authorize an undisclosed number of eavesdropping requests without a court's involvement. He said the White House changed course and allowed the FISA court to oversee the eavesdropping once officials became satisfied the court could handle requests quickly enough in cases in which there appears to be an imminent threat to security.

The committee's ranking Republican, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, said that despite being briefed on the eavesdropping program by Justice Department attorneys, he still had questions about it and how it will operate in the future. He added that the administration's previous policy of allowing warrantless surveillance likely damaged Republicans in the midterm elections.

"The United States and the administration have paid a heavy price for not acting sooner to bring the terrorist surveillance program under judicial review," he said.

Leahy and Specter also questioned Gonzales about Bush's claim last month that he had the authority to allow agents to open Americans' mail without a warrant. Bush made the claim as he signed legislation aimed at protecting the privacy of U.S. mail.

"If the president is asserting that the act of Congress is unconstitutional, then he ought to say so and not sign the act," Specter said.

Gonzales said Bush "simply wants to preserve the authority that the Congress had already granted to him." He said he knew of no case in which mail had been opened without a court warrant.

White House Shifting Tactics In Surveillance Cases (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

In a four-paragraph letter on Wednesday announcing that the Bush administration had reversed its position and would submit its domestic surveillance program to judicial supervision, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales used one phrase three times. A secret court, he said, had fashioned a way to allow the program to be monitored by the judiciary without compromising the need for "speed and agility."

That phrase also captures, some critics say, the administration's moving-target litigation strategy, one that often seeks to change the terms of the debate just as a claim of executive authority is about to be tested in the courts or in Congress.

On Wednesday, the administration announced that an unnamed judge on the secret court, in a nonadversarial proceeding that apparently cannot be appealed, had issued orders that apparently both granted surveillance requests and set out some ground rules for how such requests would be handled.

The details remained sketchy yesterday, but critics of the administration said they suspected that one goal of the new arrangements was to derail lawsuits challenging the program in conventional federal courts.

"It's another clear example," said Ann Beeson, associate legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union, "of the government playing a shell game to avoid accountability and judicial scrutiny."

In other cases, too, the timing of litigation decisions by the government has been suggestive.

Shortly before the Supreme Court heard a set of three detainee cases in 2004, the administration reversed course and allowed two Americans held incommunicado by the military to meet with their lawyers, mooting that issue.

After the court ruled that one of the men, Yaser Hamdi, could challenge his detention in court, the administration instead freed him and sent him to Saudi Arabia.

And just as the Supreme Court was considering whether to review the case of the second man, Jose Padilla, he was transferred to the criminal justice system last year, mooting his appeal.

Paul W. Butler, a former federal prosecutor who served as special assistant to Donald H. Rumsfeld when he was secretary of defense, said the administration's critics were too quick to view ordinary developments as nefarious ones.

"You do have to ascribe some good faith," said Mr. Butler, now a partner with the Washington law firm of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld. "The government uses presidential authority when they think it's necessary and the law does not provide the specific authority they need. If there is a road that can be taken, operating according to statutes or putting people into the criminal justice system when that makes sense, they will do that."

Like other administrations, even when this one alters course, it almost never concedes that its earlier actions were mistaken.

In the case of the eavesdropping program, the administration continues to maintain that it is free to operate without court approval. Its decision to submit to the secret court, administration lawyers said, was voluntary. At a briefing Wednesday, almost as an afterthought, a senior Justice Department official said, "There's obviously an advantage to having all three branches involved."

The announcement about the surveillance program came two weeks before a federal appeals court in Cincinnati was to hear the first appellate argument about the lawfulness of the program. Government lawyers now say that case is moot, but their claim is open to question.

The usual rule is that cases seeking relief in the future are indeed moot when the relief they seek is granted. But there is an exception, said David Cole, a lawyer with the Center for Constitutional Rights, which has challenged the program in a separate lawsuit filed in New York.

He cited a series of Supreme Court decisions in which the defendants had voluntarily done what the lawsuits were seeking. Such cases are moot, the court ruled in 1968, for instance, only if it is "absolutely clear that the allegedly wrongful behavior could not reasonably be expected to recur."

Because the administration has reserved the right to continue the program, Mr. Cole said, the courts should rule on whether it violated a 1978 law, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and the Constitution.

A third case, from Oregon, is almost certainly not moot. In addition to asking the court to stop surveillance without warrants in the future, that suit asks for money as damages for past surveillance.

The Oregon case, brought by an Islamic charity and two of its lawyers, differs from the Cincinnati appeal and the New York suit because the plaintiffs in it say they have seen a classified document confirming that their communications were actually intercepted.

"We're certainly center stage now," said Jon B. Eisenberg, who represents the charity, Al Haramain Islamic Foundation, and the lawyers.

Mr. Gonzales, speaking to the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday said that the recent orders involved a creative reading of the 1978 law, often called FISA. After the Sept. 11 attacks, he said, administration lawyers determined that the program could not be reconciled with the law but later decided to "push the envelope."

Statements like that frustrate the administration's critics.

"It is very difficult to know if this order in fact satisfies FISA," Mr. Cole said.

Because FISA applications are one-sided affairs, with no one arguing the other side, there is no losing party who can appeal from the orders. In a letter on Wednesday, Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, the presiding judge of the 11-member court, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, said she would have no objection to the release of the relevant orders to lawmakers if the Justice Department approved.

But Mr. Gonzales indicated that the department would object to the release of at least the "operational details" disclosed in the orders.

Gonzales Under Fire In Senate (TIME)

By Brian Bennett

Time, January 19, 2007

Alberto Gonzales spent two hours every day for the last three weeks steeling himself for today's hearing before the Democrat-led Senate Judiciary committee, says a close aide. Staffers peppered him with possible questions that each Senator might ask. He went in armed for the fight with freshly penned letter to the chairmen of that committee — Democrat Patrick Leahy of Vermont and Republican Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania — telling them not to worry about the whole warrant-less wiretapping issue anymore; it has been approved by judge. It seemed like a nimble pre-emptive duck to take a contentious issue off the table. Some Senators thought it felt more they were being led down a rabbit hole.

In an often-heated exchange, Gonzales refused to disclose details about the court's decision and exactly how it applied to the President's controversial wiretapping program. While disclosing that the court had ruled, Gonzales was unwilling to reveal any of the "operational details about how we're doing this." At one point, an exasperated Leahy asked, "Are we Alice in Wonderland here?"

The big question was whether there will be some genuine judicial oversight that monitors how individual wiretaps are being used, or if the court approval is a one-time pass for the entire program. Frustrated Senators pointed out that it was still unclear what procedures, if any, will actually change with the court order, issued on Jan. 10 by a single judge sitting on the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) court.

The judge, Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, wrote in a letter today that she was willing to give Senators copies of the court's opinions on the secret program — provided the Justice Department approved the release of the classified documents, as is the court's standard practice. By the end of the day, many Senators were unsatisfied, feeling they were getting new answers to their old questions, but none of it added up to new information.

The program in question, run by the National Security Agency program and later named the Terrorist Surveillance Program, was designed to listen in on international telephone conversations into or out of the U.S. when one of the callers is believed to be affiliated with a terrorist group. The Justice Department has argued for a year that going through the FISA court for approval of these sensitive, urgent wiretaps was too cumbersome and time consuming.

But after the program was uncovered in press reports in December 2005, pressure mounted on the White House to have judicial oversight. Republican Rep. Pete Hoekstra of Michigan applauded the change today, saying it was a result of "tough questioning" by the House Intelligence Committee over the past year.

But Heather Wilson, a New Mexico Republican who serves on the House Intelligence committee and has been briefed on the program, told the New York Times that she believed the FISA approval was "programmatic" in scope, rather than involving the ongoing review of individual warrants. If that's the case, it doesn't change very much for the Administration — other than eliminating the need for the President to reauthorize the program every 45 days, as he's done since it was initiated in October 2001. The White House has gotten a judge to do that — indefinitely.

Senators Grill Gonzales Over Spy Program (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, January 19, 2007

Senators still suspicious of the government's domestic spying program grilled Attorney General Alberto Gonzales Thursday over whether new oversight by a secret court will help protect peoples' privacy rights.

Gonzales offered few answers, maintaining during 3 1/2 hours of sharp rebukes that disclosing details of the program would expose sensitive security information.

His resistance was underscored by a letter from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court's presiding judge, offering to detail some of its new authority with lawmakers if allowed to by the Bush administration.

"Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us a decision that you publicly announced?" Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., asked. "Are we a little Alice in Wonderland here?"

Gonzales responded: "There is going to be information about operational details about how we're doing this that we want to keep confidential."

His appearance in front of the Senate Judiciary Committee came a day after the administration announced it would allow judicial review of the spying program that President Bush secretly authorized after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks. Until last week, the National Security Agency conducted domestic surveillance of people suspected of links to al-Qaida without court warrants.

Bush on Thursday denied there had been any change in the program, other than to receive a court's blessing of it.

"The courts yesterday said I did have the authority," the president said in an interview with Tribune Broadcasting. "That's important. And the reason it's important that they verify the legalities of the program is it means it's going to extend, make it extend beyond my presidency. This is a really important tool for future presidents to have."

He added: "Nothing has changed in the program except the court has said we've analyzed it and it's a legitimate way to protect the country."

In hearings on both sides of Capitol Hill, lawmakers said they welcomed the reversal by the Bush administration, which had previously opposed review by the so-called FISA Court. But they wanted to know more about how judges might consider evidence when approving government requests to monitor phone calls and e-mails between the United States and abroad.

"I'd like to know if there's an intention to do this on an individual basis, or at least on a case-by-case basis where five, six, ten, 20, 100 individuals are involved, or is it broader brush than that?" said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. "Because if it's a very broad brush approval and again, because it's secret we have no way of knowing, it doesn't do much good."

"They meet the legal requirements under FISA," Gonzales said.

"I think we have to assume these are broad program warrants, barring some comment from you," Schumer responded. He added: "If it's a broad program warrant, it really isn't very satisfying in terms of protection that the Constitution requires."

Gonzales later added that the warrants go "above and beyond what we normally find in a FISA order to ensure that any information that shouldn't be collected is destroyed in an appropriate way."

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said it remains unclear whether the FISA court has a blanket authority to approve all eavesdropping requests — even though Justice Department attorneys have assured him warrants would target individuals. "From their description to me, I think we need to know more on the oversight process," he said.

Specter also needled Gonzales on why the spying program was only last week put under judicial review after it was revealed a little over a year ago. He noted that Republicans lost control of Congress in elections last fall that were widely seen as a repudiation of administration policy.

"The heavy criticism the president took on the program was very harmful in the political process, and for the reputation of the country," Specter said.

Since assuming oversight authority, by a Jan. 10 order, the FISA court already has approved at least one surveillance warrant targeting a person suspected of having ties to al-Qaida or an associated terror group.

In a letter released at the Senate hearing, FISA Court Presiding Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, said she has no objection to giving lawmakers copies of orders and opinions relating to the secret panel's oversight of the spy program.

"However, the court's practice is to refer any requests for classified information to the Department of Justice. In this instance, the documents that are responsive to your request contain classified information and, therefore, I would ask you to discuss the matter with the attorney general or his representatives," Kollar-Kotelly wrote in the Jan. 17 letter.

"If allowed, the Court will, of course, cooperate with the agreement," she wrote.

Both Gonzales and National Intelligence Director John Negroponte, testifying separately before the House Intelligence Committee, said it was uncertain whether the court orders and details about the program will be disclosed. Negroponte said there may be separation of powers issues involved in turning over information to Congress about the program.

Officials would not say whether case-by-case basis decisions on surveillance of Americans are now made by FISA judges or by NSA officials.

Last August, a federal judge in Detroit declared the spying program unconstitutional, saying it violated the rights to free speech and privacy and the separation of powers. The Justice Department launched an appeal of that decision, but now is considering whether to ask a three-judge panel of the Cincinnati-based appellate court to dismiss the case.

Gonzales Hit On Wiretap Oversight Delay (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales was challenged yesterday by members of the Senate Judiciary Committee on why the Bush administration took more than five years to seek oversight by an independent court for its domestic terrorist-surveillance program.

"For years, this administration has engaged in warrantless wiretapping of Americans contrary to the law," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and committee chairman. "I welcome the president's change of course to not reauthorize this program and to, instead, seek approval for all wiretaps from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, as the law requires.

"This reversal is a good first step, but there are still several outstanding questions that remain," Mr. Leahy said. "The president must also fully inform Congress and the American people about the contours of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court order authorizing this surveillance program and of the program itself."

Mr. Gonzales announced Wednesday that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court would monitor Justice Department intercepts of international calls involving terrorism suspects in this country. He said an order establishing oversight was issued Jan. 10 and it gave the department, which conducts the program through the National Security Agency, the "necessary speed and agility while providing substantial advantages."

The announcement was considered a major concession for President Bush, who since the secret program was publicly disclosed in 2005 has argued that he did not need -- or want -- to use the special intelligence court.

Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the committee's ranking Republican, said the administration could and should have moved quicker to get court approval. "I cannot help but conclude that there hasn't been a sufficient sense of urgency on behalf of the Department of Justice to get this job done faster," he said.

Mr. Specter, who has been critical of the White House for its refusal to disclose details of the surveillance program, has described the policy as a "clear-cut violation" of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA).

Mr. Gonzales challenged Mr. Specter's statement that the matter should have been handled faster, saying the issue was not something "we could have pulled off the shelf and done in a matter of days or weeks." He called the process "a very complicated application," but added that it will enable the government to intercept calls to and from those in this country with suspected terrorists ties, subject to the approval of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

He said the court orders would "allow the necessary speed and agility the government needs to protect our nation from the terrorist threat."

Both Democrats and Republicans on the committee demanded more information about the court's oversight role, citing a letter from FISA's presiding judge saying the court would have no objection to giving the panel confidential information, but it would have to be provided by the Justice Department.

Mr. Gonzales said only that there would be "information about operational details about how we're doing this that we want to keep confidential."

Spy Court's Orders Stir Debate On Hill (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

The Bush administration quickly locked horns with Democratic lawmakers yesterday over its revised domestic wiretap program, signaling that the government will probably oppose efforts to release new court orders from a clandestine court that now governs the spying.

The head of the secret court that approved the program said she has no objection to releasing the documents, but Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte indicated that the administration is likely to resist.

The conflict followed the administration's announcement Wednesday that it will dismantle the controversial counterterrorism surveillance program run by the National Security Agency and instead conduct the eavesdropping under the authority of the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, which issues warrants in spy and terrorism cases.

Yesterday's debate underscored continued skepticism among Democrats and some Republicans over the parameters and legality of the administration's surveillance efforts, even with court approval, and signaled that Congress and the executive branch are likely to continue sparring over the details.

Although the precise contours and scope of the revised spying program remain unclear, some new information emerged yesterday. Sen. Arlen Specter (Pa.), the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee, said Justice Department briefers told him the effort was based on "individualized" warrants, rather than a blanket order that would allow broader surveillance.

Four other people who have been briefed on the program, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the program is classified, described it as a hybrid effort that includes both individual warrants and the authority for eavesdropping on more broadly defined groups of people.

Administration officials have declined to provide details of how the new version of the program will operate, including whether the government must obtain warrants for each person targeted for surveillance. Officials say the orders from a judge of the intelligence court are "complex" and "innovative" but adhere to the limits of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), a 1978 law that governs domestic surveillance of suspected terrorists and spies.

Leading Democrats, while praising the administration's decision to conduct surveillance under court authority, said yesterday that there are still too many unanswered questions about how the program will be conducted. Specter and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), the Judiciary Committee chairman, demanded the release of the intelligence court judge's orders allowing the new program, issued Jan. 10.

Those demands were bolstered by U.S. District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, the presiding judge of the intelligence court, who wrote in a letter to Leahy and Specter that she has "no objection to this material being made available" to lawmakers.

But Kollar-Kotelly said the final decision is up to the Justice Department, because the orders include classified information.

Gonzales, appearing before the Judiciary Committee, said he could not guarantee the release of the orders because of classified-information restrictions. Negroponte told the House intelligence committee that letting the secret court turn over information about the program to Congress may violate separation-of-powers provisions.

The government program targets telephone calls and e-mails between people in the United States and others overseas if one party is suspected to have links to al-Qaeda or other terrorist groups.

"Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us decisions that you've publicly announced?" Leahy asked. "Are we a little Alice in Wonderland here?"

"I'm not saying that I have objections to it being released. What I'm saying is it's not my decision to make," Gonzales responded. He added later: "There is going to be information about operational details about how we're doing this that we want to keep confidential."

Several senators also sharply questioned why it took nearly two years for the Justice Department to come up with a surveillance plan that was acceptable to the secret court.

"It is a little hard to see why it took so long," said Specter, who unsuccessfully attempted to shepherd legislation through Congress last year that would have allowed the administration to seek the court's approval for the spying. "The heavy criticism the president took on the program was very harmful in the political process and for the reputation of the country."

Gonzales argued that disclosing even the basic outlines of the program would reveal vital intelligence sources and methods to terrorist groups. He also defended the time it took for Justice lawyers to devise a plan that would pass court muster.

"This is a very complicated application," Gonzales said. "It's not something you just pull off the shelf."

Gonzales said the program adheres to FISA and that "minimization" procedures to destroy unneeded data go "above and beyond" what is required in a typical FISA case.

Gonzales said Justice Department lawyers began exploring ways to use the surveillance law for the NSA program shortly after he became attorney general in early 2005.

Another source said the department had informally floated a proposal to Kollar-Kotelly in recent months about how to resolve concerns among the intelligence court's judges that information gleaned from the president's surveillance program might taint the court's warrant process.

Kollar-Kotelly raised the same point with top Justice officials in 2005, when she was briefed on the president's domestic spying program, according to several officials familiar with the FISA process. The judge did not consider it her place to determine whether the program was constitutional, but she was very disturbed by the risk that information gleaned from warrantless wiretaps could be used in warrant applications without the court's knowledge.

Senators Demand Details On New Eavesdropping Rules (NYT)

By David Johnston And Scott Shane

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — Lawmakers demanded more information on new rules for governing a domestic surveillance program on Thursday, a day after the Bush administration announced that it had placed the National Security Agency eavesdropping under court supervision.

Senators from both parties who had long criticized the eavesdropping without court warrants said at a Judiciary Committee hearing that they welcomed the change but wanted details. They said they wanted to be sure that the new rules adequately protected Americans' privacy.

A central question is whether the court will approve eavesdropping case by case, its traditional practice, or will it issue broader orders that provide additional government leeway in selecting targets.

A Congressional official who has been briefed on the new procedures called it a hybrid of individual warrants and broader approval.

Some lawmakers wanted to know why the administration had waited five years from the start of the program to put it under the supervision of the secret intelligence court and asked whether the administration might decide on its own to revive eavesdropping without warrants if the court denied a request.

At the hearing, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, a chief defender of the program, tried, apparently without success, to quell the flood of questions.

The session quickly became a forum for senators to say the administration was withholding pertinent information about the decision. House Democrats raised similar concerns.

Pressed repeatedly for details, Mr. Gonzales offered little new information and would not agree to provide more documents to explain the decision. He declined to answer questions about why the administration had reversed itself after saying for more than a year that the program could not operate effectively under court supervision.

"There was a reason why we didn't do this as an initial matter shortly after the attacks of Sept. 11," said Mr. Gonzales, who was White House counsel.

Referring to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, the law that created the secret court, he added, "The truth of the matter is we looked at FISA and we all concluded there's no way we can do what we have to do to protect this country under the strict reading of FISA."

Later, Mr. Gonzales said, after he became attorney general in 2005, he started reviewing whether the program might be brought under the court's supervision.

Justice Department officials said they had worked on the "innovative, complex orders" for two years.

On Jan. 10, an unidentified judge of the court approved the first new order. The next day, National Security Agency officials called the House and Senate intelligence committees to outline the new system, and Justice Department officials briefed some committee staff members on Friday, Congressional officials said.

A senior administration official involved in formulating the policy expressed frustration with the criticism on Capitol Hill. He said Democrats had repeatedly said the program was valuable but should be conducted under FISA.

Now that that has happened, the official said, "People ought to take yes for an answer."

He added that even if the critics are suspicious of the administration, "I don't think there's any basis for being suspicious of the FISA court," which has approved the system.

At the hearing, Mr. Gonzales said the rules protected national security by allowing continued eavesdropping, but required the government to halt quickly the monitoring of people who were not found to be doing anything wrong.

With Justice Department officials unwilling to provide lawmakers with documents, lawmakers explored other ways to obtain information. In response to a request from the Judiciary Committee chairman, Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, the presiding judge of the foreign intelligence surveillance court, Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, a federal district judge in the District of Columbia, said the court would be willing to turn over to the panel its classified orders.

But Judge Kollar-Kotelly wrote in a letter that her court would cooperate only "if the executive and legislative branches reach agreement for access to this material."

Mr. Gonzales, asked by Mr. Leahy whether he would object to the disclosure of the documents to Congress, replied that he hoped to keep operational aspects of the program secret. Mr. Gonzales said that before he answered the question he would need to consult his "principal," apparently a reference to President Bush.

Mr. Leahy expressed skepticism, saying: "I don't think I fully understand that. Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us decisions that you've publicly announced? Are we a little Alice in Wonderland here?"

Mr. Gonzales replied: "I'm not saying that I have objection to its being released. What I'm saying is it's not my decision to make."

Some lawmakers said the administration should have changed course much sooner.

"It is a little hard to see why it took so long," said Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, asked about the court's approval of the surveillance orders.

"I'd like to know," Mr. Schumer said, "if there is an intention to do this on an individual basis or on a case-by-case basis where 5, 6, 10, 20, 100 individuals are involved or is it broader brush than that? Because if it is very broad-brush approval, again because it's secret, we have no way of knowing, it doesn't do much good."

Mr. Gonzales said, "They meet the requirements under FISA."

The Justice Department has tried to streamline the application for warrants under the surveillance law, creating a computerized system called Turbo FISA.

Bush Makes Concessions To Congress (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, January 19, 2007

President Bush's about-face on warrantless wiretapping was the latest in a series of White House retreats and reversals. This is a different day for a president known for his stubbornness and insistence on seeing things his way.

In just two months, Bush has acknowledged making mistakes in Iraq, sacked Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon and given up the fight for John Bolton at the United Nations. He has promised a plan to balance the budget by 2012 — after aggressively presiding over record deficits and tax cuts; Democrats also have set such a target. And the president has agreed tentatively to increasing the minimum wage.

Bush seems to be bending to the realities of the new Democratic control of Congress — and laying down markers to keep the last two years of his presidency from being seen as only about Iraq.

"It appears that Bush is cleaning up a lot of the outstanding cats and dogs prior to the State of the Union," said GOP strategist Scott Reed. "I think both sides are going to try to get something done for the next year before presidential politics totally consume the country," said Reed, who ran Bob Dole's presidential campaign in 1996.

Bush was expected to emphasize a range of domestic initiatives in the annual State of the Union address on Tuesday. It will be his first to a Congress fully under Democratic control.

With his eye increasingly on his presidential legacy, Bush is seeking areas where he can reach agreement with Democrats. That could include shoring up Social Security, overhauling immigration rules and reducing the country's reliance on imported oil.

That may run counter to Bush's self-assured, in-your-face image, but it's also a recognition that Democrats are now calling many of the shots, said Bruce Buchanan, a political science professor at the University of Texas and a longtime close observer of the Bush family.

"Since he feels compelled to stick to his guns on Iraq in a way that he knows bucks public opinion and Congress, he wants to be able to point to some areas where he is doing his best to cooperate, to acknowledge the (midterm) election results," Buchanan said.

As governor, Bush earned an early reputation for successfully reaching out to Democrats who controlled the Texas Legislature. But, said Buchanan, the Democrats in Texas were centrist business Democrats whose goals often meshed with Bush's, a situation not matched in Washington.

The abrupt retreat from warrantless eavesdropping of calls between the U.S. and overseas appeared designed to head off certain confrontations with Congress and federal courts.

After claiming for months it had the authority to order such spying, the administration now says it will let an independent panel of federal judges oversee the program.

The turnabout raised fresh questions about other post Sept. 11 anti-terror policies that appear to push the constitutional envelope, including secret CIA prisons overseas and the continued existence of the prison camp for suspected terrorists in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"The government is again one of checks and balances," said Steffen Schmidt, a political scientist at Iowa State University. "The fact that the Democrats won and will scrutinize his policy, investigate his decisions and say `no' to things means he has to essentially be a president in a different way than when he had a compliant Republican Congress for six years."

Bush was drawing criticism even from within his own party over the domestic spying program, initiated soon after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and first disclosed in December 2005 by The New York Times.

"The United States and the administration have paid a heavy price for not acting sooner to bring the terrorist surveillance program under judicial review," Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania told Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a sometimes testy Senate Judiciary Relations Committee hearing on Thursday. Specter is the panel's senior Republican.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the chairman, asserted that, in his more than 30 years in the Senate, he never had seen a time when the constitutional and fundamental rights of Americans "were more threatened, unfortunately, by our own government."

Until the turnabout, the administration argued strenuously that the president possessed extraordinary legal powers because of the need to protect the country after the Sept. 11 attacks.

The warrantless spying program was part of a campaign spearheaded by Vice President Dick Cheney, who argued that many presidential powers had been eroded by Congress in response to the Vietnam War and the Watergate scandal. Cheney defended the program as recently as Sunday in a television interview.

The White House denied that Bush's recent concessions to Congress were a sign of political weakness.

"A lot of people are looking for a `panic' or `failure' narrative out of this White House. It's just not the case," said presidential press secretary Tony Snow.

White House Backs Down On Wartime Powers (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush has claimed some far-reaching powers for the executive branch in its prosecution of the war against global terrorism – but in the face of legal challenges and newly empowered Democrats, some of those powers slowly are being curtailed.

In the latest such move, the administration itself has decided to put the National Security Agency's secretive domestic spying program under judicial oversight. This program, under which the NSA monitored phone calls and e-mails between the United States and other countries when a participant was suspected of a link to terrorism, has until now operated without court-issued warrants.

The warrantless eavesdropping operation, along with the abuse of detainees at Abu Ghraib prison and other civil-liberties issues, has caused even US allies overseas to question what was happening to the basic nature of the United States, says Joseph Nye, former dean of Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government in Cambridge, Mass.

But now US courts have held that some aspects of the administration's detainee policies aren't constitutional. Harsh interrogation techniques such as waterboarding may no longer be permitted. And judges will apparently now decide whether NSA wiretaps are justified.

"We are still capable of self-correction," says Mr. Nye, now a professor of international relations at the JFK School. "That has an attraction overseas."

A senior Justice Department official who briefed reporters Wednesday on the change in the wiretapping program said that the NSA program had been run in a legal manner. That said, there are advantages to having a judge oversee the program, said the official – though he declined to specify what the advantages were.

"Obviously, this issue of the terrorist surveillance program is one that has been under intense public debate and scrutiny on [Capitol Hill]," said the official. "And just considering all these circumstances, the president determined that this is the appropriate course."

Last August, a federal judge in Detroit had ruled the program unconstitutional, saying it violated privacy and free-speech rights, as well as the separation of powers between the branches of government.

That ruling may now be moot, according to Justice Department officials. Long-standing critics of the program were not so sure, saying that the lack of details about what exactly had changed means the courts may still need to examine the issue.

"The NSA was operating illegally, and this 11th-hour ploy is clearly an effort to avoid judicial and congressional scrutiny," said ACLU executive director Anthony Romero. "Despite this adroit back flip, the constitutional problems with the president's actions remain unaddressed."

The NSA program, to this point, has been reauthorized every 45 days by executive order. On Wednesday, the Justice Department in a letter to congressional leaders announced that he will not reauthorize the program after the current 45-day period expires. Instead, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, a panel set up in the wake of Vietnam-era struggles over executive-branch secrecy, will handle NSA eavesdropping requests, apparently case by case.

In fact, such oversight is already occurring. The FISA panel issued multiple orders last week allowing surveillance of communications thought to be linked to terrorism in which one party is in the US.

The Justice Department announced the change a day before Attorney General Alberto Gonzales appeared for an oversight hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee. With the panel now controlled by Democrats, Mr. Gonzales's relations with Congress may be testier than they have been to this point.

For instance, at the hearing Gonzales announced that he might not be able to release details of FISA orders on the program, causing committee chairman Patrick Leahy (D) to say, "Are we Alice in Wonderland here?"

Gonzales responded, "There is going to be information about operational details about how we're doing this that we want to keep confidential."

Gonzales Faces Sharp Criticism By Senators (MCT)

By Greg Gordon

McClatchy Newspapers, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON - Senate Democrats and one Republican pressed Attorney General Alberto Gonzales Thursday to explain why it took the Bush administration five years to give a secret national security court control over government eavesdropping on suspected terrorists.

Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee that such a change was highly complex - "not the kind of thing you pull off a shelf" - and that it took time to find a way to do it without compromising the nation's security.

Until now, the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program, launched in the months after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, has monitored overseas phone calls and other electronic communications involving Americans without court warrants.

But Gonzales repeatedly rejected senators' assertions that it was illegal, saying the program was within President Bush's emergency war powers.

Testifying under oath in his first congressional appearance since Democrats took control of Capitol Hill this month, Gonzales was pummeled with allegations that the program and other administration anti-terrorism programs have trampled on federal civil rights laws and the Constitution. He also faced sharp questions about rising violent crime in some medium-sized cities, allegations of voting rights abuses against African-Americans in Maryland and his agency's recent dismissal of a half-dozen U.S. attorneys.

"I have never seen a time when our Constitution and fundamental rights as Americans were more threatened by their own government," said Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the committee chairman.

In his opening statement, Leahy pointed to "warrantless wiretapping," allegations that the U.S. has tortured some terrorism detainees held overseas and the evisceration of what he called "the Great Writ of habeas corpus" - a detainee's right to challenge the conditions of his confinement.

Leahy's face reddened and his voice rose when Gonzales said he couldn't explain for another few days why an innocent Canadian citizen, Maher Arar, was detained at New York's Kennedy Airport in 2002, then sent to Syria to be questioned.

A Canadian inquiry later found that the Syrians had tortured Arar while they held him captive for 10 months.

Gonzales said that his predecessor as attorney general, John Ashcroft, had received assurances from Syria that Arar wouldn't be tortured.

"Assurances?" Leahy asked. He questioned why the U.S. government would trust Syria.

"We knew damned well if he went to Canada, he would not be tortured," the senator said, describing the episode as "beneath the dignity of this country that has always been a beacon of human rights."

"The Canadians are wondering what's happened to us," said Leahy, who lives an hour's drive from the Canadian border. He threatened to hold a hearing on the matter if Gonzales fails to provide an explanation within a week.

Talking in low, controlled tones in response to questioning by Sens. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., Russ Feingold, D-Wis., and Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., Gonzales refused to provide specifics of the newly disclosed arrangement with the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, saying such matters are classified.

He said the new program complies with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), the 1978 law that created the court and gave it a lower threshold for approving wiretaps and other surveillance in national security investigations.

Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter, the panel's ranking Republican, said he'll explore further whether there's "any conceivable justification for 19 months elapsing" from the time Gonzales said the Justice Department first began exploring ways to put the program under the FISA court until it did so.

Specter sought to quell concerns that the court has given the administration a secret, blanket warrant to monitor the activities of suspected terrorists. Specter said that two senior Justice Department officials advised him, during a private briefing after the new arrangement was announced Wednesday, that orders signed by a judge on the court provide for "individualized" treatment of warrant applications.

Specter said that disclosure of the program, just as Congress was completing revisions to the USA Patriot Act in December 2005, weakened the law and may have been a factor in Republicans' election defeat last fall.

Leahy and Specter wrote to the FISA court's chief judge on Wednesday requesting copies of the new orders. Chief Judge Colleen Kollar-Cotelly responded that she had "no objection" to making the material public, but that it's the court's practice to refer requests for classified information to the Justice Department.

Gonzales repeatedly emphasized that all members of the Senate and House intelligence committees have been briefed on the orders and didn't immediately say how he'd respond to the demand from the Judiciary Committee.

The agreement was announced two weeks before the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati was due to hear arguments over a lower court judge's ruling that the warrantless surveillance program was illegal. A Justice Department official, who insisted upon anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the matter, said the agency would now argue that the case is moot.

Gonzales Balks At Providing Details On Wiretapping Plans (HC)

By Bennett Roth, Houston Chronicle Washington Bureau

Houston Chronicle, January 19, 2007

Attorney general faces harsh words from senators at committee hearing

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Alberto Gonzales refused to promise a Senate committee that the administration would let it review the text of an agreement ending its warrantless wiretapping program.

During a contentious Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Thursday, Democrats said they wanted more details about how the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court will approve federal eavesdropping on U.S. residents suspected of having ties to terrorists.

Committee chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., was taken aback when Gonzales wouldn't commit to turning over the FISA order spelling out the domestic wiretapping program.

"Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us a decision that you publicly announced," asked Leahy. "Are we in Alice in Wonderland here?"

Gonzales responded that release of the order was "not my decision to make." He added that "there is going to be information about operational details about how we're doing this that we want to keep confidential." The presiding judge of the FISA wrote Leahy that she had no problem giving the lawmakers the order if the administration signed off.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., who as previous chairman of the committee had been attempting to broker a compromise on the issue, criticized Gonzales for taking a year and a half to work out the deal.

"The heavy criticism the president took on the program was very harmful in the political process, and for the reputation of the country," said Specter, who noted that the Republicans lost congressional elections as the debate over the program raged.

Gonzales, however, said that working out details of the FISA oversight was a complex matter and not "something we pulled off the shelf and could have done in a matter of weeks."

Publicly disclosed in 2005The program was secretly approved by President Bush after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks but was not publicly disclosed until December of 2005. Bush and his aides have vigorously defended warrantless eavesdropping as necessary to catch terrorists while Democrats have questioned its legality.

Gonzales said the White House still believed it was acting lawfully in wiretapping without court approval, prompting Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., to question the permanency of the new agreement. "I, for one, can't feel very relieved knowing that the administration's view is they can go back and reinstitute the old program on a whim," Schumer said.

In his first appearance before the Judiciary Committee under Democratic control, the Texas lawyer spent much of the day fielding often hostile questions.

Leahy asked him about reports that the administration approved the opening of mail without warrants.

Gonzales said that there had been no physical searches of mail by federal authorities, but he would not say whether the president has the constitutional authority to order such searches.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., criticized the attorney general for forcing out a number of U.S. attorneys and installing temporary replacements who have not been confirmed by the Senate.

Gonzales responded it was a "sign of good management" that he was seeking the best people to be the Department of Justice's representatives in communities across the nation.

Attorney General Gets Sharp Questions On Surveillance (Update1) (BLOOM)

By James Rowley And Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, January 19, 2007

Jan. 18 (Bloomberg) -- Senators peppered Attorney General Alberto Gonzales with complaints that the Bush administration paid scant attention to civil liberties and made overreaching claims of presidential power during its five-year war on terror.

During his first appearance before a Democratic-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee, Gonzales was questioned repeatedly about why President George W. Bush didn't act sooner to put electronic surveillance of suspected terrorists under court supervision.

In a reversal, the Justice Department announced yesterday that a secret court will oversee the wiretapping of international phone calls by suspected al-Qaeda agents in the U.S., a program that began in 2001 after the Sept. 11 attacks.

``It is a little hard to see why it took so long," said Senator Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican who headed the panel until Democrats took control of Congress this month. ``There hasn't been a sufficient sense of urgency" to ``get this job done faster," he said.

In a letter to Congress yesterday, the Justice Department said it began ``exploring options" for judicial oversight at least four months before the program was disclosed in December 2005. A judge with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, established by a 1978 law, issued orders Jan. 10 authorizing the surveillance. The government told the court it had ``probable cause" to believe one party to an international phone call or e-mail exchange was an al-Qaeda agent.

`Strict Reading'

Gonzales said he disagreed with ``Senator Specter's innuendo that this was something we could have pulled off the shelf in a matter of days and weeks." He said that in 2001, the government didn't seek court approval because ``we all concluded there's no way we can do what we believe we have to do to protect this country" under a ``strict reading" of the 1978 law.

Gonzales was also questioned about Bush's assertion, after signing postal authorization legislation, that he can order Americans' mail opened without a warrant.

``To my knowledge there is no physical search of mail" unless authorized by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, Gonzales said.

Vermont Senator Patrick Leahy, the panel's new Democratic chairman, complained that the Justice Department has been ``complicit" in devising ``government policies which threaten our basic liberties and overstep the bounds of our Constitution." He cited the legal justification for detaining and interrogating suspected terrorists at secret prisons run by the Central Intelligence Agency.

Public Outcry

Following a public outcry over the spying on suspected terrorists without court warrants, Bush and his allies spent the past year defending the program's legality.

Bush said he has the power to conduct the surveillance under a congressional resolution authorizing the war on terrorism and under his constitutional role as commander-in-chief. The administration argued that it would be impossible to require a court order each time the National Security Agency wanted to wiretap international phone calls of a suspected al-Qaeda agent.

Specter said ``heavy criticism the president took on the program" was politically ``very harmful" to Republicans in the November elections when Democrats won control of Congress for the first time in 12 years.

Gonzales refused to say whether the recent orders signed by a Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court judge authorized surveillance of specific individuals or broader groups of suspected al-Qaeda agents.

New York Democrat Charles E. Schumer said he wasn't satisfied by the attorney general's answers. ``If it's a very broad-brush approval" by the secret court, ``it doesn't do much good" to meet traditional legal requirements that warrants authorize surveillance of a specific person, he said.

Too Many Questions

``There are still far too many questions to say this issue is resolved," Schumer said.

Schumer pointed to Gonzales's continued assertion that the National Security Agency's surveillance was legal without court warrants. ``You could turn this on and off at will" if the court ``didn't do what you wanted," Schumer said.

Under the new policy, the monitoring must be approved by the court, which meets in secret at the Justice Department's Washington headquarters. It has authority to approve government eavesdropping of U.S. citizens linked to a foreign power.

Gonzales declined to say whether the Bush administration would consent to the court's release of the order. The special court's presiding judge, Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, told Leahy and Specter in a letter she had no objection to giving Congress the documents if the Bush administration agreed to let lawmakers have access to them.

``That's a decision that I would like to take back to my principal," Gonzales told Leahy.

Senate Judiciary Committee Questions Surveillance (NEWSDAY)

By Tom Brune, Newsday Washington Bureau

Newsday, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales Thursday sparred with senators demanding details about a special court's approval of the president's controversial terrorist surveillance program and defended the years he waited before seeking judicial review.

In his first appearance before the Senate Judiciary Committee since Democrats took control of Congress, Gonzales rebuffed senators who grilled him about anti-terror policies they contend intrude on civil liberties and privacy.

"We have taken actions we believe are absolutely necessary," Gonzales said, after Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) said President George W. Bush had squandered the support of Congress and the public.

Much of the hearing focused on Gonzales' announcement Wednesday that the administration had reversed course and sought court approval for the National Security Agency's tapping of U.S.-international calls and e-mails of suspected terrorists, five years after Bush ordered it on his own authority.

Last week, a judge on the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court issued orders allowing the NSA "to target for collection international communications into and out of the United States where there is probable cause" one of the parties is a member of al-Qaida or an affiliated group.

Despite repeated questions about the scope of those orders, Gonzales insisted to senators that the court process and spying remain secret.

Gonzales wouldn't budge when Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) disclosed a letter from the FISA court chief judge expressing a willingness to release the orders to the committee.

"Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us a decision that you publicly announced?" Leahy asked. "Are we Alice in Wonderland here?"

Gonzales said it wasn't his decision, but added, "Certainly in the application, there's going to be information about operational details about how we're doing this that we want to keep confidential."

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) was also caustic in his questioning, noting it took Justice Department lawyers 19 months to win the court order, while he wrote a bill to do it in a year.

"I cannot help but conclude there hasn't been a sufficient sense of urgency to get this done faster," Specter said.

Gonzales said, "I somewhat take issue with Sen. Specter's innuendo that this was something that we could have pulled off the shelf and done in a matter of days or weeks."

Gonzales said the confidential briefings would help senators understand the orders.

But Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) said he wasn't satisfied with Gonzales' responses.

"While many are rightly relieved that you finally decided to seek the involvement of the court, there are still far too many unanswered questions to say that this issue has been resolved," Schumer said.

He asked if the spying is done "on an individual basis, or at least on a case-by-case basis where five, six, 10, 20, 100 individuals are involved, or is it broader brush than that?"

Gonzales said the court orders "meet the legal requirements under FISA."

"We have to assume these are broad program warrants," Schumer said, which falls short of Constitutional protection.

Schumer also said he was concerned Bush believes he doesn't need a court order.

"We can't feel very relieved knowing that the administration's view is that they can go back and reinstitute the old program on a whim," he said.

Attorney General Mum On Spy Program Court Orders (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, January 19, 2007

At Senate hearing, Gonzales casts doubt on whether more details will be publicly disclosed about administration's latest surveillance plans.

WASHINGTON--Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' appearance before a key U.S. Senate committee Thursday yielded little new information about the Bush administration's sudden revelation that it would seek court approval for its domestic eavesdropping activities.

At a U.S. Department of Justice oversight hearing scheduled before the government announcement on Wednesday, Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) and ranking Republican Arlen Specter said they were pleased to hear that future activities associated with a controversial National Security Agency operation known as the Terrorist Surveillance Program would undergo review by judges on the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

But many critical questions about the scope and content of the court orders remain unanswered, committee members said.

"To ensure the balance necessary to achieve both security and liberty for our nation, the president must also fully inform Congress and the American people about the contours of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court order authorizing this surveillance program and of the program itself," Leahy said.

Few, however, probed for those details at Thursday's hearing, where questioning spanned everything from the Iraq war to violent crime statistics to online child exploitation. Aside from Specter, no Republicans asked questions about the surveillance activities, and some Democrats also focused their inquiries elsewhere.

Although Specter said he was concerned about what shape the court orders took, only one senator present directly posed that question. Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) grilled the attorney general on whether the orders described in his Wednesday letter (PDF) amounted to a blanket warrant for the entire eavesdropping program or were tailored to particular targets. Even Intelligence Committee members who had received closed-door briefings didn't seem to have a good feel for that information, he said.

"If it's a very broad-brush approval--and again, because it's secret, we have no way of knowing--it doesn't do much good," Schumer said.

Gonzales said he could only reveal that the orders "meet the legal requirements" under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), a 1978 law that was intended to govern eavesdropping on suspects outside the United States.

Perhaps others were hoping the court itself would help shed light on its activities. Specter and Leahy highlighted their joint request on Wednesday to presiding FISA court judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly for copies of the orders, which are typically kept confidential. According to Gonzales' letter, an unnamed FISA court judge on January 10 issued orders that authorized government wiretapping of communications when at least one end is outside the United States and one of the communicants is likely to be a member or agent of al-Qaida or associated terrorist groups.

Whether that information will be released to Congress--much less to the public--remains uncertain. In a letter dated January 17 and distributed to reporters Thursday, Kollar-Kotelly said she had no objection to furnishing the documents to the committee but because classified information is involved, she would have to refer their request to the Justice Department.

"If the executive and legislative branches reach agreement for access to this material," she wrote, "the court will, of course, cooperate with the agreement."

Pressed by Leahy on whether he would object to the court orders being shared with Congress, Gonzales first said he'd have to take it up with his "principals."

"Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us decisions that you publicly announced?" Leahy asked. "Are we a little Alice in Wonderland here?"

"I would say it's not my decision to make," Gonzales replied. He added that he couldn't remember exactly what was in the orders but that they undoubtedly include "operational details" that would need to be kept under wraps.

Schumer, Specter and Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) each questioned why the Bush administration hadn't approached the court sooner if it had truly begun exploring that option in spring 2005, as it said in its Wednesday letter.

"This is a very complicated application," Gonzales replied. "In many ways it's innovative in terms of the orders granted by the judge. It's not the kind of thing you just pull off the shelf. We worked on it a long time."

Attorney General Grilled Over Domestic Spying Changes (NJTD)

By Andrew Noyes, National Journal's Technology Daily

National Journal's Technology Daily, January 19, 2007

The Bush administration's top lawyer took heat from the Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday about the federal government's domestic electronic eavesdropping program and the Pentagon's use of an anti-terrorism law to collect financial records of U.S. citizens.

The Justice Department announced Wednesday that it would change how the National Security Agency's spying initiative operates by getting permission from a secret court that fields requests for surveillance warrants on U.S. soil.

It also was revealed over the weekend that the CIA and Defense Department have been utilizing a special subpoena power built into the USA PATRIOT Act to scour bank and credit-card records in espionage and international terrorism investigations.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales remained guarded throughout the hearing and refused to answer a number of questions asked by committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., ranking Republican Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and others.

Specter said he wanted to know "why it took so long" for the administration to agree to let the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court review electronic spying requests. The Justice Department said it had been negotiating a review process with the court since summer 2005.

The NSA initiative was implemented shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks but was not publicly disclosed until December 2005.

There are "far too many unanswered questions to say this issue has been resolved," added Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. He worried aloud that the administration could "turn [court review] off at will, particularly if you got a decision that you didn't want."

Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., said he was pleased that the administration decided to "return to the law" after more than five years of what he described as illegal wiretapping. The turnabout was a "stunning" and "long overdue change in direction," Feingold said.

On the issue of collecting bank and credit-card data, Specter said "there's a very basic, distinct role" of the FBI, which pursues domestic matters, and for the CIA, whose role is international. "I'm at a loss to see what the CIA is doing on domestic investigations," Specter said, noting that the Defense Department "has no authority to investigate American citizens."

"There is not a constitutional issue here," Gonzales insisted. He said Congress authorized law enforcement agencies to collect business records but not for criminal investigations or domestic terrorism cases. The files can only be used in espionage and overseas incidents, he said.

Caroline Fredrickson, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington office, said in a statement that the hearing was the "first real test to see if the new Congress will conduct meaningful oversight on the administration."

Government lawyers are slated to appear before the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in two weeks to challenge a lawsuit filed by the ACLU over the NSA program. The ACLU said a ruling remains important because the president still believes in his "inherent authority to engage in wiretapping without the oversight of the [Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act] court."

Absent more details about what the secret FISA court has authorized, there is no way to determine whether the NSA's current activities are lawful, the ACLU said. "The legality of this unprecedented surveillance program should not be decided by a secret court in one-sided proceedings," ACLU lawyer Ann Beeson said.

U.S. Senator Blasts Gonzales About Arar, Demands Answers Next Week (CP)

By Beth Gorham, Canadian Press

Canadian Press, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON (CP) - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, lambasted by an irate senator Thursday over how Maher Arar was treated by American authorities, said he'll try to release more information about the case next week.

Democrat Patrick Leahy, who heads the Senate judiciary committee, told Gonzales that officials knew "damn well" Arar would be tortured when they deported him to Syria and Canadians are "justifiably upset" about a matter that's "beneath the dignity" of the U.S.

He also wanted to know why Arar remains on the U.S. security watch list despite being exonerated of any terrorist link

"This country has not said anything at all, that we made a mistake or had an apology," said Leahy.

"Why is he on a government watch list if he's been found completely innocent by this Canadian commission, which actually had the information from us?"

According to Canada's Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day, there's no reason at all.

Day, in town for meetings on security matters, said Canadians have finally seen the Arar file that American authorities refused to share until now and there's "nothing new" to suggest he's a safety risk.

"Our officials recently have looked at all the U.S. information and that does not change our position," said Day, who met with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

"We are still maintaining that he should not be on that fly list."

For his part, Gonzales promised a briefing for senators and said he hoped to release the information publicly.

DOJ_NMG_0118589

Leahy, who's from Vermont and has an extensive interest in Canadian issues, called rendition cases like Arar's - where a foreign terror suspect is sent to a third country to be tortured - a "black mark" on the country.

And he scoffed at the notion that American officials sought assurances from Syria that Arar wouldn't be tortured.

"We knew damn well, if he went to Canada, he wouldn't be tortured. He'd be held. He'd be investigated," said Leahy.

"We also knew damn well, if he went to Syria, he'd be tortured. And it's beneath the dignity of this country, a country that has always been a beacon of human rights."

It's easy, said Leahy, "for us to sit here comfortably in this room knowing that we're not going to be sent off to another country to be tortured."

Gonzales, who noted that Arar is still suing U.S. officials, said he's willing to answer the committee's questions but suggested he needed to consult with the White House.

"I think we can say a lot more about it, if you just simply give me some additional time," he said.

"In fact, we may be able to publicly say more about this shortly."

Leahy said he'd wait a week for a briefing from Gonzales.

"If we don't get it, I guarantee you there will be another hearing on this issue.

"Canadians have been our closest allies . . . They're justifiably upset. They're wondering what's happened to us.

"I'm somewhat upset," Leahy noted.

"Yes, sir, I can tell," Gonzales replied. "But before you get more upset, perhaps you should wait to receive the briefing."

The tough stand on Arar is a sign of new era on Capitol Hill, where Democrats are now in control and present more challenges for President George W. Bush on all sorts of security issues.

The administration agreed this week to disband a contentious warrantless surveillance program and replace it with one that will be overseen by the secret court that governs clandestine spying in the U.S..

Arar, a Syrian-born Canadian, was seized at a New York City airport in 2002 and sent to Syria, where he was held for more than a year and tortured into making false confessions of terrorist involvement.

Canada's public inquiry concluded RCMP gave U.S. authorities misleading information about Arar before he was deported.

The Americans have maintained they have their own data that justifies keeping him on the watch list.

Last month, Secretary of State Condoleezza said she asked Chertoff and the Justice Department to investigate why the Canadian engineer still can't enter the United States or even fly over U.S. air space.

But Chertoff refused to comment on the case, citing privacy rules and even suggesting it's a hypothetical issue.

"This becomes a relevant issue only if and when somebody presents themselves to come into the U.S.," he said.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper has expressed frustation about the case, saying he suspects it's a matter of bureaucrats refusing to admit an error.

The U.S. didn't tell Canada that Arar was being sent to Syria.

Harper demanded an apology from the U.S. but had to settle last fall for a promise to collaborate with Canada on any future deportation cases.

An About-face On Warrantless Wiretaps (SCRIPPS)

By Dale McFeatters, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard, January 19, 2007

After a year spent fighting it, the Bush administration has made an abrupt about-face and put its wiretap program under the jurisdiction of a secret court, which many believe the law requires anyway.

The concession does not constitute a White House change of heart in its sweeping assertions of executive power, but rather a move to head off challenges to its warrantless eavesdropping in the courts and Congress that it seemed destined to lose. By folding now, the president retains the prerogative of reasserting the power later.

The Justice Department had already lost a challenge at the district court level and will now seek to have the case declared moot. The then-Republican Congress refused to ratify the program last year when its existence became known, and the Democrats might well have overturned it legislatively.

In essence, the administration said it would comply with the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and seek warrants from the secret panel of federal judges for its monitoring of phone calls and e-mails to and from the United States, a process that it had insisted before was too slow and too cumbersome.

Without those warrants, there is no guarantee to privacy other than the administration's word for it. President Bush waived the warrant requirement shortly after 9/11 in a secret order that didn't become public knowledge until December 2005.

Still, questions remain about what the new compliance, under what the Justice Department says is an "innovative" arrangement with the FISA court, really means. Must the National Security Agency seek individual warrants, or does the administration feel that blanket warrants are acceptable? Or does it believe a simple court approval of the program as a whole is OK? These are fair questions for the House and Senate Intelligence and Judiciary committees to put to the administration.

The Bush administration has been forced to scale back from a number of its assertions of unbridled presidential power _ detention without trial, military commissions, torture, secret prisons _ but that is hardly a wholesale embrace of civil liberties, due process and personal privacy.

The Administration That Cried Wolf On Spying (LAT)

THE BUSH administration's abrupt acknowledgment that it can, after all, track suspected terrorists without shredding the privacy rights of Americans inspires mixed reactions — relief that the rule of law has triumphed, suspicion that the administration's concession isn't all that it's cracked up to be and, most of all, anger at the president and his surrogates for suggesting that any criticism of their tactics was tantamount to treason.

After the New York Times revealed in December 2005 that the National Security Agency had been eavesdropping on Americans without the court order required by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, the administration insisted that the privacy protections of FISA — about which it had raised no public alarm — had been rendered obsolete by the war on terror.

In the middle of the uproar that followed the disclosure of the program, Bush vowed, "I'll continue to reauthorize this program for so long as our country faces a continuing threat from Al Qaeda and related groups."

The threat remains. But this week Bush said, essentially, "Never mind." As a federal appeals court prepared to hear arguments on the legality of the program, Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee that the administration has determined that it can obtain court orders for surveillance with the "speed and agility" necessary to detect terrorist conspiracies.

"Accordingly," Gonzales deadpanned, "under these circumstances, the president has determined not to reauthorize the Terrorist Surveillance Program when the current [presidential] authorization expires."

A similar "never mind" letter was dispatched to the clerk of the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals, which has agreed to review a federal district judge's finding that the program violated FISA and the Constitution.

The Bush administration is now conceding what this page and many members of Congress have argued for months: The Terrorist Surveillance Program can be conducted consistent with FISA protections. Sens. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) co-sponsored a bill that would reaffirm the authority of FISA while increasing the emergency period in which investigators could conduct electronic surveillance without a court order.

Such legislation can be shelved if the administration truly has seen the light — but has it? Or is it now operating under a sort of FISA Lite?

In a background briefing for reporters, a Justice Department official refused to be pinned down on whether the administration is now asking the FISA court for authorization to monitor each individual suspect or whether there is a broader grant of authority.

This is unacceptable. The agreement by which the FISA court assumed jurisdiction over the program should be shared with Congress and (if it doesn't disclose sensitive operational details) with the public. And there would be nothing mean-spirited about a congressional inquiry into why the administration didn't involve the FISA court when it began this program in 2002.

The public has a right to know in general terms whether and how their privacy is protected by judicial review. Or, as a Justice Department official put it this week, "There's obviously an advantage to having all three branches involved." Too bad that civic books lesson dawned on the administration only after it had demonized its critics for making the same point.

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

The Iraq War has been hurting President Bush's poll ratings for a couple of years now. But keeping him from political free fall is the fact that the United States has suffered no terrorist attacks since 2001, and the widespread belief that White House policy might have something to do with it. So count us baffled by Mr. Bush's surrender Wednesday on warrantless wiretapping authority that even the Carter Administration believed was well within the Constitutional power of the executive branch.

The recent al Qaeda wiretaps at issue provoked little public outrage, after all. Most Americans outside partisan media circles or libertarian think tanks understand what's at stake. Although Congress whined about not getting enough information about the program -- it always does -- it didn't dare try to shut it down either.

But now, and for reasons that seem shortsightedly political, the Justice Department has announced that future domestic surveillance of al Qaeda would be conducted within the confines of a 1978 law called the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. No Administration and no serious court has ever recognized FISA as a binding limit on Presidential authority.

We don't know the details of the deal the Administration says it struck with the special court that grants FISA warrants. But even an eased and expedited process is likely to prove an unnecessary impediment to meeting U.S. intelligence needs. FISA is a Cold War-era law that was written primarily to enable surveillance of suspected Soviet bloc spies operating out of embassies. It is ill-suited to the realities of today's fast moving antiterror battlefield.

In particular, FISA warrants require that the government show that an intended subject of surveillance is an "agent" of a foreign power. Which raises the important question of what happens the next time we pick up an al Qaeda bigwig with a list of U.S. cell phone numbers on him? Are those numbers to go unmonitored because they don't fit FISA's "agent" paradigm and we can't know in advance to whom they're attached? Or what about known individuals who are not al Qaeda "agents" but active sympathizers? Are they out of bounds? The Administration has some explaining to do -- not least to its own officials who spent months saying FISA warrants were dangerously restrictive.

All the more so because the legality of the warrantless wiretaps was not really in question. There is all the difference in the world between wiretaps for criminal surveillance and prosecution and wiretaps for gathering intelligence on our enemies. Just as the President doesn't need a warrant to listen to enemy communications on a foreign battlefield such as Iraq, he doesn't need one simply because one end of an enemy communication happens to take place in the U.S.

That's why Carter Attorney General Griffin Bell made a point of emphasizing when FISA was passed that the law "does not take away the power of the President under the Constitution." And it's why the FISA appeals court itself wrote in 2002 that it and "all the other courts to have decided the issue" believe the President has "inherent authority to conduct warrantless searches to obtain foreign intelligence information."

As for the possibility that Presidents might abuse that power, federal judge Laurence Silberman has argued that fear of exposure is an even stronger disincentive than legal constraint. By contrast, he noted, "there is no self-correcting mechanism" to remedy abuses of power by politically unaccountable judges. This gets to the fundamental problem with FISA, which is that it replaces an elected official with a judge on intelligence gathering matters that may have life or death implications. In other words, it's FISA, not warrantless wiretapping, that is arguably unconstitutional.

The Bush Administration's decision to accede to this Congressional and judicial power grab is all the more shocking given recent history. Remember the 9/11 Commission and all the talk about "the wall"? Well, that intelligence-sharing barrier was a product of executive branch attempts to deal with the demands of the FISA court. It's almost certain this new attempt to operate through FISA will lead to the production of nonsensical guidelines of its own. For the most part we'll never know what valuable information is lost as a result. * * *

The White House may think this FISA concession will allow it to escape more onerous legislative restrictions. But Congress may now merely take this concession and codify it anyway. If Democrats wanted to fight him over wiretapping, Mr. Bush should have relished the prospect given that he had the law and the public on his side. Instead, he's offered to dilute executive powers in a way that will damage the antiterror efforts of his own Administration, as well as those of his successors.

Editorial: TSP, R.I.P.: Bush Surrenders Credibility (MANUL)

Manchester (NH) Union Leader, January 19, 2007

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales would have Americans believe that, after years of asserting that national security depended upon the administration's ability to tap terror suspects' phone lines without waiting for the slow Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to OK the spying, the court suddenly became capable of instantly approving such wiretaps the very same week Democrats took control of Congress.

Is the administration trying to lose its last remaining shreds of credibility?

In a letter to Sens. Patrick Leahy and Arlen Specter, Gonzales asserted that on Jan. 10 a FISA judge issued an order authorizing the government to intercept the international communications of anyone suspected of being "a member or agent of al-Qaida or an associated terrorist organization." As a result, the administration will not renew the Terrorist Surveillance Program, up for reauthorization in a month and a half, which allowed it to intercept the communications of terror suspects without a court warrant.

What about terror suspects who are not members or agents of terrorist organizations associated with al-Qaida? What about the President's constitutional authority, which Gonzales had asserted for so long, to spy on terror suspects without a direct court order?

The administration is backing out of a program and a constitutional argument it previously labeled essential to national security. It is doing so in such a way as to make its previous assertions appear entirely disingenuous.

More than the WMD claims, more than the "Mission Accomplished" banner, more than anything else in the past six years, this change of course undermines the President's credibility and authority. Retreating from a program that until now he has claimed was absolutely essential to stopping terrorist attacks on U.S. soil is either an inexcusable dereliction of duty, or a tacit admission that his previous claim was utter baloney.

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, January 19, 2007

That sound you don't hear is one hand clapping. The Bush administration has surprisingly reversed itself on its anti-terrorism policy of eavesdropping on Americans without warrants, something that certainly deserves support and praise. But it would be unwise to get carried away.

After all, this is the reversal of a policy that never should have been adopted in the first place. While Americans certainly want their government to root out terrorists and while they understand that tapping phone calls and e-mails to and from the United States may be necessary in some cases, many don't want such surveillance to be done without regard to the law.

This high disdain for legal procedures in the pursuit of warrantless surveillance has been going on for years, and it has been as shocking as it has been unnecessary. The nation lost much on 9/11 and it does not have to junk its traditional civil-liberty protections to achieve security, or so many Americans believe.

Unfortunately, the Bush administration is not among the believers. After the attacks in 2001, the executive branch asserted a theory of executive ascendancy that, in the name of fighting the war on terror, was bolder and more far-reaching than any of its recent predecessors. The presidency has become something of an imperial institution that recognizes no restraints on its power.

The examples are numerous, ranging from the more than 800 presidential signing statements that seek to override the plain intent of legislation passed by Congress to the arrest of a U.S. citizen on American soil and his detention for years without any contact with counsel in flagrant disregard of the Constitution.

The clandestine spying on Americans was all of a piece with this reckless behavior. But a procedure always existed to do legally what the administration was doing extra-legally -- a secret court that oversees the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, and which is empowered to approve wiretaps and searches.

Yet the administration couldn't even abide this formality. Although suggestions were made that the court could not act quickly enough in urgent cases, the administration did not attempt to change the law -- it just blew it off because it felt it could.

Now supposedly an arrangement has been worked out that allows the court to oversee the National Security Agency's spying program "with the speed and agility necessary to protect the nation from al-Qaida," as Attorney General Alberto Gonzales put it. Why this couldn't be done years ago and is happening now is not hard to guess: Congress is in the hands of the Democrats.

The details of the new program are murky and it must be taken on faith that this is progress -- a very big leap of faith indeed, given recent history. The administration, of course, does not concede that it did anything wrong. In other words, use the hand that's not clapping to cross your fingers.

The Justice Department Submits To The Law (OREG)

The Oregonian

The Oregonian, January 19, 2007

The attorney general says the agency won't wiretap without a warrant any longer

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Thursday told members of the Senate Judiciary Committee that, at the Department of Justice, "every day is Sept. 12."

Would that it were so.

That day 64 months ago is worth remembering. It was a day of sorrow. Of mourning. Of unity. Of resolve. It was the day after congressional Republicans and Democrats stood together on the steps of the Capitol and sang "God Bless America."

It was also a day when the laws governing Justice Department activities were still respected. Americans still believed, for example, that the Justice Department still complied with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. It was years before the public would learn that the department had electronically eavesdropped on people suspected of links to terrorism without seeking the legally required approval from a secret federal court.

That seems like a long time ago now. On a Thursday when the committee chairman shouted at Gonzales and the attorney general responded with characteristic dismissiveness, the Justice Department let it be known that it had decided to resume complying with the law that governs wiretapping. Investigators would conduct such surveillance under the authority of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, as critics had demanded, Gonzales said.

Would the Justice Department have belatedly embraced the law if a federal court had not already determined that warrantless wiretapping was unconstitutional? Would it have embraced the law if the nation hadn't turned against the strategy and tactics of the Bush administration's war on terror? Would it have embraced the law if Democrats had not taken control of both houses of Congress?

There's no way to know. But the friction that developed between the White House and Congress -- and between the White House and the majority of the public -- is rooted in the different views each took after the attacks of Sept. 11. Gonzales' predecessor, John Ashcroft, set the tone for the subsequent debate when he spoke to the same committee in December 2001. He told senators, in part: "To those who scare peace-loving people with phantoms of lost liberty; my message is this: Your tactics only aid terrorists."

He was wrong, but those in the White House believed he was right. And that belief justified the administration's end-justifies-the-means approach to stopping terrorism.

Balance is returning to the struggle, it now appears. The Justice Department is acknowledging now that, contrary to earlier assertions, it won't be too burdensome to get approval from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court when it wants to eavesdrop. In fact, Gonzales said Thursday, the program allows "the necessary speed and agility the government needs to protect our nation from the terrorist threat."

The threat is real, as we knew well on Sept. 12. And as we know now, lost liberty is no phantom.

Sense On Intelligence (NSL)

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), January 19, 2007

When a federal judge ruled last summer against President Bush's claim that he had full authority to order wiretaps of Americans' international phone calls and e-mails, he scolded her for not understanding "the nature of the world in which we live."

With his abrupt turnaround on domestic surveillance, the president seems to be starting to acknowledge that he is the one who has been out of touch. The White House has also been forced to back down on its assertion of executive power when it comes to detainees at Guantánamo and CIA secret prisons.

While judicial and legislative pushback has been a necessary corrective to the abuse of presidential authority, it will be impor tant for Congress to move carefully to craft a way forward that allows for appropriate measures for intelligence gathering without inappropriate assaults on civil liberties.

In advance of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' appearance yesterday in front of the Senate Judiciary Committee, the White House said it will now seek warrants from the court set up by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, to monitor communications to and from anyone thought to be "a member or agent of al Qaeda or an associated terrorist organization."

That's a fine gesture, but it might not be a genuine concession to the need for legislative or judicial oversight. Because the new warrant process is secret, no one knows exactly what kind of deal the Justice Department has made with the FISA court. Justice Department officials haven't explained, for example, how targets will be chosen or said whether the department has agreed to a new set of standards for determining how approval will be given.

Congress will need to press harder to curb the White House's impulses toward secrecy. But Democrats, who are now the majority on the Hill, must be careful not to abridge executive power to the point of crippling the presidency, as Congress did in the wake of the Vietnam War. The Bush administration is not wrong that times of threat can require a president to assert unique authority. One of the many failures of the Bush administration is that it has so abused that authority as to jeopardize it entirely.

Posada Ally Surrenders Arms Cache (MIH)

By Jay Weaver

Miami Herald, January 19, 2007

An ally of Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles turned over a stockpile of illegal machine guns, dynamite and a grenade launcher to federal agents this week in a bid to reduce his prison sentence, several sources familiar with the arms surrender said.

Santiago Alvarez, a wealthy Miami developer convicted last fall on a weapons-conspiracy charge, arranged for the turnover of the new cache of firearms on Wednesday at his attorney's office in downtown Miami, sources said.

Alvarez and convicted co-defendant Osvaldo Mitat are seeking to reduce their respective four- and three-year prison sentences by one or more years. The unusual arms surrender has no connection to Posada's latest troubles with federal authorities.

The Alvarez stash consisted of dozens of machine guns, rifles, C-4 explosive, dynamite, detonators, a grenade launcher and ammunition, sources said. The cache was considerably larger than the nine illegal firearms seized by federal agents in late 2005 when Alvarez and Mitat were first indicted on weapons charges in Broward County.

Agents for the FBI and Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives collected the latest stash of weapons at the Miami law office of Silvia Piñera-Vazquez and Sofia Powell-Cosio. The lawyers were granted temporary immunity to surrender the firearms to federal authorities on behalf of their clients, Alvarez and Mitat. Piñera-Vazquez, who declined to comment for this article, personally delivered a letter to the U.S. attorney's office on Tuesday detailing the proposed weapons turnover.

The voluntary surrender was designed to take the firearms off the street and boost the defendants' chances of reducing their sentences.

Alvarez, 65, has been in federal custody since November 2005, as has Mitat, 64, a handyman who worked for him. To obtain reductions of their sentences, they must prove to prosecutors they have provided enough "substantial assistance." Prosecutors would have to file the request in federal court.

Defense attorneys for Alvarez and Mitat have said their clients never had any designs to carry out an attack against the U.S. government. They say the men's goal was always to topple Cuban leader Fidel Castro.

PIPE BOMB FOUND

The weapons turnover occurred just days after an FBI informant -- who has informed on Posada, Alvarez and Mitat -- reported that he discovered a pipe bomb under his pickup truck in Hialeah on Sunday. Miami-Dade police officers detonated the device at the Hialeah police station. They found wires and gun shells among the bomb scraps. The FBI launched a probe but declined to comment.

Attorneys for Alvarez, Mitat and Posada said their clients -- all in federal custody in Texas -- were not involved in the pipe-bomb incident. They expressed serious doubts about the credibility of the informant, Gilberto Abascal, whom they have characterized as a "double agent" for the FBI and for Castro's government.

Lawyers for Alvarez and Mitat have been negotiating with the U.S. attorney's office since their sentencings in November to turn over the new weapons cache, sources familiar with the case told The Miami Herald.

COMMON THREADS

Intrigue surrounding the weapons surrender could not be greater. Last September, Abascal was the main federal witness who helped convict Alvarez and Mitat on weapons-conspiracy charges in South Florida. Abascal was also the primary witness in last week's federal indictment of former CIA operative Posada on fraud offenses.

A federal grand jury in El Paso, Texas, charged Posada, 78, with lying about how he sneaked into the United States in March 2005.

The same grand jury also charged Alvarez and Mitat with contempt of court for refusing to testify about Posada's entry into the country. Three other associates have been charged with contempt in the case.

Posada has long maintained that he entered the United States by crossing the Mexican border with the assistance of a migrant smuggler, not by sea -- as prosecutors now allege.

Abascal said Posada entered the country on a shrimping boat called Santrina, which was manned by Alvarez, Mitat and others, including the informant himself. Abascal said the Santrina crew picked up Posada on the Mexican island of Isla Mujeres and transported him to the United States.

By charging Posada, the Justice Department signaled its willingness to target a man who has been in investigators' cross hairs since 1997, when he first was suspected of masterminding a series of deadly tourist-site bombings in Cuba.

Federal agents began zeroing in on Alvarez in May 2005 when he helped Posada emerge from hiding before his arrest for entering the country illegally. That November, Alvarez and Mitat were charged with stashing machine guns, a silencer and a grenade launcher in a Lauderhill apartment complex that belonged to Alvarez.

The defendants' attorneys claimed Abascal, who called federal agents on the way from Broward County to Miami-Dade, set up his former friends.

Although prosecutors never accused the two men of planning to use those firearms in an attack against the Cuban government, they intended to introduce evidence at trial that showed Alvarez had financed a failed 2001 incursion against Castro, among other paramilitary activities. Plea deals came on the eve of trial.

Court records also show that federal and Bahamian authorities recovered a large cache of weapons and explosives hidden on Guinchos Cay in August 2005 -- ``an operation conducted after agents learned that Alvarez was storing and maintaining this arsenal."

U.S. To Store Detainees' DNA (AZREP)

Kyl, Arpaio push collecting from terror suspects, illegal immigrants

WASHINGTON - The Justice Department is planning to add DNA from undocumented immigrants, suspected terrorists and other detainees to the FBI's national crime database, a move pushed by Arizona GOP Sen. Jon Kyl and Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio.

The federal database now only includes the DNA of felons and some misdemeanor offenders. The new plan would add the DNA of individuals who may never be convicted of a crime.

"The (Department of Justice) is engaged in extensive consultation with affected agencies and is moving forward to issue the implementing regulations," department spokesman Erick Ablin confirmed Thursday.

advertisement

Proponents say the move will help to solve more crimes.

Opponents call it a mistake.

"People will end up in this database even without probable cause for their arrest or detention," said Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a public interest group in Washington, D.C.

It could be more than a year before the Justice Department plan is finalized to collect DNA from tens of thousands of immigration violators, terrorism suspects and others accused but not convicted of federal offenses.

A draft proposal is only now circulating internally within the Justice Department and its agencies. The plan also must be sent to other affected agencies outside of the Justice Department, and to the White House Office of Management and Budget. Officials would not release a copy of that draft.

It already has been a year since President Bush signed the bill expanding the federal DNA collection program to include non-U.S. citizens and those arrested or detained. The authorization was included in an amendment sponsored by Kyl to the 2005 reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act. Authorities have been working on legal language and details since then.

Depending on how broadly the final rule is written, it could affect a range of departments and agencies, from the FBI, Homeland Security Department and Drug Enforcement Administration, to the National Park Service.

"Sen. Kyl appreciates that the implementation of the regulations raises a host of complex issues and that it will take time to resolve those issues before the regulations can fully move forward," Kyl spokesman Ryan Patmintra said in a statement this week.

"Given the complexity of these issues, the amount of time that has been devoted to resolving them does not appear unusual," Patmintra said.

Opponents said the expanded program should concern everyone because it could affect everyone.

Someone selected for a secondary screening at an airport is, technically, being detained and could be required to provide a DNA sample, said Tim Sparapani, legislative counsel for the national office of the American Civil Liberties Union.

So could someone selected for inspection while crossing the border, or those detained as material witnesses to a crime.

"All of these situations can have innocent people's DNA entered into the database," Sparapani said.

But Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio, who pushed for the expanded program, said it will be a strong law-enforcement tool.

"I'm all for it - it makes sense - you never know who these guys are," Arpaio said of taking DNA samples from arrestees and detainees and not just those who are convicted felons. "It's about time."

A majority of states, including Arizona, have also been collecting DNA samples from convicted felons. Some have since expanded that to include detainees. But Tim Mason, a spokesman for the Department of Public Safety, said Thursday that DNA is not being obtained from pretrial detainees. The department became the DNA data center for all state enforcement agencies years ago at the request of FBI, and its data is part of the FBI's Combined DNA Index System, known as CODIS.

Law enforcement agencies in Arizona get DNA samples for several reasons, such as:

• Court-ordered samples: Under state law, every felon sentenced to prison must provide DNA.

• Case file evidence: Whenever detectives work cases and find relevant DNA for testing, the sample is entered into the system.

• Miscellaneous: DNA may be entered for various other reasons. For instance, a person is reported missing and family members submit DNA so that, if a corpse is found, investigators will be able to identify the body. Also, if DNA is obtained from a criminal suspect under court order, that specimen goes into the system.

Mason said access to the information is "very controlled" and limited to authorized law enforcement purposes.

When the Senate passed his amendment in October 2005, Kyl noted the technological ability to run crime-scene fingerprints through a national database has become a critical tool for law enforcement.

"We now have the technology to use DNA even more effectively than fingerprints. Failure to take advantage of it would make no sense," Kyl said.

But already, the government has access to more than 3.5 million DNA records, and that the number is expanding dramatically, said Marc Rotenberg, Executive Director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a public interest group in Washington, D.C.

Some also warn that the larger the DNA database gets, the greater the chance of finding two samples that look the same but are not from the same person.

"When you have a database filled with people presumed to be criminal and add people simply for all kinds of non-criminal reasons and mistakes, you've diluted your database and mistakes can be made," Sparapani said.

Roberto Reveles, president of the Phoenix-based immigrant rights group, Somos America, said the DNA database expansion shows that "Big Brother is going really fast." He said the tactic represents a violation of privacy and he hopes conservative Americans will join in "making the loudest protests against this."

Detainee DNA May Be Put In Database (USAT)

By Richard Willing, Usa Today

USA Today, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — The federal government could add DNA from tens of thousands of immigration violators, captives in the war on terrorism and others accused but not convicted of federal offenses to the FBI's crime-fighting database under a plan being finalized by the Justice Department.

Erik Ablin, a Justice Department spokesman, confirmed the plan, which hasn't been publicly disclosed, and said details are expected to be completed soon.

Proponents of the plan, including U.S. Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., and Maricopa County, Ariz., Sheriff Joe Arpaio, say taking DNA from federal detainees would solve many crimes committed by illegal immigrants and make it easier to identify and track potential terrorists.

Opponents, such as Caroline Fredrickson, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington office, say such mass seizures of DNA violate privacy and do little to improve law enforcement.

Fredrickson says the law that defines federal detainees is so broad that it could apply to hikers stopped by park rangers or airline passengers selected for screening. Authorization for taking the DNA was included in a bill reauthorizing the Violence Against Women Act that President Bush signed last year.

The DNA samples, which contain an individual's unique genetic code, would be compared against genetic profiles from 3.9 million criminals and 157,000 unsolved crimes held by the system of federal and state DNA databases that the FBI administers. The FBI says its system has aided more than 41,000 criminal investigations since 1990.

DNA from federal arrestees and detainees would be held on a computer index, enabling law enforcement to track illegal immigrants who return after being expelled from the USA or who commit crimes after being released. War-on-terrorism detainees, who often use aliases, could be positively identified by DNA and linked to evidence seized at suspected terrorist sites.

"We know from real-life examples that a database of arrestees can prevent many future offenses," Kyl said in a statement.

The plan would greatly increase the pool of DNA profiles available to law enforcement. In most states, a person must be convicted of a crime before his DNA is added to the national system, which the FBI calls CODIS. In seven states, DNA can be taken from suspects after they are arrested and formally charged.

The new plan would apply to "any person arrested under federal authority and from any non-U.S. person who is detained," according to the Violence Against Women law. Each year, the greatest number of those are illegal immigrants caught at the border or rounded up after entering the country.

DNA from immigration violators would remain on file permanently. Genetic profiles from people arrested for federal crimes could be removed from the database if they are not convicted.

Law enforcement authorities say illegal immigrants commit crimes out of proportion to their numbers. A Justice Department study of 100 illegal immigrants arrested and released by local authorities in 2004 found that 73 were later rearrested. "To me, it's a no-brainer," Arpaio says. "Regardless of how you feel (about illegal immigration), nobody wants criminals to get a free pass to come in here." Fredrickson says collecting DNA from anyone detained by a federal officer would clog the system to "where it becomes useless."

Pentagon Sets Rules For Detainee Trials (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, January 19, 2007

The Pentagon set rules Thursday for detainee trials that could allow terror suspects to be convicted and perhaps executed using hearsay testimony and coerced statements, setting up a new clash between President Bush and Congress.

The rules are fair, said the Pentagon, which released them in a manual for the expected trials. Democrats controlling Congress said they would hold hearings and revive legislation on the plan, and human rights organizations complained that the regulations would allow evidence that would not be tolerated in civilian or military courtrooms.

According to the 238-page manual, a detainee's lawyer could not reveal classified evidence in the person's defense until the government had a chance to review it. Suspects would be allowed to view summaries of classified evidence, not the material itself.

The new regulations lack some protections used in civilian and military courtrooms, such as against coerced or hearsay evidence. They are intended to track a law passed last fall by Congress restoring Bush's plans to have special military commissions try terror-war prisoners. Those commissions had been struck down earlier in the year by the Supreme Court.

At a Pentagon briefing, Dan Dell'Orto, deputy to the Defense Department's top counsel, said the new rules will "afford all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized people."

In an interview, Brig. Gen. Thomas Hemingway, legal adviser to the Pentagon's office on commissions, said he doubted that most cases would rely solely on coercive or hearsay evidence.

"These case are pretty complex and it's not going to sink or swim, I don't believe, on a single statement," he said.

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said he planned to scrutinize the manual to ensure that it does not "run afoul" of the Constitution.

"No civilized nation permits convictions to rest on coerced evidence, and reliance on such evidence has never been acceptable in military or civilian courts in this country," said Elisa Massimino, Washington director of Human Rights First.

Officials think that with the evidence they have now, they could eventually charge 60 to 80 detainees, said Hemingway said. The Defense Department is currently planning trials for at least 10.

There are almost 400 people suspected of ties to al-Qaida and the Taliban being held at the military's prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. About 380 others have been released since the facility was opened five years ago.

Last September, Congress — then led by Republicans — sent Bush a new law granting wide latitude in interrogating and detaining captured enemy combatants. The legislation prohibited some abuses of detainees, including mutilation and rape, but granted the president leeway to decide which interrogation techniques were permissible.

In outlining the maximum punishment for various acts, the new manual includes the death penalty for people convicted of spying or taking part in a "conspiracy or joint enterprise" that kills someone. The maximum penalty for aiding the enemy — such as providing ammunition or money — is lifetime imprisonment.

As required by law, the manual prohibits the use of statements obtained through torture and "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment" as prohibited by the Constitution. But it allows some evidence obtained through coercive interrogation techniques if obtained before Dec. 30, 2005, and deemed reliable by a judge.

The Detainee Treatment Act, separate legislation championed in 2005 by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., prohibited the use of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of military and CIA prisoners.

Congress and the White House agreed last year that hearsay — a witness quoting someone else — can be allowed as evidence if a judge rules the testimony is reliable. According to the manual, this is necessary because witnesses — such as military personnel or foreigners — may not be available to testify.

The Pentagon's Dell'Orto said that since both sides of the case can admit hearsay evidence, that "levels the playing field."

Under the rules, the accused will be allowed to know about all evidence that is provided in the trial, Dell'Orto said. They will not be allowed to see classified material, but will be given an unclassified summary or substitute, with the judge first determining whether the summary sufficiently represents the classified material.

"When you're in the middle of a war against this enemy, you need to be particularly concerned about the disclosure of that evidence," Dell'Orto said of classified materials.

Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., said he believes the Pentagon's top lawyers assigned to defend detainees were excluded from the preparation and review of the manual. Last fall, critics of Bush's plan for military commissions charged that the administration ignored the advice of uniformed legal experts.

Dodd, a presidential candidate, said he will introduce a bill addressing flaws in the manual "that are impediments to the effective and credible prosecution of suspected terrorists."

The document was hailed by Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, top Republican on the House Armed Services, who said, "Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind behind the 9/11 attacks, and his cohorts are a step closer to trial."

Pentagon Releases Rules For Trials Of Terrorism Suspects (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

The Defense Department yesterday released its detailed rules for military trials of terrorism suspects, a move that reignited last year's controversy over a joint decision by the Bush administration and the Republican-led Congress to restrict key detainee rights during such trials.

The 238-page manual, issued after a three-month drafting effort, closely tracks the Military Commissions Act, approved mostly by Republicans in September. It incorporates controversial rules blocking a detainee's right to challenge his or her detention and allowing prosecutors to use hearsay information or coerced evidence if a military judge rules that it is reliable and relevant.

The manual is meant to prescribe how military commissions will try some of the roughly 395 prisoners now detained at the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Officials predicted yesterday that 60 to 80 will face the commissions.

Under last year's legislation, the manual's procedures could also be applied to foreign nationals in the United States designated as "enemy combatants" under a controversially broad definition of that term.

In releasing the manual, Daniel J. Dell'Orto, the Pentagon's principal deputy general counsel, disclosed that the new military commissions are to be overseen by Susan J. Crawford, who served in the late 1980s as Army counsel and Defense Department inspector general, under then-Defense Secretary Richard B. Cheney. She is currently a senior judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.

Crawford will have the authority to select judges for the commissions, send charges to trial and act on commission findings or verdicts, Pentagon officials said.

Although Dell'Orto said the manual was drafted to ensure fairness and to hew closely to what Congress ordered, human rights groups and other critics faulted the rules for not fixing what they consider to be defects or loopholes in last year's legislation. The critics said the manual will give new impetus to their drive to get the law amended in the new Congress, controlled by Democrats.

Several such efforts are already underway. Early this month, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and the panel's ranking Republican, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), introduced legislation to overturn last year's narrow vote denying detainees the right to challenge their detention through habeas corpus proceedings.

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) said yesterday that he is drafting a bill with Leahy and Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) to change what Dodd called the manual's unwarranted "limits on the independence of military judges," inadequate safeguards against the use of coerced evidence and limits on defense lawyers' access to witnesses and evidence.

The outcome of this debate will affect the adjudication of allegations against some of the longest-held and most well-known terrorism suspects -- including 14 people transferred to Guantanamo Bay last year from secret CIA prisons.

The Bush administration has sought maximum flexibility in its use of evidence, allowing, for example, the use of information obtained from cruel, unusual or inhumane interrogations before 2005, when many of those in CIA custody were questioned. Human rights groups and many Democrats say, however, that it will mean more to the public if convictions are secured using procedures that fully comply with international legal standards.

Dell'Orto, speaking at a Pentagon news conference, said the new manual enforces a presumption of innocence, includes a requirement that defendants be allowed to see all the evidence used against them, safeguards defendants against self-incrimination and prohibits evidence obtained through torture.

Comments on the new manual were solicited only from the Justice Department and other executive branch agencies, Dell'Orto said yesterday, provoking complaints from several military-justice experts that the rules should have been subjected to a period of public comment. "This was the antithesis of a transparent rulemaking process, and it was completely unnecessary," said Eugene R. Fidell, president of the nonprofit National Institute of Military Justice.

Tom Malinowski, Washington advocacy director for Human Rights Watch, said he faults the manual for not requiring a presiding judge to tell a defendant or his attorney whether critical evidence was obtained from coerced confessions.

Marine Col. Dwight Sullivan, the chief defense counsel of the Pentagon's Office of Military Commissions, similarly said that the rules "would allow an extremely unfair trial" and are a "recipe for laundering" uncorroborated evidence derived from extreme coercion.

Sullivan said they even leave open the possibility of someone being sentenced to death without knowing that he had been convicted based on coerced evidence and without having the chance to contest the evidence on that ground. A Pentagon spokesman, Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey Gordon, said such an outcome is improbable.

Pentagon Revises Its Rules On Prosecution Of Terrorists (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — The Pentagon on Thursday unveiled its new courtroom rules for prosecuting prisoners held as terrorists, allowing military tribunals to consider hearsay evidence and testimony obtained through coercion, but not torture.

Pentagon officials said, however, that the new policy more closely resembled courts-martial governed by the Uniform Code of Military Justice than the previous procedures used to prosecute terrorist suspects.

Under legislation signed into law last year, the government is poised to restart tribunals that the Supreme Court halted last summer. Pentagon officials said military prosecutors had determined there was sufficient evidence to bring war crimes charges against 60 to 80 of the 395 prisoners detained at the military prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

The Pentagon detailed the new procedures in a 238-page manual released Thursday.

The new procedures follow the guidelines Congress set down in the Military Commissions Act late last year.

Representative Ike Skelton, the Missouri Democrat who became chairman of the House Armed Services Committee this month when control of the House changed hands, pledged to scrutinize the new procedures so that they did not “run afoul” of the Constitution.

The new manual explicitly forbids military prosecutors from using evidence obtained through torture. At the same time, it makes a distinction between torture and coercion, allowing testimony that came as the result of coercive techniques used by military and intelligence officials until late 2005, when Congress passed a law banning cruel and inhumane treatment of prisoners.

In order for coerced testimony to be used in military commissions, a military judge would have to determine that it was both reliable and relevant to the case. The matter is particularly important because the Pentagon is planning for the trials of 14 “high value” detainees, who until they were moved to Guantánamo Bay in September were kept elsewhere in secret prisons run by the Central Intelligence Agency.

The prisoners detained at those sites, including Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the accused mastermind of the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, are believed to have been subjected to particularly harsh interrogation methods like “water boarding,” which induces a feeling of drowning.

Daniel J. Dell’Orto, the Pentagon’s principal deputy general counsel, told reporters on Thursday that the new procedures followed the guidelines of the Military Commissions Act and ensured that detainees receive, as called for by international law, “all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized people.”

Pentagon officials said that none of the most significant prisoners would be among the first group to stand trial before the military commissions.

"Those cases are going to have to be developed carefully, and it's going to take some time, because they are extraordinarily complex," said Brig. Gen. Thomas L. Hemingway, a Pentagon official who helped draft the new guidelines.

The Bush administration established the military commissions in the months after the Sept. 11 attacks to prosecute "unlawful combatants" captured during counterterrorism operations around the globe, many of them in Afghanistan.

Last summer, the Supreme Court struck down the commissions as unconstitutional, forcing the White House and Congress to develop new guidelines.

Human rights groups on Thursday criticized the new procedures for straying from the military's traditional rules for courts-martial. Among other things, the rules allow too much leeway for government lawyers to keep defendants from viewing classified evidence, they said.

"Classified sources and methods are protected," said Jennifer Daskal, a lawyer at Human Rights Watch. "This creates the possibility that the defense will not learn the ways in which the evidence was obtained, which could have been through coercive techniques like water boarding and sleep deprivation."

Mr. Dell'Orto said that while defendants would not be allowed to see classified evidence, defense lawyers would be given an unclassified summary of the material.

There are currently 395 detainees held at Guantánamo Bay, but it is likely that only a fraction of those will be prosecuted before military commissions. Even if prisoners are not charged, officials said, the United States still has the right to detain them indefinitely or hand them over to their native governments.

"It doesn't mean that they are not unlawful combatants. It doesn't mean that they shouldn't be detained," said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman.

Besides Mr. Mohammed, according to the government, the former C.I.A. detainees currently at Guantánamo Bay include senior members of Al Qaeda believed to be responsible for the bombing of the United States destroyer Cole in 2000 in Yemen and the 1998 attacks on American embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

The prosecutors for the trials of those men will be a mix of military and civilian lawyers.

Marine Corps Colonel Among Critics Of New Terror Trial Rules (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon's release of new rules for military trials of foreign terror suspects triggered a fresh round of questions and criticism Thursday about the administration's handling of detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The Pentagon's manual for war-crime trials is 238 pages, but much of the talk about it Thursday focused on rules for using evidence: Suspects may be convicted — and even sentenced to death — based on information from coerced confessions and hearsay evidence.

VIDEO: Coerced testimony could be considered

Coerced confessions are not allowed as evidence in traditional civilian courts or military courts martial. Hearsay evidence — testimony from a witness who merely repeats what someone else said out of court — usually is barred from both types of courts.

Those criticizing the manual for lacking traditional safeguards of military trials included Marine Corps Col. Dwight Sullivan, the chief defense lawyer for the military tribunals, or commissions. Human rights groups such as Amnesty International and Democrats such as Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut also expressed concern that the rules unfairly limit defendants' rights.

The new rules follow Congress' passage last October of the Military Commissions Act. The law came after the Supreme Court rejected President Bush's earlier plan to hold military tribunals to try terrorism suspects.

The court said Bush lacked the power to set up such tribunals without Congress' authorization, and declared that the procedures then in place violated the U.S. Military Code of Justice and Geneva Conventions rules aimed at protecting prisoners of war. Bush had established the tribunal system weeks after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, as U.S.-led forces were launching a worldwide hunt for terrorism suspects.

On Bush's orders, hundreds of suspects have been held indefinitely at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay. Ten detainees were charged under the 2001 system. Some of the trials were underway in 2004 but stalled after a federal judge ruled the tribunal procedures were flawed.

The ruling led to the Supreme Court's decision.

The Pentagon's new plan, says Daniel Dell'Orto, deputy general counsel at the Defense Department, offers suspects "all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized people."

Air Force Brig. Gen. Thomas Hemingway, legal adviser for the commissions, said Thursday he expects the new commissions to begin soon, possibly this spring.

However, it's clear that the system for trying foreign suspects will continue to draw fire. Sullivan said the rules for evidence to be used during the trials could allow a defendant to be convicted and sentenced to death on nothing more than a coerced confession, hearsay evidence or uncorroborated testimony.

"This is extraordinary," said Sullivan, who has raised concerns on behalf of Guantanamo detainees who would be the subject of the first U.S. war crimes trials since World War II.

Dodd cited a "lack of safeguards against coerced evidence being introduced in trial, and the limitations on defense access to witnesses and evidence."

He said he intended to introduce legislation to ensure "credible prosecution of suspected terrorists."

The Pentagon says 395 detainees are now held at Guantanamo. Among the 10 who had been charged before the trials were halted in 2004 was Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a Yemeni accused of serving as a bodyguard for Osama bin Laden and delivering weapons to al-Qaeda. It was his case that prompted the Supreme Court ruling that led to the new tribunal system.

Apology Not Accepted (NYT)

It is hard to render a convincing apology when you are not really apologizing. Consider Charles Stimson, the deputy assistant secretary of state for detainee affairs, who has been trying to spin his way out of his loathsome attempt to punish lawyers who represent inmates of the Guantánamo Bay internment camp.

Last week, Mr. Stimson expressed his “shock” that major American law firms would represent terrorism suspects, hinted that they were paid by unsavory characters and suggested that companies should reconsider doing business with them. On Wednesday, Mr. Stimson said he apologized and regretted that his comments “left the impression” that he was attacking the integrity of those lawyers.

It was not just an impression. It was exactly what he did. Mr. Stimson actually read out a list of law firms during an interview with a radio station friendly to the Bush administration.

Mr. Stimson clearly had no regard for his position as a public official who helps set policy on the detainees, never mind the small matter of people’s basic right to representation. He connected the detainees to the 9/11 attacks, even though he certainly knows that the very few detainees who have a connection to 9/11 don’t have legal representation.

President Bush and Defense Secretary Robert Gates should have fired him. Their silence was deafening, although hardly surprising given the administration’s record of trampling on people’s rights in the name of fighting terror. But Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was not silent. In an interview with The Associated Press, Mr. Gonzales actually expanded the attack on lawyers, claiming that it has taken as long as five years to bring detainees to trial because of delays caused by their lawyers.

There’s no truth to that. The cause of the delay in bringing any Guantánamo detainee to trial is Mr. Bush himself. He refused to hold trials at first, then refused to work with Congress on the issue and claimed the power to devise his own slanted court system. Mr. Bush went to Congress only when the Supreme Court struck those courts down. The result was a bill establishing military tribunals for detainees that is a mockery of American justice.

Mr. Stimson’s appalling behavior should not be overlooked by the relevant bar disciplinary committee. Existing rules for lawyers deem it professional misconduct to do things that are prejudicial to the administration of justice. Even if the administration does not, the legal profession imposes a higher duty on those holding public office to obey proper standards of behavior.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Newsweek, January 19, 2007

Feb. 13, 2006 issue - In the latest twist in the debate over presidential powers, a Justice Department official suggested that in certain circumstances, the president might have the power to order the killing of terrorist suspects inside the United States. Steven Bradbury, acting head of the department's Office of Legal Counsel, went to a closed-door Senate intelligence committee meeting last week to defend President George W. Bush's surveillance program. During the briefing, said administration and Capitol Hill officials (who declined to be identified because the session was private), California Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein asked Bradbury questions about the extent of presidential powers to fight Al Qaeda; could Bush, for instance, order the killing of a Qaeda suspect known to be on U.S. soil? Bradbury replied that he believed Bush could indeed do this, at least in certain circumstances.

Current and former government officials said they could think of several scenarios in which a president might consider ordering the killing of a terror suspect inside the United States. One former official noted that before Flight 93 crashed in Pennsylvania, top administration officials weighed shooting down the aircraft if it got too close to Washington, D.C. What if the president had strong evidence that a Qaeda suspect was holed up with a dirty bomb and was about to attack? University of Chicago law professor Cass Sunstein says the post-9/11 congressional resolution authorizing the use of military force against Al Qaeda empowered the president to kill 9/11 perpetrators, or people who assisted their plot, whether they were overseas or inside the United States. On the other hand, Sunstein says, the president would be on less solid legal ground were he to order the killing of a terror suspect in the United States who was not actively preparing an attack.

A Justice Department official, who asked not to be ID'd because of the sensitive subject, said Bradbury's remarks were made during an "academic discussion" of theoretical contingencies. In real life, the official said, the highest priority of those hunting a terrorist on U.S. soil would be to capture that person alive and interrogate him. At a public intel-committee hearing, Feinstein was told by intel czar John Negroponte and FBI chief Robert Mueller that they were unaware of any case in which a U.S. agency was authorized to kill a Qaeda-linked person on U.S. soil. Tasia Scolinos, a Justice Department spokeswoman, told NEWSWEEK: "Mr. Bradbury's meeting was an informal, off-the-record briefing about the legal analysis behind the president's terrorist-surveillance program. He was not presenting the legal views of the Justice Department on hypothetical scenarios outside of the terrorist-surveillance program."

Chertoff Urges Caution On Threat Reports (AP)

By Beverley Lumpkin, Associated Press Writer

The AP, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told newspaper editors Thursday they should use caution and context in reporting about threats or emergencies.

"We owe you information that's accurate," he said, "and you need to resist the temptation to just get something fast."

Chertoff said it's the core function of the media to convey to individuals the information they need to save their lives and their families' lives.

He invited the media to continue to participate in a series of dialogues and exercises his department has been conducting on how best to communicate information during a crisis.

Chertoff pointed out that the department receives "a lot of threat information, every single morning," but that it varies greatly in terms of specificity and credibility.

Even a threat of limited credibility still has to be run down and investigated, Chertoff said, but it shouldn't become public during that stage. If threat information is made public too soon, he warned, there is a danger the public will become either desensitized in a "cry wolf syndrome," or over-sensitized, in a "constant state of hyper-anxiety."

"And perhaps," he added, "we would be accused of deliberately fostering that for political purposes."

Sometimes, he said, when information is shared with state and local officials, department officials are aware that "very likely this information is going to get out." Then the issue is one of context, and he urged editors to use good judgment.

Chertoff mentioned several instances in the recent past in which information "got spiked up" and overplayed on cable TV networks. One was a report about six months ago that an Internet bulletin board had called for a so-called "denial of service" cyber attack on the U.S. banking and financial sector. Chertoff said it took a "fair amount of effort to put it back into perspective."

Another instance was a threat to NFL football stadiums posted on a message board last October. Chertoff said it had been treated by one cable network "as if it was a second September 11."

Much more is at stake, he warned, in reporting on actual emergencies, because people immediately want to know what they should do to protect themselves.

In this regard, Chertoff warned the editors against over-reliance on dubious experts.

"It's been my observation that you can get an expert to tell you anything you want to hear," he said, adding: "We owe you clarity about who's an authoritative source."

Asked about the lessons he learned from Hurricane Katrina, Chertoff said "we have to be very clear."

"I learned that the media if they get information wrong can have a real operational impact."

Terrorism Hoaxes Still Plaguing Law Agencies (USAT)

By Mimi Hall, Usa Today

USA Today, January 19, 2007

The cruise ship Carnival Destiny, packed with passengers on the last leg of a trip to the Bahamas, was chugging Sunday toward the harbor in San Juan, Puerto Rico, when the U.S. Coast Guard got an ominous call.

Someone claimed a bomb was on board.

The Coast Guard ordered the craft to anchor away from the harbor piers so it could be searched. No bomb was found during repeated security sweeps that involved Customs and Border Protection officers, the Puerto Rico Ports Authority, the FBI and teams of bomb-sniffing dogs.

The case — among the most recent of the constant terrorism-related hoaxes and false threats that plague the nation's law enforcement and homeland security agencies — remains under investigation by the FBI.

Five years after 9/11 and the 2001 anthrax attacks caused a spike in false threats, senior federal officials say they still are forced to run down hoaxes nearly every day, creating a huge drain on agents' ability to pursue real threats to the nation's security.

Some hoaxes make national news, such as last October's radioactive "dirty bomb" threat against seven football stadiums. But FBI agents and officials from the Justice and Homeland Security departments say those represent just a fraction of those received by phone, mail and e-mail each year.

At police stations and FBI offices across the country hoaxes are "a serious drain," says Ken Wainstein, head of the Justice Department's National Security Division. "These terror hoaxes distract law enforcement."

They also scare people.

On Thursday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the government doesn't publicize most threats because "people would be in a constant state of hyper-anxiety."

The department posts Internet hoaxes on its website to reassure citizens and encourage them not to pass on bogus e-mailed chain letters. Among those that have been circulating for several years, the website says, is a fake government warning that someone bought $32,000 worth of United Parcel Service (UPS) uniforms off eBay. The fraudulent message urges people to be wary if a UPS employee comes to their door.

In an effort to help prosecutors and deter hoaxes, Congress in 2004 set stiffer penalties, allowing judges to send people to prison for up to five years for making false threats.

Among the cases that have grabbed headlines:

•A phony "dirty bomb" threat against seven football stadiums last October. Grocery store clerk Jake Brahm of Wauwatosa, Wis., was arrested after posting the threat on several Internet sites. The threats "caused a massive mobilization of every resource you can think of," said Michael Drewniak, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office in Newark, N.J.

"You cannot possibly quantify the amount of dollars this cost in manpower and resources all because (someone) decided to scream fire — scream terrorism — in essentially seven football stadiums."

•A false tip called in to San Diego's 911 center days before President Bush's second inauguration in January 2005. Jose Quinonez, a Mexican drug addict and smuggler, said he had smuggled two Iraqis and four Chinese chemists across the border and they were headed for Boston with nuclear material.

The tip prompted a huge response from more than 30 government agencies. Agents conducted a nationwide manhunt, the public was alerted and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney skipped the inauguration and flew home to reassure state residents. In September, Quinonez was sentenced to three years in prison.

"We're on the front lines of keeping this country safe, and when you're distracted by these false threats, it goes right to the heart of our ability to protect the country," says Dan Dzwilewski, head of the San Diego FBI office. He oversees an entire unit within his region's Joint Terrorism Task Force that does nothing but chase down hoaxes and false threats.

•A false tip in October 2005 that six Egyptian men were planning to blow up one of the tunnels that carries traffic under Baltimore's harbor. Officials closed the tunnel, part of a major East Coast interstate, for three hours and raided at least three city businesses run by Arabs.

Police arrested several people on immigration charges during area raids, but the tip turned out to be a hoax called in by an Egyptian man who had been deported from the United States.

Charlie Allen, Homeland Security's top intelligence officer, says hoaxes and bogus tips come in "almost on a daily basis." Allen says he knew right away that the football stadium threat was "absurd." But he says every threat requires a thorough investigation because "you just can't take chances."

Officials say they want stiff penalties imposed on those who make false threats. Allen said the incidents frighten the public, force emergency responders to go on alert, and tie up federal agents and investigators at a time when the nation faces serious threats. "It's a malicious, malevolent act," Allen says, "and a felonious act."

GAO Criticizes Rail Security Assessment (AP)

By Donna De La Cruz

AP, January 19, 2007

Transportation officials have yet to assess the risks of a terror attack on the nation's passenger rail system, congressional investigators said Thursday.

The finding by the Government Accountability Office was disclosed at a Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation hearing on rail security. After the July 2005 London subway bombings, the GAO recommended that the Transportation Security Administration conduct a risk assessment of passenger rail systems. The TSA, formed after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, is responsible for the security of the nation's transportation systems.

Cathleen Berrick, the GAO's director of homeland security and justice issues, told the committee that until the TSA finishes its risk assessment, the agency may not know which rail systems are more at risk than others.

"Given competing priorities and limited homeland security resources, difficult policy decisions have to be made by Congress and the executive branch to prioritize security efforts and direct resources to areas of greatest risk," Berrick said.

TSA Director Edmund S. "Kip" Hawley said the agency is working with a host of other federal agencies and entities to make sure passenger rail systems are safe. TSA's goal is to apply a "common methodology across all transportation systems, regardless of mode," Hawley said.

That includes assessing threat levels, vulnerability and the consequence of an attack, developing baseline security standards as well as enhanced systems of security, he added.

"TSA has a clear strategy to address surface transportation security," Hawley said.

Several committee members were critical of TSA's efforts.

"I'm frustrated with the Bush administration's foot-dragging on measures to secure the nation's rail systems," said Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J. "Terrorists have attacked passenger rail systems in other countries since 9/11, but the lessons of those attacks continue to be ignored by the administration."

LOS ANGELES - A man seen on videotape spilling a small amount of mercury onto the platform of a subway station was wanted for questioning by police, the FBI and other members of a multi-agency terrorism task force.

There was no evidence to suggest the actions were terrorist or criminal acts, but authorities wanted to ask the unidentified man why he was carrying mercury and what was his motivation for apparently spilling the toxic substance, said FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller.

Video footage showed the man entering the downtown Pershing Square station Dec. 22 and spilling a vial of liquid onto the platform. The man appeared startled and walked to a Metropolitan Transit Authority call box, where he reported the mercury spill, the FBI said.

A Los Angeles County Sheriff's hazardous materials team confirmed the substance was mercury and removed it.

MTA Admits Subway Spill Errors (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

Who is the young man in the sports coat shown on a grainy videotape spilling mercury on a platform of the Red Line subway station at Pershing Square?

When it happened on Dec. 22, officials quickly labeled it a harmless accident.

But Thursday, officials acknowledged that the Los Angeles County Metropolitan Transportation Authority botched its response, waiting eight hours after being told mercury was on the platform before clearing the station and cleaning up the spill.

Police and transit officials said the workers erred by not immediately contacting law enforcement to cordon off the area and calling in hazardous-material experts.

The incident also exposed the fact that many MTA workers are not trained to handle dangerous materials such as mercury.

Though no one was injured, the incident marked the first time the MTA faced the release of a potentially hazardous substance in the subway system.

Saying that "basic protocols were not followed," MTA chairwoman Gloria Molina on Thursday ordered an immediate investigation into what went wrong.

Several terrorism experts said Thursday that the MTA's handling of the incident was troubling.

"It's unnerving, a wake-up call," said USC professor James Moore, an expert in transportation and a researcher with USC's Terrorism Center.

"The lesson is that no matter how you slice it, the system isn't prepared to respond adequately. We really don't know what caused this failure, but we need to find out."

Since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the MTA has repeatedly touted its beefed-up security measures and increased employee training. But the bulk of the $9 million spent to improve security has focused mostly on preventing a terrorist bombing.

"We deal with suspicious packages, abandoned packages, white powdery substances," said Sheriff's Cmdr. Dan Finkelstein, who oversees security for the transit authority. "This is something that's never happened before."

Finkelstein and others said MTA workers were caught unprepared by the released mercury because it was a scenario they had not dealt with.

"What we need to do is educate all levels throughout our system, whether it's intercom operators or maintenance staff, as well as bus or rail operators," Finkelstein added.

But county Supervisor Zev Yaroslavsky, a member of the MTA board, said workers shouldn't need special training to know that they should call 911 if someone says he dumped mercury in a subway station.

"It's an embarrassment," he said. "Eight hours depending upon the substance ... could have been deadly."

On Thursday, security was increased at the Pershing Square station and on subway trains as federal and local law enforcement sought the public's help — even posting fliers — in locating the man who released the mercury. (The station serves about 122,000 riders a day.)

Finkelstein said the Sheriff's Department also has significantly increased the number of undercover officers riding rail lines in recent days.

Mercury can cause severe health problems if inhaled, ingested or touched. Officials said they believed no one was injured because of exposure to the metal.

Officials with the Joint Terrorism Task Force said there is no evidence to suggest the incident was terrorism, or even a criminal act.

One theory is that the man carrying the mercury used the element in jewelry manufacturing or refrigerator repair.

Video released by the Sheriff's Department on Thursday shows the man crouching on the Pershing Square subway platform before dropping a vial of liquid, possibly spilling it out.

The man jumped to his feet. He searched for and located an MTA intercom, on which officials say he called an operator.

According to law enforcement sources familiar with the investigation, the man told the operator: "I spilled mercury."

It wasn't until eight hours later, at 6:51 a.m. on Dec. 23, that sheriff's deputies were alerted to the spill.

They arrived eight minutes later, closing the station and calling in a hazardous-materials team from the Los Angeles City Fire Department. (Trains had continued running during six of those eight hours.)

Commuters were critical of the MTA's response.

"It seems like they should have sealed the station off before then," said Los Angeles resident Roy Horton, 59, as he waited for the subway Thursday afternoon. "It shows me that they have less concern for the patrons who use the system."

Aaron Trask, a Sherman Oaks resident who regularly rides the Red Line, said the incident has shaken his confidence in the system.

"I am considering not riding until someone can tell us why there was a complete lack of response to this incident," he wrote in an e-mail.

Well before 9/11, subways were considered potential targets for terrorism.

Members of the Aum Supreme Truth cult unleashed sarin nerve gas inside the Tokyo subway in 1995, killing 12 people and sickening thousands of others.

More recently, terrorist bombs killed hundreds in Madrid and London.

After the London attacks, the MTA increased spending on security, including sophisticated cameras able to pan and focus on specific people.

An MTA spokesman declined to provide details of what happened the night of the mercury spill, including whether there was anyone monitoring the videos from Pershing Square.

But some terrorism experts said high-tech security equipment and even more officers go only so far.

K. Jack Riley, acting director of the RAND Center of Quality Policing, said transit agencies need a good supply of security officials trained to recognize and deal with many contingencies.

"They just have a better idea of what to look for and have been through simulations of different kinds," he said.

Parents Of 9/11 Victims Torn From Grandchildren (NYT)

By Paul Vitello

DOJ_NMG_0118608

OYSTER BAY, N.Y. — Five years after their father was killed at the World Trade Center, two little girls, ages 7 and 5, sat crying in a car parked at the curb of their grandparents' home here one December day, refusing to go inside for a court-ordered visit. It was a painful family tableau rooted in a hundred tangled details, but one overriding and uncontested reality: 9/11.

Sometime after the death of Peter V. Genco, a Cantor Fitzgerald bond trader, in the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the relationship between the girls' mother and their late father's parents went sour. The grandparents, Barbara and Victor Genco, obtained a court order in 2003 allowing them to see the children — under supervision, and for exactly four hours, once each month. In legal documents, the mother accused her in-laws of abuse and neglect, including drinking in front of them.

And on that Sunday afternoon in December, as described by the grandparents, the girls had apparently had enough of the whole business.

"We had hoped to be a part of their lives and a link to their father," Barbara Genco, 69, said in an interview. "We imagined taking them with us to Europe, to Disney World. But it is too painful to see how the children have changed toward us."

This sad tale is not entirely uncommon among families torn by the terrorist attacks. There is no official registry of such separations. One 9/11 family advocate said he had encountered more than 100 conflicts in which aging parents of a World Trade Center victim, desperate to remain connected to the children of their lost offspring, had found themselves in bitter struggles with a surviving spouse who would rather they did not. A mediator who helped negotiate settlements among 9/11 families in the early years after the attacks said 1 in 10 of his cases involved estranged grandparents.

A few have been to court, where recent laws give grandparents some leverage. Many other grandparents have not. Some have been wise and circumspect in efforts to mend relations with their deceased child's widow or widower. Some have not.

"Sometimes, the spouse is remarried and just doesn't have time for Grandma and Grandpa anymore," said Bill Doyle, who lost his son, Joseph, at the World Trade Center and maintains an e-mail registry of several thousand surviving relatives for the Coalition of 9/11 Families.

"Sometimes, the spouse and the grandparents had differences about whether to bury or cremate the remains, or about where remains should end up," Mr. Doyle added. "Or sometimes, there is money at stake. Or the people just never liked each other and it comes to blows over the kids. It can get so ugly, it's beyond belief."

By most accounts, these situations are the exception. Family advocates and professionals involved in working with 9/11 families, including Kenneth R. Feinberg, head of the Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund, said in interviews that most families had remained on more or less good terms with in-laws, even after remarriages.

One 9/11 widow who recently remarried described her children as having "three sets of grandparents" — her parents, the parents of her husband killed on 9/11, and her new husband's parents. Linda Favuzza, the sister of Bernard D. Favuzza of Suffern, N.Y., a bond trader whose children were grown when he was killed on 9/11, said her brother's widow, Linda, had "welcomed us, reached out to us, done everything she could for my brother's family, especially our mother."

And yet, there is a British woman who has not spoken to her twin grandsons since her son handed them the phone on Sunday, Sept. 9, 2001. A Florida grandmother who said her daughter-in-law called the police the last time she tried to visit. A couple who have seen their grandson in Brooklyn only a few times through a four-year court fight.

For the widows and widowers, the grandparents can be a reminder of their darkest day, kept at a distance to let the children — and themselves — move on. But the older generation often clings to the children, not just as any doting grandparents would, but as their sole connection to the children they lost on 9/11.

"All I had of my son's was his dog, and the dog died last year," said Barbara Krukowski-Rastelli, who has not seen her grandson, now 15, since 2002.

Similar emotional dislocations can affect individuals and their in-laws after any death or divorce, family professionals say. But to the basic fuels of discord, 9/11-specific issues are the accelerants: disputes over the federal compensation money or the remains of the dead, and perhaps the most unmentionable issue, the desire of some surviving spouses to start over.

Alan Gross, the mediator who said 10 percent of the 9/11 cases he worked on involved grandparents, said most involved "people who had a problem beforehand." Mr. Feinberg said that he did not encounter many such disputes but that when he did, "they could be bitter."

Neither the Gencos' daughter-in-law nor her lawyer responded to repeated requests for interviews. In other cases, parents asked not to be quoted but called their estrangements private matters with unique histories. Some accused their former in-laws of being mentally unstable.

Court documents fill in some of the nasty background. The Gencos' daughter-in-law has accused them of transgressions including striking the children and allowing a dog to frighten them (none of the charges were verified by court-appointed investigators). In another case, a grandfather, also accused of inappropriate behavior, calls his long-term court fight to see his grandson "the secondary trauma of 9/11."

People who have been limited or blocked from contact with their grandchildren describe situations as varied, complex and uncategorizable as the multitude of reasons people cite for getting divorced.

Some, like the Gencos, have been accused of abuse. Some were called overbearing or interfering. Some were accused of seeking money from the Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund at the expense of the spouses and children. Some admit they never got along with their child's spouse.

"Much of this family squabbling had been seething for years, with decades of slights now drawn to the surface by tragedy," Mr. Feinberg wrote in a passage dealing with conflicts — over a different flashpoint of tension, money — in his 2005 book about the victims' fund. "Where did the truth lie?"

Patricia Bingley, 72, the mother of Kevin Dennis, a Cantor Fitzgerald bond trader killed on 9/11, said her daughter-in-law refused to return her phone calls after the attacks. Mrs. Bingley looked into hiring a lawyer but thought she would have little chance of winning visits with her twin grandsons, since she lives outside London and they are in New Jersey, and since she had a fraught relationship with her daughter-in-law predating her son's death.

"On the Sunday before 9/11, Kevin put the boys on the phone with me, and that is the last time I spoke to them," Mrs. Bingley said. "Kevin was my only child. I lost him, and now I've lost my grandchildren."

Mrs. Krukowski-Rastelli, the mother of Firefighter William Edward Krukowski, 36, of Ladder Company 21 in Manhattan, said her son was divorcing at the time of his death. His widow has since remarried.

After Mrs. Krukowski-Rastelli, 65, filed a petition in Queens Family Court seeking visitation rights, a legal guardian appointed on her grandson's behalf interviewed him and recommended the petition be dismissed. They have not seen each other in almost four years.

Under a New York law that gives grandparents certain rights to visitation, grandparents must show that they have a longstanding relationship with the child, and that seeing the child is in the child's best interests. The guardian said Mrs. Krukowski-Rastelli had not established either condition.

Vladimir Gavryushin, 56, the father of a 9/11 victim, Yelena Melnichenko, came to New York from Lithuania after her death to be with his 7-year-old grandson, Eric. During two months in the family's apartment in Brooklyn, Mr. Gavryushin said, his relationship with the boy's father became difficult.

When Mr. Gavryushin and his wife returned to New York for the first anniversary of 9/11, his son-in-law refused to allow them to see Eric, and the Gavryushins sued.

In court documents, Eric's father says that Mr. Gavryushin upset Eric by bringing up conspiracy theories about the 9/11 attacks, tried to stop him from riding a school bus and interfered with efforts to "bring closure" to the child.

Mr. Gavryushin denied all the accusations, and introduced affidavits from 14 neighbors attesting to the positive effect his presence had on young Eric during the grandfather's two-month stay in 2001.

Two judges, forensic psychologists and a legal guardian were involved during a four-year legal fight until, in early January, the grandparents' petition for visitation was denied. Mr. Gavryushin, a professor of physics at the University of Vilnius, said in an e-mail message that the issue was moot. "We lost the child," he wrote. "He permanently was influenced against us. He forgot us. For us, it is the secondary trauma of 9/11."

For Barbara and Victor Genco, the case they initiated in Nassau County Family Court is in its third year of motions and countermotions. In the most recent development, their grandchildren's mother asked for an end to the monthly court-ordered visits. (That December afternoon, the girls were eventually coaxed inside. They are supposed to visit again in January, but the visit has not yet been scheduled.)

"I feel like we're reaching the end of the line," Mrs. Genco said. "But our grandchildren have a right to the love and affection of their father's family. They have a right to be connected to him.

"If we end up unsuccessful in court, that would be terrible for all of us. But at least, when they are older, they will know that we tried."

Nowhere To Turn For Shelter (editorial) (NYT)

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

In the long and sordid story of Hurricane Katrina, a new low may be approaching. In Louisiana alone, tens of thousands of displaced families who rely on the government to provide trailers or rent will lose their temporary housing next month — unless the Bush administration extends the standard 18-month time limit for their federal aid.

A year and a half is a long time for anything that is supposed to be transitional, as the families still trapped in cramped, flimsy trailers can testify. But the temporary help from the Federal Emergency Management Agency cannot end until the victims have somewhere else to go. And the federal and local governments have moved far too slowly in providing the necessary reconstruction money and building guidance. Hurricanes Katrina and Rita destroyed more than 200,000 homes in Louisiana, and only a small fraction have been replaced. (Neither the state nor the New Orleans city government knows how many have been completed.) A sky-high murder rate has dominated the news. The success of the Saints professional football team is not enough of a distraction.

The response to the drowning of New Orleans has been a failure on every level. President Bush's eloquent promise in Jackson Square to rebuild "higher and better" soothed the nation. But since then there has been no concrete action plan for reconstruction — only a patchwork of programs marked by dithering, bickering and bureaucratic finger-pointing throughout. The federal response was, after great delay, largely to cut a check and let overmatched local officials try to sort it out.

The president's Katrina czar, Donald Powell, sees his role as one of a convener, adviser and advocate rather than leader of a domestic Marshall Plan — which is what New Orleans needs. He says that local officials should take the lead. But the local reconstruction plan has yet to materialize. City officials hope that it will be out by the end of the month.

There is some local optimism that when it does arrive there will be a burst of rebuilding effort. Developers are finally beginning to break ground on apartment complexes. The city has issued more than 55,000 residential building permits since the storm, finally moving at a faster rate than before Katrina.

But the time is long past to turn from planning to action. And those in need of shelter today cannot take comfort in housing that won't be ready for another two years. The administration must extend the temporary housing provisions immediately, then make every effort to shift aid recipients to the longer-term Section 8 voucher program.

The new Democratic leaders in Congress also need to recognize that the many failures of Hurricane Katrina are more than just another reason to criticize the president. They need to quickly outline their own plans for salvaging New Orleans, so evacuees can once again call their city home.

That New Orleans remains a shattered city is a sad monument to impotence for the most powerful country in the world. Our grand plans were never laid, our brightest minds were never assembled, our nation's muscle and ingenuity were never brought to bear in any concerted way to overcome the crisis of the Gulf.

WAR NEWS:

House Dems To Support Iraq Resolution (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 19, 2007

Speaker Nancy Pelosi pledged the support of House Democrats Thursday for legislation declaring that President Bush's decision to send additional troops to Iraq is "not in the national interest of the United States."

Pelosi's commitment came as Senate Democrats said they intend to begin advancing a nonbinding measure next week that criticizes the White House's new strategy.

Democrats sought to bring public pressure to bear on the president's new policy as Bush and senior administration officials worked to limit Republican defections.

"He said, 'If you can help us out, I really appreciate your help,'" Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Colo., said after a White House meeting with the commander in chief.

Senate Democrats, backed by two Republicans, unveiled legislation Wednesday that criticized Bush's decision to increase troop levels by 21,500. "It is not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq, particularly by escalating the United States military force presence in Iraq," the nonbinding Senate measure states.

At a news conference, Pelosi read those words aloud approvingly, and said, "That resolution will be supported by Democrats in the House."

At the same time, Pelosi offered no indication that Congress will be able to prevent Bush from carrying out his plan.

She did not directly address the issue when asked, and Rep. Steny Hoyer, D-Md., the House majority leader, said, "As a practical matter, we know that the president has the constitutional authority ... to increase the troops."

Democratic leaders in both houses have said repeatedly they will not support any attempt to cut off funds for troops who already have been deployed.

Democratic leaders have not said when they intend to seek votes on their legislation, and Senate Republicans have maneuvered successfully to avoid the spectacle of a repudiation of the president before he delivers his annual State of the Union address next Tuesday.

Joseph Biden, the Delaware Democrat who chairs the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said the panel will debate the measure criticizing Bush's troop escalation on Wednesday.

Republicans in both houses are expected to draft alternative legislation, in part to give members of their rank-and-file a measure to support rather than merely oppose what Democrats draft. Officials said one possibility under discussion is an alternative that supports the troop increase as long as the Iraqi government meets certain conditions, although no final decisions have been made.

Whenever the votes occur, administration supporters have expressed fears that the president faces a bipartisan repudiation of significant proportions.

So far, Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine are the only Republicans to announce their backing for the Senate measure. A third lawmaker, Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore., signaled during the day he is giving serious consideration to joining them.

"Senator Smith is opposed to a troop surge," said his spokesman, R.C. Hammond. "He is very open to serious ways that Congress can influence the president's Iraq strategy."

Another Republican critic of Bush's policy, Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota, said: "I don't support the surge in Baghdad, but there are some things in the resolution I don't agree with, and so we're kind of looking at language."

Bush's meeting with lawmakers was his third session in as many days as he struggles to build support for an increase in troops for a war that is opposed by the public and played a role in the Republican setbacks in last fall's elections.

In addition, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley traveled to the Capitol to meet with House Republicans.

Complicating Bush's political predicament is Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who has said in recent days that the United States is not providing enough training and equipment for Iraqi forces.

"He's been constantly asking for an upgrade of troops as well as equipment, and we're providing that," Bush told Belo Corp. television in an interview.

"We may not be providing as quickly as he wants. But nevertheless it's a good sign when the prime minister says just give us the capabilities, and that's precisely what my new strategy and new plan is attempting to do."

Bush defended al-Maliki against skeptics by saying that Iraqi forces now are going after all people "who are fomenting the violence."

Democrats have grown increasing critical of Bush's Iraq policy. "This president has taken the nation through a failed war," said Sen. Robert C. Byrd in remarks on the Senate floor.

DOJ_NMG_0118612

Four retired senior U.S. military officers criticized the administration's strategy at a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing.

"It's a fool's errand," said Gen. Barry McCaffrey. "Our allies are leaving us," he said. "Make no mistake about that. Most will be gone by this summer."

Retired Marine Corps Gen. Joseph P. Hoar, said, "The new strategy reflects the inability of the administration to get it right." He said, "The proposed solution to send in more troops won't work. It is far too little and too late."

Hagel, long a critic of the war, said the administration's plans are doomed. "We are in a box, and putting our soldiers and Marines in more of a box and asking them to do things they cannot do," he said.

The committee's senior Republican, Sen. Richard Lugar of Indiana, said the Democratic-inspired legislation was unlikely to have any impact on Bush.

Describing the environment as politically charged, Lugar said, "We risk having reasoned debate descend into simplistic sloganeering."

House To Echo Criticism Of Troop Surge (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

Speaker Nancy Pelosi said yesterday that House Democrats will support a Senate resolution denouncing President Bush's proposal to increase the number of troops in Iraq.

"It is not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq, particularly by escalating the U.S. troop presence in Iraq," she said at a press conference yesterday, reading with approval from the nonbinding Senate resolution.

"Introduced in a bipartisan way in the United States Senate, that resolution will be supported in the House by the Democrats," Mrs. Pelosi said. "We do not support the escalation of the war. We do not think it is in our national interest. We will engage the public in that debate."

Mrs. Pelosi has made clear her disdain for the "surge" proposal since before Mr. Bush's prime-time address to the nation last week, but yesterday's remarks were her first indication of the language that she will want the House to approve. The Senate bill was introduced Wednesday.

While the nonbinding resolution will have no concrete impact on the deployment of troops in the Middle East, it is likely to be a startling declaration to Mr. Bush, U.S. forces and the rest of the world that the commander in chief is operating without the support of either chamber of Congress.

Sen. Olympia J. Snowe of Maine, one of the Senate resolution's two Republican co-sponsors, said yesterday that even the symbolic power of a nonbinding resolution "should not be underestimated."

Passing both chambers "would speak loud and clear to the American people and to the president. A president can't sustain a military conflict without the support either of Congress as well as the American people, and that's what the president is up against," she told MSNBC.

During the past week, congressional opposition to Mr. Bush's war policy has made headlines around the world.

"Senators oppose Bush's Iraq plan" said Al Jazeera's Web site yesterday. The story quoted Sen. Chuck Hagel, Nebraska Republican and a co-author of the Senate resolution, saying: "I will do everything I can to stop the president's policy as he outlined it on Wednesday night. I think it is dangerously irresponsible."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat and chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said his panel will start debate on the resolution on Wednesday. It was not clear last night when there would be a floor vote in either chamber.

During yesterday's press conference, Mrs. Pelosi said she expects the legislation to garner bipartisan support in the House.

Some liberal Democrats want more. Earlier this week, Rep. Lynn Woolsey, California Democrat, introduced a bill that would require all U.S. troops to leave Iraq within six months and cut off funding if they do not. The bill has 17 co-sponsors, although none are party leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0118613

Relegated to the sidelines in Congress after the November elections largely because of their support of the war, Republicans held a week of "listening sessions" to search for a war platform they could unite on.

"We have learned from our discussions that while differences of opinion do exist in the Conference, commonality also exists. What unites us is far stronger than what divides us," Republican Conference Chairman Adam H. Putnam of Florida wrote in a letter yesterday to colleagues. "As Democrats continue to debate over which course of cut-and-run they should support, House Republicans are categorically united behind four guiding principles."

Included in their list of principles is that "there is only one commander in chief," "failure in Iraq is not an option," and "we are opposed to cutting off funding for our troops."

And, after years of complaints from Democrats over lackadaisical oversight of the war, Republicans yesterday declared, "Congress has a constitutional right and obligation to exercise oversight."

Whither All The War Protesters? (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

from the January 19, 2007 edition - http://www.csmonitor.com/2007/0119/p01s03-ussc.html Whither all the war protesters? As the Iraq war heads toward 'surge,' the antiwar movement, now mostly online, nears a crucial moment.

By Brad Knickerbocker | Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

On a beach in US House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's San Francisco district the other day, about 1,000 war protesters formed up to spell out the word "IMPEACH." The aerial photo quickly spread to China and Europe.

Still, there were no political harangues, no civil disobedience. The quiet turnout was mostly "old hippies, and even older hippies," jokes event organizer Brad Newsham.

In Boston, a peaceful rally to protest the planned "surge" in US troops drew no more than a few hundred people.

Nearly four years into US combat in Iraq, the antiwar movement has yet to generate the kind of mass protest seen during the Vietnam War. There's no shutting down universities or blocking traffic at military bases – no tense face-offs with police.

But with the new Congress, the Bush administration's surge strategy (which critics deem an "escalation" of the conflict), and increasingly negative public opinion polls on the war, this may be a critical moment for the antiwar movement.

Now, it is organizing and most active in cyberspace. And while that "public space" is not as visible as the town square and university grounds nearly four decades ago, it no doubt feeds the growing public opposition to the Iraq war. (Seventy percent of Americans oppose sending more troops to Iraq, according to an Associated Press-Ipsos poll last week.)

One key reason that opposition to the war has been less overt, organizers recognize, is the lack of a military draft. Also, the scale of the war is different. There were four times as many troops involved and 10 times as many American casualties over a comparable period in Vietnam.

Third, only a handful of Americans are directly affected by the war or asked to sacrifice for it.

For many, "it feels removed," says Tressa Jones of Needham, Mass., who joined the recent rally in Boston. "It's easy to forget because there hasn't been a draft. It's not wartime in the way we are living.... People aren't collecting scrap metal or growing victory gardens."

Yet scholars of recent controversial wars say that though the Iraq War is far different from Vietnam in many ways, opposition, in fact, developed much sooner.

"Protests against the Iraq war, throughout, have been at a far higher level than they were with regard to Vietnam at comparable stages of the invasions," says Noam Chomsky, the MIT linguist who was an early critic of US involvement in Southeast Asia and often opposes US foreign policy in general.

"It wasn't until late 1967, five years after [President John F. Kennedy's] outright invasion, that a substantial movement became visible – and even then, and in fact until the end, it was mostly focused on the bombing of the North," Dr. Chomsky said in an e-mail. "It's hard to know how to measure effects – we don't have internal records, as in the case of Vietnam – but they have at least kept it visible enough so that most of the population has been in favor of withdrawal."

The Web played an important part in defeating war supporters in Congress last November, which in turn led to the current Democratic majority there.

One significant development: Thanks to e-mail and the Internet being available to most troops in Iraq and their families back home, the war can be very immediate to many Americans. That keeps many fighting men and women more politically aware and engaged than in past wars.

As a result, more American troops now disapprove of President Bush's handling of the war than approve of it, according to a recent Military Times poll.

"When the military was feeling most optimistic about the war – in 2004 – 83 percent of poll respondents thought success in Iraq was likely," Military Times reports. Now, " that number has shrunk to 50 percent. Only 35 percent of the military members polled this year said they approve of the way Bush is handling the war, and 42 percent said they disapprove."

At the same time, according to the poll, the number of military respondents who identify with the Republican Party has dropped from 60 percent in 2004 to 46 percent today.

On Tuesday, two active duty servicemen – Navy Petty Officer Jonathan Hutto and Marine Corps Sergeant Liam Madden, who served in two tours in Iraq – presented to Congress more than 1,000 signatures from active duty and Reserve troops in support of "the prompt withdrawal of all American military forces and bases from Iraq." The day before, about a dozen of those troops held a press conference at a Unitarian Church in Norfolk, Va., to voice their opposition to the war.

Those are relatively small numbers compared with the 140,000 US troops currently in Iraq. But it's the kind of act that gets public and political notice. And it echoes 1969, when 1,366 active duty troops signed a full-page ad in The New York Times opposing the war in Vietnam.

Around the country next week, Veterans for Peace will launch an antiwar effort based on a constitutional argument. Organizers will target Democratic lawmakers – especially those in leadership positions like House Speaker Pelosi.

"The Constitution is being violated," says Vietnam veteran Lee Thorn of San Francisco, referring to allegations that the US has tortured prisoners as well as what he calls infringements of civil liberties. "It's our duty as those who've taken an oath to defend the Constitution to continue."

Later in the week, a large "mobilization" of antiwar groups is planned in Washington.

In Baghdad, Pressing To Meet, With Iraqi Help, Pentagon's Own Standard For Force Levels (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — When Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus assumes his duties as the new American commander in Iraq, he will be guided by a new military doctrine on counterinsurgency that makes the security of the population a chief objective.

But a pressing question that is likely to emerge when the Senate takes up his confirmation next week is whether the administration's new Iraq strategy will draw on enough forces to ensure security — as measured against the general's own guidelines.

The additional five combat brigades that would be sent to Baghdad under President Bush's strategy would roughly double the size of the American force involved in the security operation there, about 15,000 troops. But as a whole, that would still represent only a small portion of the 120,000-strong force that would be required to secure the entire capital according to the force ratios outlined in the military's new field manual for counterinsurgency, which General Petraeus helped to draft.

Interviews with military officers suggest that the Bush administration can come close to meeting the manual's guidelines by relying heavily on the efforts of Iraqi security forces and concentrating the effort on key neighborhoods. But this means that the strategy will depend greatly on the performance of Iraqi forces, including police units that have often been criticized as ineffectual or under the influence of Shiite militias.

The debate over the administration's Iraq strategy involves much more than troop levels. Some who criticize the plan, like Joseph P. Hoar, a retired Marine general and former head of the Central Command, have argued that it would be foolish to consider sending additional forces until Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki follows through on his program of political reconciliation and reins in the Shiite militias.

"My view is that the Maliki government is ill-equipped to make the needed political changes that might allow the efficacious use of extra troops," General Hoar said.

But the Bush administration has argued that it is not be possible for the Iraqis to take the needed political steps until security is improved, and, in any event, Congress is unlikely to block the deployment of additional forces. So an important question is whether there will be enough troops on hand for the strategy to work.

The goals in counterinsurgency are to protect the population, deprive the insurgents of sanctuary and generally maintain order over a broad area, making it a "manpower-intensive" approach, according to the counterinsurgency manual.

While noting that cases can vary, the manual stipulates a rough rule for determining how many troops are needed: one "counterinsurgent," which could be an American or a soldier or policeman from the "host nation," for every 50 inhabitants. With an estimated population of around six million, Baghdad would require a force of some 120,000 under those guidelines.

A study by John J. McGrath, published last year by the Army's Combat Studies Institute at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., noted that some counterinsurgency campaigns and postwar stability operations had succeeded when the American force level had fallen short of this standard, including the American counterinsurgency effort in the Philippines from 1899 to 1901. Even so, securing Baghdad is an especially challenging mission given the sectarian passions, multiple militias, determined insurgents, high level of crime and weak central government.

The five additional American combat brigades that are to be sent to Baghdad under Mr. Bush's plan would enable the United States to change the nature of its operations in the capital by maintaining a regular presence in some key neighborhoods. Even with the American reinforcements, the numbers show that the effort would require a stepped-up effort by the Iraqis.

Adding the five brigades, at roughly 3,500 soldiers each, would bring the American contribution in Baghdad to about 33,000. Expanding the Iraqi Army in Baghdad by three more brigades would push the number of Iraqi soldiers to around 15,000. American officials say that there are an additional 3,000 American and Iraqi Special Operations forces in the Baghdad area who will be part of the effort. In addition, there are 13,000 Iraqi National Police officers and 22,000 local Iraqi police officers. That would bring the total number of American troops and Iraqi soldiers and policemen to about 86,000 in the capital.

American officials say that the pervasive use of separate ministry security forces and the use of contractors to protect government buildings also needs to be factored into the equation. There are thousands of such personnel, though specific numbers are hard to come by.

According to the military's plan, the forces would also not be distributed evenly across the city but would instead be concentrated in specific sectors. Other American capabilities, like intelligence gathering, would also be enhanced in ways that are not readily quantifiable by the deployment of the additional brigades, military officials say.

Further, military officials said that the strategy should not be considered as purely a numbers game. American commanders are considering a number of steps that would help improve security, including limiting access to specific neighborhoods and establishing "no-drive areas" and weapons-free zones.

Improving the performance of the Iraqis is also an important element of the new strategy. The decision to deploy one or more American battalions with Iraqi Army and police units in each of the nine city sectors that are to be established under the plan is intended to establish the kind of partnership that will improve their performance.

A military officer involved in Iraq war planning said that given the complexity of securing Baghdad he could not say with precision how many forces would be needed to tamp down violence in the city. But the officer said he was convinced that the increase would make an important difference.

But Kalev Sepp, an assistant professor at the Naval Postgraduate School and a former Army Special Forces officer, expressed concern that the effort might be shorthanded.

"Even accounting for the idea of concentrating forces in specific neighborhoods, you still have to account for the possibility that violence will shift to other neighborhoods," he said. "So there is something to the arithmetic that 120,000 security personnel are required. And beyond that there are the issues of quality and political reliability, particularly with the police, in trying to achieve security in the capital."

Military Planners In Iraq May Soon Be Seeing 'Red' (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

FT. LEAVENWORTH, KAN. — While the Bush administration is reworking its overall strategy in Iraq, military leaders in Baghdad are searching for new ways to improve the decisions and choices they make closer to the ground.

The U.S. military has sent to Iraq a five-person team of dedicated skeptics, known in military jargon as a "red team." In a war known for its missteps and unanticipated results, the team will be assigned to review, and question, military operations. It will attempt to predict how enemies will react to various missions and what the unintended consequences might be.

Such teams have been used on an ad-hoc basis to critique specific battle plans. But this team is the first to work full time as devil's advocates, and is the first headed by officers trained as designated skeptics by Ft. Leavenworth's University of Foreign Military and Cultural Studies.

Red teams try to predict how the enemy, known as "red" in military-speak, will react to an American operation.

"A red team is trying to get into the enemy's head," said Gregory Fontenot, director of the Ft. Leavenworth program. "What is the other side liable to do and how are they thinking about the problem?"

In Senate testimony last week, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said a red team had been assigned to examine President Bush's new Iraq security plan "from the enemy's viewpoint." Bush plans to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq, although the increase and new strategy are not expected to be fully in place for several months as the Pentagon routes units into battle.

But red teams go beyond predicting how the insurgency might react.

Team members are trained to think differently from other officers in military planning sessions, said Steven Rotkoff, one of the instructors at Ft. Leavenworth who helped create the course curriculum. Since red team officers are outside the normal staff planning process, they theoretically can look more objectively at it.

"It is very hard to tell someone your baby is ugly and they don't dress them properly," Rotkoff said. "The red team members are valued by their commanders because they do not participate in group-think."

The military's strict hierarchy allows for quick decision making. But it also can prevent insights farther down the pecking order from receiving a fair hearing. With a red team in place, someone is always taking a skeptical look at the commander's ideas, Rotkoff said.

"We struggle with getting out of the comfort zone. To do what we are asking people to do is an unnatural act for the American military," Rotkoff said.

In Iraq, the new red team has begun working for Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, who recently became commander of day-to-day military operations there. The team may also get a higher profile with the arrival of Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, named the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

Petraeus, a supporter of such devil's-advocate approaches, pushed for more creative thinking while heading up key Army training programs at Ft. Leavenworth. Lt. Col. Jeff Ragland, Odierno's red team leader, said that although top officers and junior staff members are intrigued by the new group's mission, some mid-level colonels in Baghdad "seem to be less excited about our existence."

If a team's job is to argue against a particular plan, it becomes easy for other officers to dismiss its suggestions.

As a result, the red team course at Ft. Leavenworth includes instruction on how to criticize without being ignored. And in the field, Ragland's team is trying to figure out how to sugarcoat skepticism.

"At virtually every instance, we have had to present our ideas in an acceptable way, not with the 'sharp stick in the eye' approach," Ragland said.

The course examines conflicts such as the Philippine insurrection in 1899 and the post-World War II occupation of Japan.

The course covers Western and non-Western military theory and teaches anthropology so future red team members can better study other cultures.

In Iraq, for instance, it is the red team's job to think like Iraqis and figure out what might offend them.

"We are not going to make [red team members] anthropologists; we are going to make them understand how ethnocentric they are," Fontenot said. "As soon as you assume the other guy thinks like we do, you are making a mistake."

Military organizations, Fontenot said, are not always good at predicting the after-effects of an operation. Traditionally, no staff officers are specifically assigned to think about long-term consequences.

Among military staffers, there is a tendency to become wedded to a plan and reflexively defend it, rather than critique it from a distance, said Lt. Col. Mark B. Elfendahl, a student in the red team course.

Though the focus of many red teams is to predict an enemy force's reactions, in Iraq it will be just as important to predict how allies might react to a given operation.

Ragland, the red team leader in Iraq, said other staff officers have the ability to critically assess a plan, but they often do not have the time to do so.

"Red teams are a direct, and necessary, response to the current operations tempo," Ragland said, adding that because team members are not invested in military plans, "we have the latitude regarding time and the charter to take this critical look."

At Ft. Leavenworth, Fontenot wants to spread critical thinking throughout the Army.

In the long term, the University of Foreign Military and Cultural Studies aims to influence how all officers think and plan.

For now, Fontenot says he is watching how the red team works in Iraq, and is adjusting the course based on feedback from the field.

"We will have to see how it goes in Iraq," he said. "I know we are doing the right thing. I don't know if we are doing it the right way."

Sunni Allies Give 'qualified Support' For Bush's Iraq Strategy (FT)

By Andrew England

When Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, flew out of the Middle East on Wednesday after a tour of the region to mobilise support for the White House's controversial new Iraq strategy, Arab diplomats were left hoping, rather than expecting, that it might actually achieve something.

Two of the US's most important Sunni allies in the region – Egypt and Saudi Arabia – gave cautious backing to the initiative, while a third, Jordan, reiterated the need for Iraq's Sunni to be given a greater role in their country's political processes.

But the "support" also came with a clear message to Ms Rice in the hope that Washington may finally be ready to listen to its Arab allies – a military solution alone is not enough.

Sunni Arab states have a deep mistrust of Iraq's Shia-dominated regime and are sceptical about its willingness to tackle key issues - including disarming Shia militias and reaching out to Sunni - which they argue are crucial to the country's future.

Saud al-Feisal, the Saudi foreign minister, said while other countries could help, the main responsibility "rests on the Iraqis". Kuwait stressed the importance of Washington attempting dialogue with Syria and Iran, which was recommended by the Iraq Study Group, but rejected by the White House.

Still, given the dire situation in Iraq, as well as concerns about Shia Iran's growing influence in the region, Arab diplomats also accepted they had little option but to give the US strategy "qualified support".

They had already argued against an abrupt US withdrawal, fearing the Iraqi violence would destabilise the entire region, and the core of the plan is the deployment of an additional 21,500 American troops.

"We all feel that we are in the same boat so if America fails it is not our success," Hesham Youssef, a senior official at the Arab League told the FT. "If we do not address all the issues we will fail because even if you put an extra 20,000 soldiers on the streets today, and people do not see a political horizon, then it [may well] be making it more difficult for the insurgents and those advocating violence, but [it will] not deal with the root causes of the conflict."

When Amr Moussa, the league's secretary-general, met Ms Rice in Egypt he told her there were five fundamental points that needed addressing – ensuring the territorial integrity of Iraq; reconciliation; working with Iraqis on a basis of citizenship rather than as Shia, Sunni or Kurd; dealing with the militias; and political issues, including amendments to the constitution to give Sunnis – marginalised since the fall of Saddam Hussein - a greater role.

According to Mr Youssef, Mr Moussa's chief of cabinet, Ms Rice agreed the issues would receive the US's attention. Asked whether Washington would take note, he said: " We hope they will follow these elements with vigour. It's more than hope, it's an expectation."

Another Arab diplomat said Ms Rice accepted the fact that military action alone would not halt the bitter sectarian conflict. However, he said there was caution about whether the words would be translated into action.

A Plausible Plan B (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

If we were allied with an Iraqi government that, however weak, was truly national -- cross-confessional and dedicated to fighting a two-front war against Baathist insurgents and Shiite militias -- a surge of American troops, together with a change of counterinsurgency strategy, would have a good chance of succeeding. Unfortunately, the Iraqi political process has given us Nouri al-Maliki and his Shiite coalition.

Its beginning was inauspicious. Months of wrangling produced a coalition of the three major Shiite religious parties, including that of Moqtada al-Sadr. Given Maliki's legitimacy as the first democratically elected leader of Iraq, however, he was owed a grace period of, say, six months to show whether he could indeed act as a national leader.

By November, his six months were up, and the verdict was clear: He could not. His government is hopelessly sectarian. It protects Sadr, as we saw dramatically when Maliki ordered the lifting of U.S. barricades set up around Sadr City in search of a notorious death squad leader. It is enmeshed with Iran, as we saw when Maliki's government forced us to release Iranian agents found in the compound of one of his coalition partners.

The hanging of Saddam Hussein did not change anything, but it did illuminate the deeply sectarian nature of this government. If it were my choice, I would not "surge" American troops in defense of such a government. I would not trust it to deliver on its promises. Lt. Gen. David Petraeus thinks otherwise. Petraeus, who will be leading our forces in Iraq, has not only served 2 1/2 years there but has also literally written the book on counterinsurgency. He believes that with an augmentation of U.S. troops, a change of tactics and the support of three additional Iraqi brigades, he can pacify Baghdad.

Petraeus wants to change the U.S. counterinsurgency strategy, at least in Baghdad, from simply hunting terrorists to securing neighborhoods. In other words, from search-and-destroy to stay-and-protect. He thinks that he can do this with only a modest increase of five American brigades.

I am confident that Petraeus knows what he's doing and that U.S. troops will acquit themselves admirably. I'm afraid the effort will fail, however, because the Maliki government will undermine it.

The administration view -- its hope -- is that, whatever Maliki's instincts, he can be forced to act in good faith by the prospect of the calamity that will befall him if he lets us down and we carry out our threat to leave. The problem with this logic is that it is contradicted by the president's simultaneous pledge not to leave "before the job is done."

In this high-stakes game of chess, what is missing is some intermediate move on our part -- some Plan B that Maliki believes Bush might actually carry out -- the threat of which will induce him to fully support us in this battle for Baghdad. He won't believe the Bush threat to abandon Iraq. He will believe a U.S. threat of an intermediate redeployment within Iraq that might prove fatal to him but not necessarily to the U.S. interest there.

We need to define that intermediate strategy. Right now there are only three policies on the table: (1) the surge, which a majority of Congress opposes, (2) the status quo, which everybody opposes, and (3) the abandonment of Iraq, which appears to be the default Democratic alternative.

What is missing is a fourth alternative, both as a threat to Maliki and as an actual fallback if the surge fails. The Pentagon should be working on a sustainable Plan B whose major element would be not so much a drawdown of troops as a drawdown of risk to our troops. If we had zero American casualties a day, there would be as little need to withdraw from Iraq as there is to withdraw from the Balkans.

We need to find a redeployment strategy that maintains as much latent American strength as possible, but with minimal exposure. We say to Maliki: Let us down, and we dismantle the Green Zone, leave Baghdad and let you fend for yourself; we keep the airport and certain strategic bases in the area; we redeploy most of our forces to Kurdistan; we maintain a significant presence in Anbar province, where we are having success in our one-front war against al-Qaeda and the Baathists. Then we watch. You can have your Baghdad civil war without us. We will be around to pick up the pieces as best we can.

This is not a great option, but fallbacks never are. It does have the virtue of being better than all the others, if the surge fails. It has the additional virtue of increasing the chances that the surge will succeed.

Tell The Troops (NYT)

It is bad enough for troops in Iraq to learn that their tours of duty have been extended. It is terrible for them to have to hear about it from loved ones at home rather than from their military commanders.

This is what happened to about 150 New Jersey National Guard troops who had been scheduled to return home in March after having served in Iraq for a year. Their tours of duty were extended for up to 125 days as a result of President Bush's decision to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq.

A day after Mr. Bush announced the troop increase in a televised speech, the National Guard in New Jersey told family members that their relatives would have to stay on. The news quickly made it back to the troops in Iraq through anguished phone calls and e-mail.

Not until Sunday — four days after Mr. Bush's speech — were the troops notified by their Army commanders, after Gov. Jon Corzine of New Jersey made two phone calls to Army officials.

Mr. Corzine, who had learned of the lapse from outraged family members, said that Pentagon officials expressed regret and blamed the delay on a "breakdown in the chain of command on the ground in Iraq." The governor rightly called what happened "unacceptable."

But given all that has gone wrong with the misguided American adventure in Iraq, the foul-up is hardly surprising. It's one more sensitive issue that has been insensitively and unfairly mishandled.

Never Miss An Appointment, Or An At-Large Terrorist, Again (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Tired of all the cuddly baby polar bears, redwoods, waterfalls and other standard glossy photos on those daily planners you got for Christmas? Want a little something different to jump-start your day?

Then how about having your morning java looking at mug shots of Osama bin Laden and other wanted terrorists and learning how to recognize whether that muscle weakness is from yesterday's workout or perhaps botulism poisoning.

Yes, it's the National Counterterrorism Center's 2007 daily planner, "the largest since the calendar first appeared in a daily planner format in 2003," the introduction says.

No. 1 terrorist bin Laden -- with a $27 million reward "for information leading directly to" his being taken out of business -- is of course still there.

In fact, pretty much all the most-wanted folks are still there, year after year, including Faker Ben Abdelaziz Boussora, still with the $5 million reward offer, still with those "prominently protruding ears and . . . believed to have a serious pituitary gland illness."

A notable exception is Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, killed in a U.S. airstrike on June 7. But "despite the turnover in leadership," the calendar notes in an excellent turn of phrase, "as of October 2006 [al-Qaeda in Iraq] had claimed over 5,000 attacks . . . with no evidence of a change in strategy or tactics." And there are reports that Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, wanted for the bombings of U.S. embassies in Africa in 1998, may have been taken out in recent U.S. airstrikes in Somalia.

Osama is still listed as living in Pakistan, maintaining his trim 160-pound figure. His deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, is still hanging out in Afghanistan. And Mullah Omar, who seems to be giving e-mail interviews to journalists these days, insists that he is in Afghanistan, but the Afghans claim he's on the lam in Pakistan.

The NCTC is a great planning guide. Those who have it, for example, know there's a big three-day weekend coming up to celebrate Feb. 3, 2000, which is when "Syria and Sudan sign agreement on fighting terrorism in compliance with Arab Antiterrorism Convention" and the landmark Feb. 5, 2001, accord signed by Algeria and France "to cooperate in fighting terrorism." So you can take that Monday off.

The beautiful calendar "is designed for anyone concerned with terrorism or threat: law enforcement, intelligence, military, security personnel, contingency planners, or simply citizens concerned by terrorist threats," the introduction says.

But the public can get only the electronic version. That's at http://www.nctc.gov. You can download it even in northwestern Pakistan.

It's available to others at undisclosed locations.

A Softer Hard Line on Nukes

Meanwhile, the buzz, amongst those who know where those locations are, is that Kenneth C. Brill, a career diplomat who has been in the director of national intelligence's office as the director of the National Counterproliferation Center, is rejoining his pal, Deputy Secretary of State-designate John Negroponte.

Brill is said to be the likely pick to replace the outgoing undersecretary for arms control and international security, Robert Joseph. The move is seen as a potentially huge change on nonproliferation stances, focusing more on diplomacy and less on confrontation. Brill frequently crossed swords with Bush administration harder-liners on policies toward North Korea and Iraq.Confirm Two, Get One Free

Rumblings on the Senate side are that Gen. George Casey's confirmation as Army chief of staff is going to be a tough sell, especially with the Democrats in charge. And it's not just the Democrats that need to be sold. Even some Armed Services Committee Republicans are uneasy about this one.

"Gee whiz, the chief of staff of the Army is the guy everybody looks up to," Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) told our colleague Tom Ricks. "We were under Casey's leadership over there for the last three years," the senator said, referring to Iraq, "and it hasn't gone well." Chambliss said that he hasn't made up his mind whether to support the nomination.

There's even talk that the administration is concerned Casey is unconfirmable with the Senate in the mood it's in. So the White House may try to move Casey's nomination and that of Adm. William J. Fallon to head Centcom as a package along with the nomination of highly regarded Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to lead U.S. forces in Iraq.

The Wisdom of Lisa Simpson

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice didn't seem to be trying to make much news on her swing this week through the Middle East. Still, she offered an interesting take on what she called "a challenging time" in the region, our colleague Glenn Kessler reported.

"I don't read Chinese, but I am told that the Chinese character for crisis is weiji, which means both danger and opportunity," Rice pontificated on Tuesday. "And I think that states it very well. We'll try to maximize the opportunity."

Rice did not say where she learned this aphorism, but oddly enough it was once featured on "The Simpsons," as this excerpt from an episode shows:

Lisa: "Look on the bright side, Dad. Did you know that the Chinese use the same word for 'crisis' as they do for 'opportunity'?"

Homer: "Yes! Cris-atunity."

Chinese scholars actually dispute that oft-cited interpretation of the word.

In any event, echoing Lisa Simpson on the Middle East or on the Chinese language may not be a great idea.Dedicated Strictly to House Members

Mahdi Army Expressing Siege Mentality (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

DOJ_NMG_0118621

AP, January 19, 2007

Mahdi Army fighters said Thursday they were under siege in their Sadr City stronghold as U.S. and Iraqi troops killed or seized key commanders in pinpoint nighttime raids. Two commanders of the Shiite militia said Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has stopped protecting the group under pressure from Washington and threats from Sunni Muslim Arab governments.

The two commanders' account of a growing siege mentality inside the organization could represent a tactical and propaganda feint, but there was mounting evidence the militia was increasingly off balance and had ordered its gunmen to melt back into the population. To avoid capture, commanders report no longer using cell phones and fighters are removing their black uniforms and hiding their weapons during the day.

During much of his nearly eight months in office, al-Maliki has blocked or ordered an end to many U.S.-led operations against the Mahdi Army, which is run by radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, the prime minister's key political backer.

As recently as Oct. 31, al-Maliki, trying to capitalize on American voter discontent with the war and White House reluctance to open a public fight with the Iraqi leader just before the election, won U.S. agreement to lift military blockades on Sadr City and another Shiite enclave where an American soldier was abducted.

But al-Maliki reportedly had a change of heart in late November while going into a meeting in Jordan with President Bush. It has since been disclosed that the Iraqi leader's vision for a new security plan for Baghdad, to which Bush has committed 17,500 additional U.S. troops, was outlined in that meeting.

Al-Maliki is said by aides to have told Bush that he wanted the Iraqi army and police to be in the lead, but he would no longer interfere to prevent U.S. attempts to roll up the Mahdi Army.

In a meeting before his session with Bush, Jordan's King Abdullah II was said by al-Maliki confidants to have conveyed the increasing anger of fellow Sunni leaders in the Middle East over the continuing slaughter of Sunni Muslims at the hands of Shiite death squads.

Until February, much of the violence in Iraq was the work of al-Qaida in Iraq and allied Sunni organizations. They had killed thousands of Shiites in random bomb attacks in what was seen as an al-Qaida bid to foment civil war.

When al-Qaida bombers blew up the Golden Dome mosque, an important Shiite shrine in the mainly Sunni city of Samarra on Feb. 22, Shiite militiamen, especially the Mahdi Army fighters based in Sadr City, stormed out of the poor enclave in a drive for revenge that has only grown in ferocity.

The U.N. reported this week that the sectarian fighting killed more than 34,000 Iraqis last year, a figure that was criticized but not disputed Thursday by the Iraqi government.

With the Sunni threat in mind, evidence since the meetings in Jordan indicates that al-Maliki has kept his pledge to Bush that there would be no further interference in favor of Shiite militias.

On Wednesday, the prime minister said 400 Mahdi Army fighters had been detained in recent months, although an exact timeframe was not given.

The midlevel Mahdi Army commanders, who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because the group operates in secret, said at least five top commanders of similar standing were captured or killed in recent months, including one snatched in a night raid from his Sadr City hide-out on Tuesday. They refused to name him.

Two other key officials at the top of the organization were killed in raids last month:

• Sahib al-Amiri, a senior al-Sadr military aide, was slain by American forces in the Shiite holy city of Najaf on Dec. 27. The U.S. military reported his death, calling him a criminal involved roadside bombings. Al-Sadr lives in Najaf.

• The other top commander, identified by a third Mahdi Army commander as Abu al-Sudour, was shot to death in a joint U.S.-Iraqi raid last month as well. He was hunted down in Sadr City.

The third commander, who also spoke anonymously to protect his identity, said U.S.-led raiding parties were now also engaged in massive sweeps, having rounded up what he said was every male old enough to carry a gun in south Baghdad's Um al-Maalef neighborhood Tuesday night.

The U.S. military spokesman, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, alluded to the tactics early this month when he was asked by the AP if the coming security operation would focus on pinpoint raids or broader military engagements.

"It'll be a combination of targeted killings and more traditional large-force operations," Caldwell said.

There has been so much advance publicity about the coming security plan, major speeches by both Bush and al-Maliki, that the militant targets of the operation — both Sunni insurgents and Shiite militiamen — have had ample warning the U.S. and Iraqi militaries are drawing a bead.

One of the Mahdi Army commanders who spoke with the AP said the early warning was not ignored.

"Our top leadership has told us to lay low and not confront the Americans. But if Sadr City is attacked, if civilians are hurt, we will ignore those orders and take matters in our own hands. We won't need orders from Sheik Muqtada (al-Sadr)," the midlevel commander said.

Others in the organization said street fighters have been told not to wear their black uniforms and to hide their weapons, to make their checkpoints less visible. Reports from the growing number of neighborhoods controlled by the militias indicate fighters are obeying.

Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, said the security strategy and the additional American forces would allow the crackdown to be sufficiently broad to sweep up those who try to escape Baghdad and operate elsewhere.

"On the militia, the Baghdad plan itself is integrated to a holistic, countrywide plan that the multinational corps is developing. And security for Baghdad won't just come from securing the inside of Baghdad," Casey said at a briefing on Monday.

"It comes from the support zones around the outside as far away, as you suggest, Baqouba and Ramadi and Fallujah. It goes all the way out to the borders to stop the flow of foreign fighters and support coming in there."

The Mahdi Army commanders said they were increasingly concerned about improved U.S. intelligence that has allowed the Americans to successfully target key figures in the militia.

"We're no longer using cell phones except in emergencies. Some of our top commanders have not been home (in Sadr City) for a year because they fear capture," one of the commanders said.

The militiamen said al-Sadr himself had apparently gotten wind of the coming assault and ordered a reshuffling of the Mahdi Army command structure, transferring many leaders to new districts and firing others who were of suspect loyalty.

While Shiite militiamen were less in evidence on Baghdad streets, Sunni insurgents continued their bomb and shooting attacks in Shiite regions and Shiite death squads remained active at night.

Police reported a total of 59 people killed or found dead Thursday, with the single largest toll from a triple car bombing that killed 10 in a wholesale vegetable market in a south Baghdad Shiite neighborhood. Twenty-seven bodies were found dumped in Baghdad, 19 on the largely Sunni west side of the Tigris, eight on the mainly Shiite east bank.

An al-Qaida-linked coalition of Sunni insurgents claimed responsibility for a Wednesday attack in Baghdad on a convoy of a Western democracy institute. The ambush killed an American woman and three security contractors. The woman was identified as Andrea Parhamovich, 28, of Perry, Ohio.

Officials Predict Shiite Militia Will Lower Profile In Baghdad (WP)

By Walter Pincus And Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

U.S. intelligence leaders told Congress yesterday that Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr will probably lower the profile of his powerful militia in Baghdad and watch to see whether the new U.S.-Iraqi strategy of placing more troops in the city is aimed at uncontrolled violence or specifically at him and his organization.

"There's a clear indication at the present time he's not looking for contacts with coalition forces," CIA Director Michael V. Hayden told the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence yesterday. "And to the degree he controls Jaish al-Mahdi -- and that's a very important factor -- to the degree that he controls this, he's trying not to bait us or confront us into confrontation."

Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, delivered a similar message about Sadr and his organization, which is also known as the Mahdi Army. "They will probably reduce their level of activity in the near term in order to see what's going to happen, how it's going to happen, particularly in Baghdad. And I think they will continue to operate in other parts of Iraq to further establish their influence over the Shia population," he said.

A key element of President Bush's explanation for putting up to 21,500 additional troops in Iraq is disarming militias that are operating outside the government's security forces. U.S. military commanders have reported there are up to 23 separate militias operating inside Baghdad, many of which are associated with Sadr's Mahdi Army.

The administration has been pressuring Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who gained his office with Sadr's support, to take strong action against Sadr's militia members, who have been accused of sending death squads into Sunni neighborhoods in Baghdad.

At a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing yesterday, retired Marine Corps Gen. Joseph P. Hoar, who commanded U.S. forces in the buildup to the Persian Gulf War, said that no additional U.S. troops should be sent to Iraq unless Maliki disarms militias, including Sadr's, and cleans them out of the Iraqi security services. "If he's not committed to make hard choices early on, there's no chance in pulling this thing off," Hoar said.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, spokesman for the U.S military command in Iraq, told a group of Washington Post reporters and editors yesterday that he is worried that the American public will be impatient with the temporary buildup of U.S. troops in Iraq. "I for one am personally very concerned that expectations have been raised so high that people are going to look for some kind of immediate results in the next 30 to 60 days and are not going to see it," Caldwell said.

He warned that the buildup is "not the long-term solution" to security in Iraq and said that its primary purpose is to allow the U.S. military to accelerate the transition to Iraqi government control of its own forces this summer and fall rather than in 2008. "We've got to . . . let go of the reins," he said. The additional U.S. troops will also help the U.S. military to increase and expand its teams of advisers embedded with Iraqi units, which he said will have an "open-ended commitment" in Iraq.

Iraq plans to add 37,000 troops to its army starting this spring to fill out the ranks of its 10 divisions, as attrition, combat losses and leave mean many units have only half to 70 percent of their manpower available day to day. It will also create an 11th army division, "which they desperately need," Caldwell said, that will be a "much more mobile, much more responsive" force than the others.

Last year, some Iraqi units ordered to help quell violence in Baghdad "completely disintegrated" as soldiers refused to go, he said. U.S. commanders realized that "gosh, we built an army that's not mobile," Caldwell said. He called the government's recent success in getting one battalion of about 500 Iraqi troops to Baghdad "an incredible step forward," and said whether the government can fulfill its pledge to muster three more brigades of Iraqi troops for Baghdad is "a real test."

Yesterday, Maliki announced that Iraqi-U.S. military operations had resulted in the arrests of some 400 members of Sadr's militia, but it was in southern Iraq, where competing Shiite factions are fighting for control of towns and cities.

Iraq's Planned Budget Divisive Too (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi And Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

BAGHDAD — It's budget time in Iraq, and the lively debates that have erupted would strike a familiar chord for observers of such talks in any American statehouse or European parliament.

But war-ravaged Iraq is no ordinary country, and the murkiness surrounding many items in the proposed 2007 budget has contributed to the general distrust between sectarian factions as well as widespread doubts about the ability of the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to manage the nation.

Nearly $2 billion of the budget is allocated to agencies beyond the oversight of the central government at a time when potential international donors have balked at tossing more money into what has been viewed as a black hole.

The potential for abuse is high. Most ministries get multimillion-dollar discretionary funds known as "social benefits" with few spending safeguards, Iraqi officials say.

Item of contention

The $41-billion budget, a copy of which was obtained by the Los Angeles Times, also includes money to assist the families of those killed and imprisoned under the regime of the late Saddam Hussein. The Shiite Muslim-sponsored provision has proved so offensive to Sunni Arab lawmakers that they have threatened to loudly condemn the entire spending plan unless benefits are also provided to prisoners who were abused by American troops at the Abu Ghraib prison and to those killed in U.S. military operations since the toppling of Hussein's Sunni-dominated government in 2003.

"If they do not change this particular law, we will not vote for the budget," said Alaa Saddoun, a Sunni lawmaker in the sect's main parliamentary bloc.

Iraq's budget is loaded with potentially divisive expenditures, some with sectarian overtones, as well as vaguely worded spending items that have raised the eyebrows of Iraqi lawmakers.

The budget debate comes as the U.S. proposes to pour an additional $1 billion into Iraqi reconstruction efforts and has been pressuring skeptical international donors to pitch in financially. At a time when suspicions are rife about government graft, the proposed budget trims the office of the Public Integrity Commission by 13%.

Maliki this week sent lawmakers a letter urging them to approve the budget quickly, and a vote could come next week.

But even the prime minister's closest political allies have raised tough questions about the proposed budget, which is 21% larger than last year's. The budget does not include $8 billion allocated to ministries last year that have yet to be spent on reconstruction projects around the country held up because of security worries. It also fails to incorporate funds donated by the international community, including the U.S.

Iraqi budget planners complained that they simply couldn't get figures such as how much Washington was contributing to Iraqi agriculture, even when they asked for them.

The budget, which would be largely funded with a projected $30 billion in oil revenue, about $1 billion in taxes and fees and the $8 billion left over from last year, does call for an ambitious 60% increase, to $10 billion, of funds for improving infrastructure.

"We don't want to spend all the government's income on paying salaries and handouts," Maliki told reporters this week. "We want to encourage investment — especially in the field of electricity and oil."

But many observers scoffed at the reconstruction figure, arguing that it would be impossible to spend so much money amid the daily gunfights, banditry and terrorism afflicting eight of the country's 18 provinces and its three largest cities.

Gross incompetence has also been a factor in the failure to spend allocated funds.

"Many key ministries have been unable to expend budget resources on capital improvements and are running large surpluses due in part to an ineffective procurement process and the inability to carry out fair, competitive contracting," a report by the U.S. Government Accountability Office said.

Some said the Iraqi government would be better off pumping money into services and salaries, giving jobs to needy youths.

"I think first the budget wasn't based on pure mathematics but merely opinion," said Hassan Senaid, one of Maliki's staunchest parliamentary supporters. "I think that many of the ministries will not be able to spend all their money."

The biggest chunk

The security forces account for the biggest chunk of Iraq's proposed budget. Year-to-year spending for the Sunni-led Defense Ministry would stay the same, at about $4 billion; whereas funds for the Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry, which oversees the police, would rise 25%, to $2.6 billion.

"This reflects our economic strategy," said Kamal Basri, a financial advisor to the Iraqi government. "The most important thing is security."

The budget would double, to $200 million, the allocation for the Kurdish-controlled Foreign Ministry, increasing the payroll of embassies ninefold as the country attempts to re-integrate itself into the international community.

Health and education spending would go up more than 50% as Iraq attempts to address its vast social problems. But the country would spend a mere $6 million on handling the burgeoning problem of families displaced by the country's sectarian civil war, about the same figure as last year.

Lawmakers were most perplexed at the 100% increase in the budget of national security advisor Mowaffak Rubaie. His title, many say, dwarfs the tiny role he plays.

"I think that he wants 10 undersecretaries and 30 director-general positions while he only has three rooms for offices, which is insufficient for all the people to sit," Senaid said.

Government officials say they have made a serious effort to be more transparent.

Much of the $2 billion in unspecified spending would go toward paying off Iraq's debt as well as for people's daily food rations and subsidies for provincial governments, the officials say. But many lawmakers worry that the funds come without safeguards.

"It's cloudy, unclear," said Bassem Sharif Hocheimi, a Shiite lawmaker and outspoken reformer. "This might lead to problems and corruption. We want to allocate more money for the governorates [provinces]. They're in bad shape. But how can we monitor corruption in those governments?"

Lawmakers also have questioned the "social benefits" funds in the budget proposal. Basri said they were discretionary accounts that ministers could use to reward exemplary employees. But worried about their potential for abuse, he sent out a memo to ministers saying that no single employee could receive more than $190 a month from the funds. "That made me a rather unpopular person," he said.

The proposed budget allocates $126 million for religious foundations, with equal amounts for Sunni and Shiite Muslim charities even though the country's Shiites make up the majority of the nation's population. But that goodwill gesture was offset by the most explosive item in the budget, the $230 million allocated to victims of the Hussein government.

Critics argue that the law creating the restitution agencies was passed before the permanent government of Iraq was elected in December 2005 and needs to be revisited by the current batch of lawmakers.

They also wonder about oversight. Iraq's ministries typically appoint an inspector general who looks out for corruption and favoritism. But the proposed organizations, known as the Martyrs Institute and the Prisoners Institute, for doling out money to victims of the former regime may not have such monitors.

"We have a problem with this," said Salim Abdullah Jabouri, a spokesman for the Sunni bloc. "Who has been harmed? Who's defining the prisoners? This is a huge amount of money."

Still, even having such discussions shows genuine democratic progress, Iraqi government officials say. And most acknowledge that the budget battle could have been much worse, given the charged sectarian atmosphere.

Budget planners in the prime minister's office successfully resisted pressure by Shiite hard-liners to allocate funds to provinces based on a formula that would take into account not just population figures, but also the amount of suffering each region endured under Hussein's government.

"How do you calculate suffering?" said Basri, the government advisor, who is a British-educated economist and also the head of an economic think tank. "That was the problem."

Iraq Signals Changes In Protocols With Iran (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 18 — Iraq is carrying out an extensive review of its diplomatic protocols with Iran and may place new restrictions on them, the Iraqi foreign minister said in an interview on Thursday, after Iranian military officials and diplomats were picked up in three separate American actions here.

The raids have deeply embarrassed Iraqi officials, who say that the United States did not consult with them before it detained the Iranians, who were properly accredited visitors to this country. At the same time, Iraqi officials have been put in an awkward position by their neighbor, as the Iraqis concede that at least some of the Iranians appear to have been working with Shiite militias, just as the Americans claimed.

As a result, Iraq has decided to tighten diplomatic controls on Iranian officials, insisting on detailed itineraries for their missions here, closer coordination with Baghdad and pledges that the officials will not work with armed groups outside the government, said Hoshyar Zebari, the foreign minister.

Iraq may also demand that visits by Iranian officials be personally approved by the prime minister, Mr. Zebari said. He said this category would include the Iranian Revolutionary Guard, which the United States denounces as a terrorist organization but Iraqis regard as an indispensable player because it is among the most influential organizations in Iran.

Despite differences over the Guard, Iraq has signaled its intention to review its protocols with Iran in light of the American raids, even calling its ambassador to Tehran back to Baghdad to work on the changes, Mr. Zebari said.

"We informed them very clearly after the first incident that there are a number of agreements we are going to review, and you should be very careful," Mr. Zebari said. "Yes, they have been notified."

The first of the three episodes began on Dec. 20 near the evening curfew when American forces stopped a car carrying two Iranian diplomats and some guards. Early the next morning, American forces raided the compound of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite leaders, and detained a number of Iraqis with two Iranians who turned out to be members of the Revolutionary Guard.

The diplomats were soon released, but the military officials, who the United States said were directly linked to attacks on Americans, were asked to leave the country by Iraq only after a nine-day diplomatic crisis involving the three countries. Finally, a week ago, the Americans raided what was described as a diplomatic liaison office in the northern city of Erbil and detained six Iranians. Mr. Zebari said Thursday that just one of them had been released.

The United States later asserted that the other five were indeed members of the Revolutionary Guard, which it described as "an organization known for providing funds, weapons, improvised explosive device technology and training to extremist groups."

On Thursday, the United States also said that it had entered the grounds of the Sudanese Embassy in Baghdad as part of an operation "aimed at denying insurgents safe haven to carry out attacks against Iraqi security forces and Iraqi citizens." No further details were available.

The Iranian Foreign Ministry in Tehran and the Iranian Embassy in Baghdad have generally said little, although on Thursday an Iranian Embassy office manager who often answers the phone, but refuses to give his name, said that Mr. Zebari, a Kurd, had given assurances that the Iranians detained in Erbil would soon be released.

But in the interview, Mr. Zebari said he had little information on that issue except that American forces generally release detainees in 10 days or so if there is no evidence of wrongdoing. He said that the United States had a right to investigate people suspected of attacks but added, "We, as the Iraqi government, are treading a fine line."

"On the one hand we understand the U.S. position," he continued. "On the other hand, I understand my geographic position as well," he said, referring to the border with Iran. After the raids, he said, the Iranians "come to us and we are incapable of responding."

Mr. Zebari said that as Iraq reviewed its diplomatic relationship with Iran, the standing agreement that 1,500 religious pilgrims a day can enter this country was unlikely to change. But the number of entry points could be reduced as a way of keeping closer tabs on the traffic, he said.

Visitors with diplomatic passports will be required to give a clear accounting of the nature of their mission in Iraq and the likely length of their stay, he said. Political visitors might be required to gain the permission of the prime minister, further clarifying visits that could catch the Americans' notice, he said.

The two Revolutionary Guards captured in the Baghdad raid had duly applied for Iraqi visas under an Iranian diplomatic note in October, Mr. Zebari said. But he added that there "could have been better clarification" of what the officials were actually doing in Iraq, and he conceded that they had not been truthful about their mission here.

For the first time, Mr. Zebari disclosed the total number of Iranian diplomats operating officially in Iraq. There are 36 in the embassy in Baghdad, he said, along with 11 at the consulate in Karbala and 9 at another consulate in Basra.

The officials detained at the liaison office in Erbil did not have diplomatic status, he said. As part of its review, the Foreign Ministry plans to turn the liaison offices in Iraq into consulates, giving them official diplomatic status, he said. He added that it was unclear how many of the liaison offices there were around the country, but said that they operated openly.

"This wasn't something hidden, secretive," Mr. Zebari said.

Insurgents In Iraq Claim Convoy Attack (AP)

By Maamoun Youssef

AP, January 19, 2007

An al-Qaida-linked coalition of Iraqi Sunni insurgents claimed responsibility Thursday for an attack in Baghdad on a convoy of a Western democracy institute that killed a 28-year-old Ohio woman and three security contractors.

DOJ_NMG_0118627

The Washington-based National Democratic Institute identified its slain staffer as Andrea Parhamovich of Perry, Ohio. Contractors from Hungary, Croatia and Iraq also were killed in the ambush Wednesday. Two other people were wounded, one seriously.

Parhamovich, a graduate of Marietta College in central Ohio, had been working with NDI in Iraq since late 2006 as a communications specialist advising Iraqi political parties on how to reach out to voters and constituents. She was helping "build the kind of national level political institutions that can help bridge the sectarian divide and improve Iraqi lives," NDI said.

In the rural neighborhood where Parhamovich's parents live, David Rolfes of NDI and Parhamovich's brother-in-law, Joe Zampini, stood at a church across the road and asked reporters not to approach the family's home. Zampini appealed for privacy and said the family was in seclusion.

The community of about 1,100 people, about 35 miles east of Cleveland, is known for its many flower nurseries and greenhouses that take up acres of land, as well as being home to a FirstEnergy Corp. nuclear power plant.

"It's a sad time," said Perry High School principal Doug Jenkins, the middle school principal when Parhamovich attended the senior high school.

Tom Perry, spokesman for Marietta College, knew Parhamovich when she worked in the liberal art school's media relations office as a student.

"So it hit us as hard as anybody here because we knew her so well," Perry said.

"We saw what an excellent person she was, and she obviously had a passion for something and wanted to go there and be a part of it," Perry said. "We're proud she wanted to do this. It shows it's not just the soldiers who are in harm's way."

Perry said Parhamovich, who was known as Andi, graduated in 2000 with a degree in advertising and public relations with a minor in journalism. She worked for film company Miramax in New York for a short time, he said.

A statement released by NDI said Parhamovich also worked in the Massachusetts governor's office, at Air America Radio and at the International Republican Institute in Iraq before joining NDI's Baghdad staff in late 2006.

NDI's chairman, former Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright, said, "There is no more sacred roll of honor than those who have given their last full measure in support of freedom. Yesterday, in Iraq, Andrea Parhamovich and our security personnel were enshrined on that list.

"They did not see themselves as heroes, only people doing a job on behalf of a cause they believed in. They were not the enemies of anyone in Iraq; they were there to help," Albright said.

The institute supports democratic processes and institutions worldwide. Its staffers in Baghdad run training programs in democracy and political participation, as well as women's rights. The group has had staffers in Iraq since June 2003.

Gunmen opened fire on the three-vehicle convoy on Wednesday in Yarmouk, a predominantly Sunni neighborhood in western Baghdad.

"Praise be to God, in an attack with light and medium weapons and RPG's in the Yarmouk area in Baghdad on Jan. 17, two SUVs belonging to the Zionist Mossad were destroyed and a third one was severely damaged," said a statement posted Thursday on an Islamic Web site.

The statement was signed by the spokesman of the "Islamic state in Iraq," the so-called Islamic government that al-Qaida in Iraq and several other Iraqi Sunni Arab insurgent groups declared earlier last year. The statement was posted on a Web forum where Sunni insurgents often release messages.

A U.S. official said that the statement's authenticity could not be determined.

Its purported author — Islamic state in Iraq — is considered al-Qaida in Iraq's political arm, said the official, who did not want to be identified because of the information's sensitivity.

Creation of the group in October was taken as a propaganda move and a signal of al-Qaida in Iraq's interest in unifying all Sunni jihadists under one umbrella, but the official said some Sunni groups haven't embraced the new organization.

In its Web statement, the group did not say anything about how many were killed or their nationalities, but al-Qaida usually refers to foreigners whose nationalities it does not know as members of the Mossad, the Israeli spy agency.

Parhamovich was the first full-time worker for the group to be killed in Iraq. A security contractor for the organization was killed in March 2004.

According to insurance claims on file at the Department of Labor, 770 civilian contractors have been killed in Iraq since the war began in March 2003 through Dec. 31 and 7,761 civilian contractors have been injured. The contractors include foreign workers.

Sunni Insurgent Group Asserts It Killed American (WP)

By Ernesto Londo?o And Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 18 -- A Sunni insurgent group linked to the group al-Qaeda in Iraq asserted responsibility Thursday for the killing of an Ohio woman working in Baghdad who died Wednesday after her convoy was attacked, according to a posting on a Web site used by some Sunni groups.

Andrea "Andi" Parhamovich, 28, of Perry, Ohio, who worked for the nonprofit National Democratic Institute, was killed along with three non-American security workers, according to a statement released by the institute.

"There is no more sacred roll of honor than those who have given their last full measure in support of freedom," Madeleine K. Albright, the NDI chairman and former secretary of state, said in a statement. "Yesterday, in Iraq, Andrea Parhamovich and our security personnel were enshrined in that list. They were not the enemies of anyone in Iraq. They were there to help."

The authenticity of the assertion of responsibility, signed by a spokesman for a group called the Islamic State in Iraq, could not be independently verified. The group released an 18-minute audiotape last year claiming support from tribal sheiks and previously independent insurgent groups.

Parhamovich is at least the fifth American civilian woman killed in Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

She graduated from Marietta College in Ohio and held jobs in the Massachusetts governor's office, that state's Department of Economic Development and Air America Radio before arriving in Baghdad in September. She moved to Iraq to take a job at the International Republican Institute but left last month to join NDI.

"An outgoing woman who made friends quickly, Andi wanted to use her education and skills as a communications specialist to help Iraqi political party leaders and parliamentarians develop strategies to reach out to voters and constituents," the organization said in the statement.

NDI began operating in Baghdad in June 2003. It has worked to promote civic participation and strengthen the country's political parties, legislature and executive branch.

The killing of Parhamovich occurred as Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has been striving to show that his government has taken meaningful steps toward improving security.

In an interview Wednesday, he highlighted what he described as a series of operations carried out in recent days that he said had led to the arrests of 430 fighters of the Mahdi Army militia, which is led by Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, one of Maliki's political supporters.

A spokesman for Sadr acknowledged in an interview Thursday that 425 of his group's fighters had been arrested, but he disputed Maliki's assertion that the arrests occurred in recent days. The spokesman, Abdul Razak al-Nadawi, said the 425 include Mahdi Army members arrested after a fierce battle in August 2004 in Najaf, a city south of Baghdad that has long been a Sadr stronghold. Since the beginning of 2006, the Iraqi government has arrested 96 people, the spokesman said.

"These are exact numbers," he said. "We have a record because every one of those detainees there has a monthly salary" that goes to their families.

Also Thursday, Iraqi and Iranian officials criticized the arrest of five men by U.S. forces last week at an Iranian facility in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil. Iraqi officials said the facility was in the process of becoming an accredited consular mission.

Hassan Kazemi Qomi, Iran's ambassador to Iraq, said he had been told the five Iranian officials would be released in "coming days" and condemned the United States for arresting them. "There is a sovereign government in Iraq. Why are the Americans violating the sovereignty of Iraq?" asked Qomi, making his first public comments on the incident during a news conference.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari has said the Iranians were not accredited diplomats but worked in a liaison office performing consular services under the approval of the Kurdish regional government.

Lou Fintor, a spokesman at the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, said the arrests came after U.S. officials gathered intelligence linking the occupants of the facility to Iran's Revolutionary Guard Corps, which U.S. officials say targets coalition forces and incites sectarian violence.

"We believe many of the activities taking place in this facility were not consistent with normal diplomatic or consular functions," Fintor said. U.S. officials have not identified the men, disclosed whether they have been charged or revealed where they are being held.

Also Thursday, the U.S. military confirmed that it searched the Sudanese Embassy in Baghdad on Saturday. In a brief statement, the military said the search was part of an operation targeting havens for insurgents. Sudanese Embassy officials were not present during the search, and soldiers did not remove anything from the facility, according to a statement.

A variety of violent acts in the capital were reported by the Iraqi Interior Ministry, including a car bomb that detonated Thursday morning in central Baghdad near a police patrol station, killing two policemen and four other people; the assassination of two university professors; and the explosion of three car bombs in a market in southern Baghdad, which killed three policemen and four other people.

Staff researchers Meg Smith, Julie Tate and Robert E. Thomason in Washington and special correspondents Saad Sarhan and Naseer Nouri in Baghdad contributed to this report.

A U.S. Civilian In Baghdad: Standing Out, Even In Death (NYT)

By Christopher Maag

CLEVELAND, Jan. 18 — Andrea Parhamovich always stood out.

Before she was killed Wednesday in an ambush in Baghdad, Ms. Parhamovich, a 28-year-old political consultant from Perry, 40 miles east of here, was known to her friends and family as hard charging but lovable, possessed with Joan of Arc's determination and the charm of a pixie, who had dreams of working on a presidential campaign and possibly running for Congress.

Ms. Parhamovich, whom everyone called Andi, mocked death. In November 2006, two car bombs were discovered in front of the building where she lived in the Green Zone in Baghdad. The base was locked down, said Michael Hastings, her boyfriend, who is the Baghdad correspondent for Newsweek magazine. In the Green Zone convention center for hours, Ms. Parhamovich grew bored, Mr. Hastings said. She led 10 American and Peruvian men as they walked back to her building, mortars exploding nearby.

Mr. Hastings said he was planning to ask Ms. Parhamovich to marry him next month during a Valentine's Day trip to Paris. "She was this little blond-haired, blue-eyed girl from Ohio, but she was tough," he said. "She was far more brave than I am."

Ms. Parhamovich was teaching Iraqi politicians how to communicate with constituents. She was a staff member of the National Democratic Institute, a nonprofit group led by former Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright that works to build democratic institutions. She was in an institute convoy outside the Green Zone when it was attacked. On Thursday, a coalition of Sunni insurgents linked to Al Qaeda claimed responsibility for the attack, which killed a total of four people, The Associated Press reported.

She had left a job with the liberal Air America radio network, helping to organize its antiwar "Bring 'Em Home" concert in New York City in March 2006.

"Whenever I went into her office, I just felt a happiness, a glow," said Al Franken, the liberal radio show host, who choked up several times as he discussed Ms. Parhamovich. "She was a hard person not to like."

Ms. Parhamovich's father coached baseball at a high school near Perry, the small town where she grew up, and she had dreams of becoming a top fast-pitch softball player before back injuries forced her to quit the sport, said Joe Zampini, her brother-in-law.

She talked just as she played: fast. "She wasn't into small talk," Mr. Zampini said. "She wanted to get the most out of life. She was very highly motivated to help the world."

Ms. Parhamovich attended Marietta, a small liberal arts college in southeast Ohio, where she studied advertising and public relations. Politically liberal, she was conservative on personal matters, said Ryan Zundell, who worked with her in the college's public relations department. She rarely drank and eschewed low-cut shirts and jeans.

She graduated in three and a half years then worked for Jane Swift, who was the Republican governor of Massachusetts. Ms. Parhamovich opposed the war from the start, Mr. Hastings said.

"There's so much injustice in this country, so many horrible things happening," he said from Baghdad. "She felt like she could make a difference."

Activist Slain In Iraq 'Was An Idealist' (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

BAGHDAD — On their first date, Michael Hastings and Andrea Parhamovich met for milkshakes.

Fifteen months later, she followed him to Iraq.

Hastings hoped they would spend their lives together.

But on Wednesday, Parhamovich died in a hail of bullets, ambushed outside a Sunni Arab political office in Baghdad.

Sunni Muslim insurgents linked to Al Qaeda in Iraq claimed responsibility Thursday for the attack that took the lives of the 28-year-old and three bodyguards — a Hungarian, a Croat and an Iraqi. Two other security workers were wounded. None of these other victims' names had been released.

"She was an idealist," Hastings said of Parhamovich, who grew up in Perry, Ohio. "She always believed that people were good. Certainly, those ideals were put to the test when she came to Iraq."

Parhamovich, known as Andi, followed heart and ideals when she came to Baghdad. Hastings, a reporter with Newsweek, was working in Iraq. But Parhamovich was also drawn to political work in Baghdad, teaching Iraqis about voting and how to establish a functional government.

She worked first for the International Republican Institute, joining the National Democratic Institute a few months later.

On Wednesday, Parhamovich had gone to meet a group of Sunni politicians from the Iraqi Islamic Party. "She was really excited about the meeting," Hastings said.

The party headquarters is in Yarmouk, a west Baghdad neighborhood where shootings and executions are common.

After Parhamovich conducted her training seminar for the Sunni politicians, she left in a convoy with her armed guards. Moments later, the convoy was ambushed. The guards fought back but were outgunned by the attackers, whose arsenal included grenades.

"With God's assistance, we have succeeded in the destruction of two SUV vehicles belonging to the Zionist Mossad, killing all who were in them, attacking them by light and medium weapons," wrote the group that took responsibility, in a statement on a well-known Sunni insurgent website.

The group often refers to its targets as members of Israel's intelligence service.

But in fact, Hastings said, "they killed a wonderful, unarmed girl."

After graduating from Marietta College in Ohio, Parhamovich worked in the Massachusetts governor's office. In 2005, she got a job doing fundraising and publicity for Air America.

"Working for a liberal radio network wasn't enough," said Jamie Horn, who worked with Parhamovich at Air America. "She had to go to the heart of the war and create change and understanding. She was so obstinate in her efforts to create change. Nothing could stop her."

Parhamovich met Hastings when he came to interview Jerry Springer, who was on an Air America show in New York. Unknown to him, Parhamovich had warned Springer not to say anything outrageous to Hastings.

"It was the most boring Jerry Springer interview in history," Hastings recalled. But an e-mail exchange about the story led to that first date — diner milkshakes.

"I considered it a date; she considered it just business," said Hastings, who at the time was about to leave for Iraq for the first time. When he mentioned his impending trip to the war-torn country, she was "totally unimpressed by it, and mocked me."

He did not mind, he said.

"She was beautiful," he said. "Funny. Intuitive. Really brilliant. And a bit of a nut."

Hastings got a permanent posting to Newsweek's Baghdad bureau late last summer, and by September, Parhamovich had left her job and come to Iraq.

The National Democratic Institute is one of the few nongovernmental groups still working in Iraq. The staff lives outside the heavily fortified Green Zone, home to the U.S. Embassy and the Iraqi government, often traveling around the capital to run seminars and workshops.

"They did not see themselves as heroes, only people doing a job on behalf of a cause they believed in," the institute's chairwoman, former U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright, said in a statement referring to all four killed in the attack.

"They were not the enemies of anyone in Iraq; they were there to help."

Although the couple lived in the same city, they could see each other only occasionally. Work, checkpoints and curfews would get in the way.

But Parhamovich thrived, hitting the ground running, Hastings and several of her friends say. "She wanted to be here, at the center of things, helping people," Hastings said. "She was fearless."

Joe Zampini, Parhamovich's brother-in-law, said in Perry that she viewed her work "as a challenge and quite an honor to help the Iraqis."

"She knew that Michael was there in Iraq, and I think she used this as an opportunity to learn more," said Zampini, who is married to Parhamovich's older sister, Marcy. "Her goal was really to go into politics."

The family released a statement that said in part: "Andi's desire to help strangers in such a dangerous environment thousands of miles away might be difficult for others to understand, but to us, it epitomized Andi's natural curiosity and unwavering commitment. She was passionate, bold and caring."

After spending a few months in Baghdad, Parhamovich went back to the U.S. but returned at Christmas. The couple spoke on the phone about future plans, including a long trip to Europe, Hastings said.

"We had — I have still — reservations at the Four Seasons in Paris on Valentine's Day."

Hastings had recently picked out two possible wedding rings. Ever since the milkshakes, he said, he had known he wanted to spend his life with Andi.

"She is pure at heart," he said, bringing her to life — momentarily — in the present tense.

Marine Corporal Pleads Guilty In Killing Of Unarmed Iraqi (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif., Jan. 18 (AP) — A Marine corporal pleaded guilty Thursday to kidnapping and murdering an unarmed Iraqi civilian last year, saying he and other servicemen went after him because they were “sick and tired of getting bombed.”

The marine, Cpl. Trent D. Thomas, 25, is the first of seven marines and a Navy medic accused in the case to plead guilty to murder. Four others have pleaded guilty to reduced charges in exchange for their testimony.

Prosecutors said the eight-man squad had kidnapped 52-year-old Hashim Ibrahim Awad in Hamdania, a Sunni stronghold west of Baghdad, taken him to a roadside hole and shot him to death, placing an AK-47 and shovel by his body to make it look as if he were an insurgent caught planting a bomb.

Corporal Thomas, a native of the St. Louis area on his second tour in Iraq when the man was killed on April 26, testified about the slaying as part of his plea deal. The group planned to go after a known insurgent, he said, but that plan was thwarted and they went to a neighboring house instead. The judge, Lt. Col. Tracy A. Daly, asked why the group had proceeded with the plan.

“We would get someone else to make a statement that marines, we were sick and tired of getting bombed,” Corporal Thomas said.

Corporal Thomas said he and another marine seized Mr. Awad from a house by entering through an unlocked door. He said they used a combination of hand signals and Arabic commands to lure Mr. Awad away. Mr. Awad spoke little English, Corporal Thomas said, but he pleaded with the group of four marines.

"He started asking, 'Why, mister, why?' " Corporal Thomas said. "We didn't say anything."

The four took Mr. Awad to the roadside hole, where they rejoined the rest of the squad, Corporal Thomas said. Mr. Awad was struggling to break free, Corporal Thomas said, so he and others bound his hands and feet. Corporal Thomas said Lance Cpl. Robert Pennington tried to force Mr. Awad to lose consciousness by choking him.

The squad leader, Sgt. Lawrence G. Hutchins III, then reported over the radio that the group had spotted a man digging a hole, Corporal Thomas said. Someone fired a shot, he said, then he and others in the squad opened fire. Petty Officer Third Class Melson J. Bacos, he said, shot the AK-47 away from the group to make it appear as though a gunfight had occurred.

After the firing stopped, Corporal Thomas said, Sergeant Hutchins made sure Mr. Awad was dead by shooting a three-round burst of gunfire into his head.

Sergeant Hutchins, of Plymouth, Mass., is awaiting trial on murder charges and others. Corporal Pennington, of Mukilteo, Wash., is also awaiting trial and claims his rights were violated when investigators interviewed him.

Petty Officer Bacos, of Franklin, Wis., pleaded guilty to lesser charges and was sentenced to one year in prison. Another marine, Cpl. Marshall L. Magincalda, 23, of Manteca, Calif., has pleaded not guilty to murder charges and others.

Corporal Thomas faces up to life in prison without the possibility of parole, though he is likely to receive a more lenient sentence under his plea agreement.

DOJ:

Prosecutor Firings Not Political, Gonzales Says (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales acknowledged yesterday that some U.S. attorneys have been asked to resign their posts in recent weeks because of performance issues, but he denied any political motives and vowed to quickly submit new nominees for the jobs to the Senate for confirmation.

"What we're trying to do is ensure that for the people in each of these respective districts, we have the very best possible representative for the Department of Justice," Gonzales testified, adding later: "I would never, ever make a change in a United States attorney for political reasons or if it would in any way jeopardize an ongoing serious investigation. I just would not do it."

Gonzales's remarks in front of the Senate Judiciary Committee came in response to questions from Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and other lawmakers about the forced removals of at least six U.S. attorneys, including several who have overseen some of the government's highest-profile corruption prosecutions.

Officials say the removals include those of Carol C. Lam in San Diego, who led the corruption prosecution of former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), and Kevin V. Ryan in San Francisco, who has handled the probe into a lab at the center of a sports doping scandal involving baseball player Barry Bonds and other athletes.

Another recent change that has attracted widespread criticism from Democrats came in Arkansas, where U.S. Attorney H.E. Cummins III of Little Rock was replaced on an interim basis by J. Timothy Griffin, a former research director for the Republican National Committee.

Feinstein said she knows of at least six cases in which prosecutors have been asked to leave. She said she is concerned about the way the firings have been handled and about whether the Justice Department is attempting to evade Senate oversight of U.S. attorneys.

A little-noticed provision of last year's USA Patriot Act reauthorization legislation allows the attorney general to pick an interim U.S. attorney for an indefinite period of time.

"I'm very concerned, because, technically, under the Patriot Act, you can appoint someone without confirmation for the remainder of the president's term," Feinstein said. "I don't believe you should do that. We are going to try to change the law back."

Gonzales said the administration has no intention of avoiding confirmation hearings and said the department has forwarded six nominations to the Senate and is working on five more.

As far as prosecutors who have been asked to leave, Gonzales characterized the changes as routine personnel decisions based on evaluations of each prosecutor's performance. He declined to tell Feinstein how many prosecutors were asked to resign.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.) came to Gonzales's defense, noting that the prosecutors in question were hired by the current administration.

"I find it unusual that some of my colleagues are critical of replacing Bush appointees," Cornyn said.

Turnover In U.S. Attorneys Defended (LVRJ)

By Steve Tetreault, STEPHENS WASHINGTON BUREAU

Las Vegas Review-Journal, January 19, 2007

Gonzales says no one has been ousted for political reasons

WASHINGTON -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Thursday declined to say how many U.S. attorneys are being removed from their jobs and defended the practice to senators as "good management" to replace them with "the best possible people."

Advertisement

Gonzales insisted that politics did not come into play in forcing turnover among the chief federal prosecutors, who are appointed by the president. Although pressed by Democrats during an appearance before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Gonzales said he would not discuss individual cases.

At least six U.S. attorneys have been asked to resign, said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., including two in that state, one in Arkansas, one in Washington and Daniel Bogden in Nevada.

Democrats have expressed concern that a provision in the revised USA Patriot Act that passed last year would allow the attorney general to name long term replacements while circumventing the Senate confirmation process.

Gonzales said 11 U.S. attorney vacancies have been created since the law was passed but he declined to say how many were forced resignations.

The nation's chief law enforcement officer acknowledged that some of the chief prosecutors were asked to leave.

"But that happens during every administration during different periods for different reasons," Gonzales said. "That fact that that happens quite frankly some people should view that as a sign of good management. What we do is make an evaluation about the performance of individuals, and I have a responsibility that we have the best possible people in that position.

"I would never, ever make a change in a United States attorney position for political reasons or that in any way would jeopardize an ongoing investigation," Gonzales said. "I just would not do it."

Gonzales also said the administration plans to submit replacements to the Senate for confirmation although at least one, in Arkansas, has begun serving on an interim basis.

Bogden on Wednesday confirmed he was leaving the Nevada post effective Feb. 28, but a statement he issued did not address whether he was being forced out. His dismissal was confirmed last weekend by Nevada's two senators.

Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., who recommended Bogden for the post in 2001, said Wednesday he discussed the Nevada prosecutor's fate with the White House and the Department of Justice, "and it's their call."

On Thursday, Ensign would not confirm nor comment on a report by Review-Journal columnist Jane Ann Morrison. Morrison cited a Republican source saying Ensign asked that Bogden be allowed to stay on and was told the decision to remove U.S. attorneys was part of a plan to "give someone else that experience" in order to build GOP bench strength.

Ensign expects the Justice Department will ask him to suggest a new U.S. attorney, and he plans to comply, spokesman Tory Mazzola said. Ensign "is working with the Department of Justice to move forward," Mazzola said.

Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Thursday that Bogden got a bad deal that will force him to end a 16-year career as a federal prosecutor.

By replacing veteran prosecutors, the Bush administration is seeking to build "a farm team for Gonzales," Reid said. "He can farm out to somebody who drove him to work one afternoon."

Feinstein questioned whether the Patriot Act "is being used to put in people who want a reward or change for one reason or another, and they would never have to go through confirmation for the rest of the president's term. That is unacceptable."

The California senator has focused her concern on Carol Lam, the departing U.S. attorney in San Diego who successfully prosecuted former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham on corruption charges.

Feinstein said Lam was pursuing corruption cases against other federal lawmakers and staff, "so that raises the question" whether she was being forced to leave as a way to set back investigations.

"Now I am not accusing anybody, but my suspicions are aroused particularly because the FBI says nothing but the highest things about this prosecutor," Feinstein said after the hearing. "I would kind of like to know."

Justice Department officials have said Lam was asked to resign based on declining drug and gun prosecutions in her district. Some Republicans in Congress also criticized her for not prosecuting more immigration cases.

U.S. Attorney Confirms He'll Be Leaving His Post (LVRJ)

By GLENN PUIT And TONY BATT, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, January 19, 2007

Spokeswoman says reports of Bogden's ouster 'erroneous'

Three days after Nevada's two senators said the Department of Justice had forced out Daniel Bogden, U.S. attorney for the district of Nevada, Bogden broke his silence on the matter, confirming that he will be leaving his post next month.

Bogden's announcement late Wednesday came one day after Natalie Collins, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, belatedly responded to questions about the matter by saying that Bogden was still the U.S. attorney in Nevada.

Advertisement

Collins also claimed that media reports regarding Bogden's ouster were "erroneous."

In the issued statement, Bogden, who was appointed to the job by the Bush administration in 2001, said his resignation is effective Feb. 28.

Neither Bogden nor Collins has addressed whether Bogden was forced out of office as the senators contend, and if so, why.

He is one of at least seven U.S. attorneys around the nation whom senators say have been forced to resign in the last couple of months.

One of them is Bogden's counterpart in San Diego, Carol Lam, who received her walking papers from the Department of Justice, too.

Lam, who has been in charge of federal prosecutions in Southern California since September 2002, said Tuesday that she will leave her job Feb. 15.

Like Bogden, Lam had overseen federal prosecution of public corruption cases involving Michael Galardi, who owned strip clubs in Las Vegas and San Diego.

Lam, a former judge, also oversaw the corruption prosecution of former U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a Republican.

On Wednesday, The Associated Press reported that the U.S. attorney in San Francisco, Kevin V. Ryan, has submitted his resignation, too.

Ryan's notable prosecutions included the BALCO steroids case.

His office also launched investigations of Silicon Valley giants Hewlett-Packard Co. and Apple Inc.

Mahlon Brown, a former U.S. attorney for the district of Nevada who now leads the National Association of Former United States Attorneys, said the wave of unexpected resignations has him "in shock and awe."

"It has always been that no one gets fired like this unless they did something goofy, if they broke the rules," Brown said. "And from what I'm picking up, even they have no idea why they've been fired. No one knows."

Brown was the U.S. attorney in Nevada from 1977 to 1981.

He was appointed by the administration of Democrat Jimmy Carter and forced out when Ronald Reagan was elected president.

Brown said it is not unusual for U.S. attorneys to lose their jobs when presidential administrations change, but he said he had never seen a large turnover of U.S. attorneys in the midst of a presidential term.

Brown said the job of a federal prosecutor is not supposed to be impacted by politics in any way.

He said he sees the spate of forced resignations as further evidence that the Bush administration is not interested in following precedent when it comes to how such judicial appointments are made.

"I think it sends the same message that's been sent the last eight years: 'We'll do it our way and forget how it's been done before you,'" Brown said.

"You don't have to be a general in Iraq to realize your job is on the line everyday, and U.S. attorneys have never had to work under that type of environment before."

Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., who recommended Bogden for the job, said Wednesday, "The White House and the Department of Justice had their reasons, and I discussed it with them, and it's their call."

Ensign did not say what the reasons for Bogden's dismissal were.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said the treatment of Bogden was unfair and "a terrible shame."

"Do you realize that his career is now ended as a U.S. attorney? He can't go back there, so he's going to have to do something else," Reid said. "What a shame."

Reid said he heard nothing but praise about Bogden's job performance and could not understand why he had been removed.

A spokesman for the Department of Justice did not return a phone call from the Review-Journal seeking comment Wednesday afternoon.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Tuesday told The Associated Press the removal of the federal prosecutors was not politically motivated, as many Democrats have speculated.

"We in no way politicize these decisions," Gonzales said.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said Tuesday that at least seven U.S. attorneys have been forced to resign without explanation.

She accused the Bush administration of trying to circumvent Senate confirmation of their replacements.

Such appointments were subject to Senate review until last year when the Patriot Act was reauthorized with a provision that allowed the U.S. attorney general to appoint longer-term, interim replacements without Senate approval.

The departures, Feinstein said, come at a sensitive time when federal prosecutors are pursuing political corruption cases.

"The U.S. attorney's job is too important for there to be unnecessary disruptions, or, worse, any appearance of undue influence," Feinstein said.

Feinstein said she planned to bring up the issue today at a Senate Judiciary committee hearing at which Gonzales is scheduled to appear.

A Justice Department spokesman, Brian Roehrkasse, said senators would be consulted before the nomination of replacement U.S. attorneys, as has been the routine since the law was changed.

"It is inconceivable for a member of Congress to believe that use of an appointment authority to fill a vacancy is in any way an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process," Roehrkasse said.

Federal Prosecutor In Nevada Says He'll Step Down (AP)

By Ken Ritter, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 19, 2007

LAS VEGAS (AP) - The U.S. attorney in Nevada said Thursday he will step down, citing discussions with Justice Department officials and joining other federal prosecutors announcing resignations in recent weeks.

Daniel Bogden said his resignation after five years as U.S. attorney for Nevada will take effect Feb. 28.

DOJ_NMG_0118636

"I'm going to take some time off and evaluate what direction I'm going to go in terms of my career," Bogden said, acknowledging he served at the pleasure of President Bush and refusing to say he had been forced out.

"It's a political appointment," he said, "a presidential appointment."

Bogden, 50, made public his resignation with a statement issued late Wednesday "after consultations with officials at Department of Justice," he said. He declined to identify those officials.

He said he planned to spend the next six weeks ensuring a smooth transition for his successor, and said he had no idea whom it would be.

Bogden's four-page statement cited successful prosecutions and included quotes of praise for his work from local, state and federal law enforcement officials and a federal judge in Las Vegas.

His resignation was his first public response to reports Sunday and Monday from aides to Nevada Sens. John Ensign and Harry Reid that he would be replaced. Justice Department officials have not responded to requests for comment.

Ensign, a Republican, nominated Bogden for the post in 2001 after Bogden won several high-profile drug cases and helped send five neo-Nazis to prison for a Reno hate crime. Reid, now Democratic majority leader, supported the nomination.

Bogden was an Air Force judge advocate general and served as a deputy Washoe County district attorney before spending 10 years as an assistant U.S. attorney. He oversees 40 federal attorneys in Las Vegas and Reno.

"During the past five years, our office has been tremendously successful in implementing the national and district priorities," Bogden said in his statement, which thanked Bush for his appointment.

He called terrorism, violent crime, public corruption, drugs, child exploitation, identity theft and fraud his top issues since being confirmed by the Senate in October 2001.

In one notable case, his office successfully prosecuted four former Clark County commissioners and a former striptease club owner on corruption charges. Ex-commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey reported to federal prison last Friday. Former commissioners Erin Kenny and Lance Malone and former club owner Michael Galardi face sentencing in coming weeks.

Bogden's office also had several prosecutorial setbacks last year, including the mid-October unraveling of a federal racketeering case against the Hells Angels motorcycle club stemming from the a deadly brawl during a biker rally in Laughlin in 2002.

Bogden was one of several U.S. attorneys to announce their resignations this week. Others included U.S. Attorney Carol Lam in San Diego, who prosecuted Galardi and Malone on bribery charges in that city, and the U.S. attorney in San Francisco, Kevin Ryan.

Also leaving this month is U.S. Attorney John McKay in Seattle.

California Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a Democrat, complained on the Senate floor Tuesday that the White House was using a provision of the USA Patriot Act to oust Ryan, Lam and other federal prosecutors and replace them for the duration of the Bush administration with White House allies.

A provision in the terrorism-fighting act allows the attorney general to appoint replacements indefinitely, without Senate confirmation.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales denied Feinstein's claim. But he has said that in the year since the Patriot Act was reauthorized, at least 11 U.S. attorneys in the nation's 94 federal districts have resigned or announced their resignations - some at the urging of the Bush administration. He noted that federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president.

Surging And Purging (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

There's something happening here, and what it is seems completely clear: the Bush administration is trying to protect itself by purging independent-minded prosecutors.

Last month, Bud Cummins, the U.S. attorney (federal prosecutor) for the Eastern District of Arkansas, received a call on his cellphone while hiking in the woods with his son. He was informed that he had just been replaced by J. Timothy Griffin, a Republican political operative who has spent the last few years working as an opposition researcher for Karl Rove.

Mr. Cummins's case isn't unique. Since the middle of last month, the Bush administration has pushed out at least four U.S. attorneys, and possibly as many as seven, without explanation. The list includes Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney for San Diego, who successfully prosecuted Duke Cunningham, a Republican congressman, on major corruption charges. The top F.B.I. official in San Diego told The San Diego Union-Tribune that Ms. Lam's dismissal would undermine multiple continuing investigations.

In Senate testimony yesterday, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales refused to say how many other attorneys have been asked to resign, calling it a "personnel matter."

In case you're wondering, such a wholesale firing of prosecutors midway through an administration isn't normal. U.S. attorneys, The Wall Street Journal recently pointed out, "typically are appointed at the beginning of a new president's term, and serve throughout that term." Why, then, are prosecutors that the Bush administration itself appointed suddenly being pushed out?

The likely answer is that for the first time the administration is really worried about where corruption investigations might lead.

Since the day it took power this administration has shown nothing but contempt for the normal principles of good government. For six years ethical problems and conflicts of interest have been the rule, not the exception.

For a long time the administration nonetheless seemed untouchable, protected both by Republican control of Congress and by its ability to justify anything and everything as necessary for the war on terror. Now, however, the investigations are closing in on the Oval Office. The latest news is that J. Steven Griles, the former deputy secretary of the Interior Department and the poster child for the administration's systematic policy of putting foxes in charge of henhouses, is finally facing possible indictment.

And the purge of U.S. attorneys looks like a pre-emptive strike against the gathering forces of justice.

Won't the administration have trouble getting its new appointees confirmed by the Senate? Well, it turns out that it won't have to.

Arlen Specter, the Republican senator who headed the Judiciary Committee until Congress changed hands, made sure of that last year. Previously, new U.S. attorneys needed Senate confirmation within 120 days or federal district courts would name replacements. But as part of a conference committee reconciling House and Senate versions of the revised Patriot Act, Mr. Specter slipped in a clause eliminating that rule.

As Paul Kiel of TPMmuckraker.com — which has done yeoman investigative reporting on this story — put it, this clause in effect allows the administration "to handpick replacements and keep them there in perpetuity without the ordeal of Senate confirmation." How convenient.

Mr. Gonzales says that there's nothing political about the firings. And according to The Associated Press, he said that district court judges shouldn't appoint U.S. attorneys because they "tend to appoint friends and others not properly qualified to be prosecutors." Words fail me.

Mr. Gonzales also says that the administration intends to get Senate confirmation for every replacement. Sorry, but that's not at all credible, even if we ignore the administration's track record. Mr. Griffin, the political-operative-turned-prosecutor, would be savaged in a confirmation hearing. By appointing him, the administration showed that it has no intention of following the usual rules.

The broader context is this: defeat in the midterm elections hasn't led the Bush administration to scale back its imperial view of presidential power.

On the contrary, now that President Bush can no longer count on Congress to do his bidding, he's more determined than ever to claim essentially unlimited authority — whether it's the authority to send more troops into Iraq or the authority to stonewall investigations into his own administration's conduct.

The next two years, in other words, are going to be a rolling constitutional crisis.

Democrats squawk as president dismisses a few U.S. attorneys

At the beginning of the week, President Bush sacked Daniel Bogden, U.S. attorney for the district of Nevada.

Natalie Collins, a spokeswoman for Mr. Bogden, ended a three-day silence Wednesday by contending press reports of the ouster were "erroneous" -- actually, he's resigning.

Advertisement

Of course the president gave his own nominee the option of saving face by tendering his resignation. Perhaps Ms. Collins will contend the two men's letters crossed in the mail -- that Mr. Bogden merely craves "more time with his family." Fine.

Mr. Bogden is one of at least seven U.S. attorneys around the nation whom senators say have been forced out in the past couple of months. One of them is Carol Lam, Mr. Bogden's counterpart in San Diego. Another is Kevin V. Ryan in San Francisco.

Whether the White House is disappointed with the cases these attorneys chose to prosecute, or with those they chose not to prosecute, or with their level of success, time may tell. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales did tell The Associated Press on Tuesday that the removals were not politically motivated, whatever that means.

Although the appointments of U.S. attorneys are subject to Senate confirmation, they exercise executive authority which the Constitution vests solely in the president. Therefore, they serve at the president's pleasure -- he can fire them at will.

"The president just no longer found it pleasurable," as one local former prosecutor said Thursday, with a smile.

Now, anyone is free to criticize the president's actions and to question whether the replacements -- whoever they may be -- are better qualified than those now packing their bags.

But Democrats in Washington, led by Sen. Dianne Feinstein of the Judiciary Committee, have tried to characterize this minor housecleaning as some kind of dirty deed.

"The U.S. attorney's job is too important for there to be unnecessary disruptions, or, worse, any appearance of undue influence," squawked Sen. Feinstein on Wednesday, stressing that the firings were "without cause" and implying the White House may be seeking to stymie unspecified political corruption cases.

"The public response has been shock," Sen. Feinstein said on the Senate floor Tuesday. "Peter Nunez, who served as the San Diego U.S. attorney from 1982 to 1988 has said, 'This is like nothing I've ever seen in my 35-plus years.' "

Replies Andrew C. McCarthy, a senior fellow at the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies, in a Jan. 17 piece for the National Review, "Yes, the public, surely, is about as 'shocked, shocked' as Claude Raines' Captain Renault, and one is left to wonder whether Mr. Nunez spent the 1990s living under a rock."

What Mr. McCarthy is referring to is the fact that one of President Bill Clinton's first official acts upon taking office in 1993 was to fire every single United States attorney then serving -- with the sole exception of Michael Chertoff, now Homeland Security secretary, but at the time U.S. attorney for the district of New Jersey, which put him in a position to be rescued by the personal intervention of powerful New Jersey Democratic Sen. Bill Bradley.

"Were the attorneys Clinton fired guilty of misconduct or incompetence?" Mr. McCarthy asks. "No. As a class they were able (and, it goes without saying, well-connected.) Did he shove them aside to thwart corruption investigations into his own party? No. It was just politics, plain and simple. Patronage is the chief spoil of electoral war."

Not only that, the very same Democrats who are now up in arms sat by quietly in 1993 as Bill Clinton fired U.S. attorneys "sweepingly and without cause," possibly because Mr. Clinton was firing prosecutors who had been appointed by Republican Presidents Reagan and Bush.

Whereas, given that U.S. attorneys serve four-year appointments, while George W. Bush has now been president for six, President Bush is now firing U.S. attorneys who he himself appointed or re-appointed.

Oh, the humanity!

Sen. Feinstein also predicts the president will use his power to make interim appointments to these offices, thus sidestepping Senate confirmation.

Time will tell.

But as Mr. McCarthy points out, Mr. Clinton did that -- in cases such as that of Justice Department civil-rights division chief Bill Lann Lee -- even though it was of dubious legality at the time.

Now such interim appointments pending confirmation -- should the president find it necessary to take that route -- are perfectly legal, thanks to a provision of the Patriot Act reauthorization bill, approved last year by the, um ... the U.S. Senate.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron's Former Treasurer To End Home Confinement (AP)

By John Porretto, AP Business Writer

AP, January 19, 2007

HOUSTON — Ben Glisan Jr., the first former Enron executive to go directly to jail after pleading guilty to conspiracy in 2003, is expected to finish a stint of home confinement after three years in prison, his attorney and the federal Bureau of Prisons said Thursday.

Glisan, the former Enron treasurer, pleaded guilty on Sept. 10, 2003, in the corporate scandal that brought down the energy company and rocked Wall Street. He received a five-year sentence.

Glisan, 37 at the time of his plea, spent time in two federal prisons in Texas — one near Bastrop, the other in Beaumont — before being confined to his Houston home since September, Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Felicia Ponce said. That confinement is scheduled to end Sunday, Ponce said.

Glisan's attorney, Tom Allen, said his client will be on probation once he's free to leave home, but he didn't elaborate.

"There is a plea agreement, and there are certain conditions that will continue pursuant to the plea agreement," Allen said.

During court proceedings, Glisan admitted helping design financial deals that enriched him and illegally kept investment losses off Enron's books.

He agreed to forfeit nearly $1 million in profits from an off-the-books deal at Enron and agreed to not seek a refund of $412,000 in income taxes he paid on that profit.

Twenty-three counts against Glisan were dismissed, including money laundering and fraud. He had pleaded innocent in May 2003 to 24 charges as part of a 109-count indictment against Andrew Fastow, his one-time boss and former Enron finance chief.

Last year, he testified against former Enron chief executive Jeffrey Skilling and company founder Kenneth Lay. Skilling and Lay were convicted last May on numerous counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and other charges. Skilling entered prison in December; Lay died of a heart attack July 5.

Glisan was fired in November 2001, less than a month before Enron filed for bankruptcy, when an internal probe revealed his $1 million profit from a $5,800 investment in one of several deals at the heart of the Justice Department's case against Fastow.

As recently as this month, former Enron executive Richard Causey reported to prison to begin serving 5 1/2 years for his role in the company's collapse. Causey, Enron's former chief accounting officer, pleaded guilty to securities fraud in 2005 shortly before he was scheduled to be tried with Enron founder Lay and Skilling.

From Ethics Overseer To Hedge Fund Boss (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

As the court-appointed guardian and self-described fixer of some of America's most wayward companies, Richard C. Breeden, the former top securities regulator, is considered a pillar of corporate ethics and governance.

Now he trying to become another paragon — that of savvy investor in troubled companies. And in the coming months he will face his first major test: taking on the Applebee's International restaurant chain in a proxy fight.

Mr. Breeden's fledgling advocacy hedge fund, Breeden Partners, which owns a 5.2 percent stake in Applebee's, began its battle last month, when Mr. Breeden nominated four close friends to its board.

Hedge funds, the lucrative private investment pools for institutions like endowments and pensions, and for the wealthy, are nearly always managed by former Wall Street traders or money managers.

DOJ_NMG_0118640

Mr. Breeden — a Harvard-trained securities lawyer — has no investing experience. But he is seeking to bring his knowledge of securities laws and corporate governance into investing in underperforming companies.

Some in the business are skeptical.

"I guess I wonder, how does a guy with no investment management experience run a hedge fund?" asked Philip Goldstein of Bulldog Investors, which runs hedge funds similar in style and intent to that of Mr. Breeden. "You get the guys leaving Goldman Sachs and raising $2 billion, but this is even more astonishing — he doesn't have a track record."

Mr. Goldstein added that "it's kind of like starting at the top — you'd think you'd want to work at a hedge fund for a while."

But what Mr. Breeden may lack in investing experience, he makes up for in other ways, according to his friends, who cite his hard-driving nature, his intellect, his attention to detail and his decisiveness, if marred at times by a divalike attitude.

"If it's a bad idea, Richard will kick it down the toilet and flush," said Laurence E. Harris, a lawyer in Washington who is one of four close friends that Mr. Breeden nominated last month to the board of directors at Applebee's, with a view to gaining a say in how the company is run.

Mr. Breeden "knows what to look for," Mr. Harris said. "He's a lot less likely to be fooled than a lot of people who are pure investors, because he understands the mechanics of corporate governance and securities laws."

Mr. Breeden, 57, declined to comment for this article.

He has not only has a new professional life, but a new personal one as well. Last year, Mr. Breeden married a trust administrator of the Bennett Funding Group, which he had overseen as the court-appointed monitor. (He and his first wife, Holly, were divorced in 2005 after 27 years of marriage.)

Mr. Breeden is now perhaps the most senior former government official ever to run a hedge fund. Mr. Breeden oversaw the Securities and Exchange Commission from 1989 to 1993.

He then ran one of the world's largest accounting firms, Coopers & Lybrand, before establishing his private firm, Richard C. Breeden & Company, in Greenwich, Conn., to advise companies hobbled by ethics and governance problems.

In recent years, he has served as the high-profile outside monitor for scandal-plagued firms like WorldCom, which filed for bankruptcy in 2002 and Conrad Black's former company, Hollinger International. It was when he was overseeing the bankruptcy of WorldCom, later MCI, that Mr. Breeden first began thinking about starting a hedge fund, according to friends and associates. Seeing the roles played by the Mexican tycoon Carlos Slim Helú and Mark Neporent of the hedge fund Cerberus Capital as investors in MCI, he asked Mr. Harris, "I'm thinking of starting a hedge fund — what do you think?"

Mr. Harris, who recalled the conversation, said Mr. Breeden told him, "The one thing I don't want to do is fail."

Mr. Breeden's right-hand man at Breeden Partners is his friend Steven J. Quamme, a one-time mergers-and-acquisitions lawyer with whom Mr. Breeden once worked at Baker Botts, the Washington law firm.

When asked who was running the hedge fund — in other words, picking companies in which to invest, Mr. Harris replied, "I don't think you can actually separate Richard and Steve — they're joined at the hip."

Mr. Quamme did not return calls requesting comment.

An entrepreneur as well as an investor, Mr. Quamme has picked some winners in his past jobs, including a chain of video stores that was sold to Blockbuster Video early last decade and a chunk of the Einstein Brothers Bagels franchises.

Mr. Quamme, whom Mr. Breeden also nominated to serve on the Applebee's board, has also endured some setbacks. His 50 percent stake in Boston Chicken, through Mayfair Partners, an investing partnership that he ran in the mid-1990s, went stale in 1998 when the restaurant and the partnership both filed for bankruptcy.

It is, of course, far too early to tell whether Mr. Breeden's knowledge and experience will make his hedge fund, whose philosophy is to invest in American companies with fixable problems in policy and governance, a winner.

Some analysts do not see his fund making an impact on Applebee's.

"We do not see a dramatic shift near-term in the company's strategic direction that would lead to the 'value creating' programs proposed by the activist," Andrew Barish, an analyst with Banc of America Securities wrote earlier this month.

Applebee's declined to comment on Mr. Breeden's proposals.

The fund sought to raise $1.25 billion but has so far brought in only around $500 million, including $400 million from Calpers, the California pension fund. The hedge fund earned 7.73 percent in the third quarter of 2006, according to the most recent available data from Calpers.

To some, Mr. Breeden's leap into the hedge fund business on the heels of serving as a court-appointed monitor for so many large companies raises questions.

"It's an appearances problem, and it bothers me," said Michael Feiner, an ethics professor at Columbia Business School, adding that he thought government officials should be required to wait two years before working at hedge funds or lobbying groups. "I'm disappointed that he is doing this."

Mr. Breeden's spokesmen declined to answer questions on whether Breeden Partners would prohibit itself from investing in companies for which Mr. Breeden had served as a court-appointed monitor.

And the transparency that Mr. Breeden championed at the troubled companies he has overseen may go by the wayside with his new venture. Like many hedge funds, Breeden Partners has affiliated entities registered in the Cayman Islands, to take advantage of generous offshore tax benefits.

Ex-CVS Officers Are Indicted (WSJ/AP)

PROVIDENCE, R.I. -- Two former executives at drugstore chain CVS Corp. were charged in a probe into influence peddling at the Rhode Island statehouse.

John R. "Jack" Kramer, former senior vice president for corporate affairs and government relations, and Carlos Ortiz, former vice president of government affairs, were charged with one count each of conspiracy and bribery and 21 counts each of fraud for allegedly paying former state Sen. John Celona to kill legislation CVS opposed or sponsor bills the company supported.

Mr. Celona, who resigned from the General Assembly in 2004, pleaded guilty to federal mail-fraud charges the following year and has been cooperating with the government.

Messrs. Kramer and Ortiz have been on leaves of absence from Woonsocket, R.I.-based CVS since 2004. They couldn't be reached to comment.

U.S. Attorney Robert Clark Corrente said the probe into statehouse corruption was continuing. CVS, which hasn't been charged, said it has fully cooperated with the probe.

CVS paid Mr. Celona $1,000 a month under a consulting contract -- $45,000 total, the indictment said, and he got benefits including sports tickets and trips.

CRIMINAL LAW:

U.S. Attorney General To Study Milwaukee Crime (MJS)

By Audrey Hoffer

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, January 19, 2007

Kohl asks Gonzales to look at trend, funding

Washington - Sen. Herb Kohl elicited a promise Thursday from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to look at the rise in violent crime in Milwaukee and tell him whether federal funding could be provided to bolster the police.

Gonzales testified at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing that covered issues from domestic surveillance to Internet pornography, all of which are under the jurisdiction of the U.S. Justice Department.

Kohl, a senior committee member, first raised the trend of increases in robberies and assaults in Milwaukee at a Judiciary Committee hearing last month. He asked FBI Director Robert Mueller, who was testifying at the time, to go to Milwaukee to study the problem first-hand and to give the city more federal resources in the form of additional federal agents. Mueller said he would "take a specific look at Milwaukee" but did not commit to travel there.

At the December hearing, Kohl also criticized the bureau for taking money earmarked for violent crime prevention and reallocating it to investigate terrorism.

In Thursday's hearing, Kohl repeated the charge, saying the FBI used almost 2,200 "fewer agents in 2004 on traditional crime matters than it did in 2000 due to the essential focus on terrorism."

In addition, he said, the Milwaukee Police Department received $1 million in federal money specifically for police in 2002 but last year didn't receive any. As a result, the police force was reduced by 55 officers and fewer police are on the streets.

Gonzales acknowledged that "keeping our communities and citizens safe from violent crime is a top priority for law enforcement at all levels," but most of the work is done by local police.

Kohl said local enforcement officials are bearing the burden of decreased federal funding and, therefore, cannot effectively fight the increase in crime. "We are not giving our states and localities the help that they so desperately need."

Later during the hearing, Sen. Russ Feingold, also a member of the Judiciary Committee, reminded Gonzales of his agreement with Kohl to "take a real look" at Milwaukee's crime problem and to consider awarding the city a $2.5 million grant to study ways to fight crime as part of the 18-city Safe Communities Initiative. "I hope Milwaukee is next in line for that kind of money," Feingold said.

Prosecutor Fights To Keep Bush Critics In Jury Pool For Cheney Aide's Trial (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 19, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The prosecutor sparred with defense attorneys Thursday over several potential jurors and their opinions of the Bush administration, a debate that further slowed jury selection in the trial of a former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton had hoped to have a jury seated by Thursday afternoon, but legal wrangling slowed the process. Attorneys for former I. Lewis Libby have weeded out of the jury pool the most outspoken critics of the Bush administration.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald told Walton that defense attorneys had crossed the line when they told jurors the case was political and about war policies.

"The jury will not be asked to render a verdict on the war or what they think of the war," Fitzgerald said.

Libby is accused of lying to investigators about what he told reporters regarding outed CIA operative Valerie Plame in 2003. Because Plame's husband was among the administration's most outspoken critics, the trial is set to the backdrop of the war in Iraq and politics.

Plame's identity was leaked to reporters after a newspaper article by her husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, suggested that the Bush administration intentionally misused intelligence to build up a reason for going to war against Saddam Hussein's Iraq.

The leak touched off a political scandal and an FBI investigation that Libby is accused of obstructing. Attorneys for both sides want to know how closely potential jurors have been following the case.

The composition of the jury pool is a critical pretrial issue. Libby plans to tell jurors that despite what prosecutors say, he did not lie to investigators. He says he was bogged down by national security issues and simply did not remember the conversations about Plame correctly.

If jurors come to the trial already skeptical about the credibility of Libby or Cheney, his former boss, attorneys say Libby will not get a fair trial.

Walton considered seven jurors and dismissed five people who said they could not be fair to the Bush administration or who were unsure.

"My personal feeling is the Iraq war was a tremendous, terrible mistake. It's quite a horrendous thing," said one potential juror, a management consultant. "Whether any one person or the administration is responsible for that is quite a complex question."

Only one juror had been accepted into the potential jury pool Thursday by early afternoon, and attorneys were debating whether to accept a woman who works for the CIA. Walton had hoped to have 36 qualified jurors by the end of the day. Only 25 have been approved since selection began Tuesday.

Attorneys for both sides can then eliminate jurors for any reason until 12 jurors and four alternates are seated.

Opening arguments are scheduled for Monday in a case expected to last four to six weeks.

Jury Selection In Libby Trial Moves Slowly Because Of Bias (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — The task of seating a jury for the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. did not get easier Thursday when a majority of the candidates interviewed were disqualified, mainly because they expressed deep distrust of the Bush administration and the Iraq war.

Mr. Libby, also known as Scooter, is facing five felony counts for his role in an investigation of who leaked to journalists the identity of a C.I.A. operative in July 2003 and why. The indictment charges him with lying to agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and a grand jury about whether he spoke to journalists about Valerie Wilson, the Central Intelligence Agency officer.

Mr. Libby is the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, who will be a featured witness for the defense. The attitudes of many potential jurors to Mr. Cheney and the Iraq war have upset the judge's schedule for the trial, which envisioned opening arguments Monday.

At the end of the day Thursday, the judge, Reggie M. Walton, lamented the slow pace of getting enough potential jurors for a pool to be winnowed down to 12 jurors and four alternates. So far, only 30 people have qualified; the pool must have at least 36 people to account for the number that lawyers for both sides can exclude without giving a reason.

"It took us all day to get six jurors qualified," Judge Walton said.

It was a day consumed with unexpectedly long bouts of questioning, largely from Mr. Libby's lawyers, who are trying to exclude anyone with a bias against the administration.

Of the 10 jurors who were dismissed Thursday, the views of some were quickly apparent; others came out only under detailed questioning.

In the morning, a woman who said she was an economist, told the court that she believed the war was "a terrible mistake, a horrendous mistake and a betrayal" of the country. She eventually acknowledged that such hard feelings could affect how she views testimony from Mr. Cheney and other officials.

President Bush Should Go Ahead And Pardon Libby (SCRIPPS)

By DAN K. THOMASSON, Scripps Howard News Service

If George W. Bush really wants to strike a blow for justice he should pardon I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby now before his prosecution costs the taxpayers one dime more. It is really time to put an end to one of the most bizarre and disruptive politically inspired cases in recent memory.

Libby, as most Americans know, is the scapegoat for a non- crime that involved the public identification of a one-time undercover operative of the CIA, Valerie Plame, the wife of a small time diplomat, Joseph Wilson, who tweaked the White House over its claims that Saddam Hussein was seeking nuclear material in Africa. Plame, the White House claims, had a hand in the agency's assigning her husband to investigate the claims, which were among those contentions used to justify the invasion of Iraq. Wilson found the claims unsubstantiated.

In the backlash over Wilson's report, Plame's identity as a CIA employee and her role in her husband's selection was leaked to a national columnist, Robert Novak. The CIA demanded an investigation into whether the disclosure violated an obscure law prohibiting the outing of an undercover agent. A special prosecutor, Patrick Fitzgerald, was named by the Justice Department. Fitzgerald knew the source of the leak about Plame from the outset and determined rather rapidly the law had not been violated. The original source of Plame's identification, by the way, was not Libby but Undersecretary of State Richard Armitage.

Now we are at the beginning of a senseless, albeit sensational trial brought about by Fitzgerald's decision to find someone in the White House to bring to ground despite his own discovery that no crime had been committed. He settled on Libby, an aide to Vice President Richard Cheney, whom he charged with lying to the FBI and a grand jury and obstructing justice in the pursuit of answers he (Fitzgerald) already had. Libby said he first heard about Plame from a television personality, Tim Russert, but Russert denies the claim even as he concedes he talked to Libby.

Libby says his naming Russert as a source was a mistake brought about by a busy schedule that made it difficult to remember from whom he received what. Under normal circumstances, a prosecutor might be willing to accept this explanation, particularly since Libby is a lawyer of proven merit who would understand the consequences of deliberately lying to a grand jury. It is almost inconceivable that he would lie, particularly since he knew his statement could be checked easily. But Fitzgerald, known as the Boy Scout of federal prosecutors, was as relentless as if he had just read "Les Miserables" and was a fan of the French police inspector.

There is some indication that he really wanted to nail the president's chief political advisor, Carl Rove, but settled finally on Libby, who is not known as an ideologue or even wildly political. His wife, who also is a lawyer, is in fact on the other side of most political issues, according to reports.

The effort to choose a jury this trial already has shown signs of being more a debate on Bush's Iraq policy than an effort to find justice. Those facing empanelment have been asked their feelings about the president and several have been dismissed for voicing their animosity. Shades of things to come as the testimony of everyone from Cheney to a handful of prominent journalists and TV stars begins in earnest.

This is the inside the Beltway kind of circus this town loves. It is a travesty with some long-lasting consequences from which no one emerges unscathed _ not the press, the prosecutor, the White House, the CIA, Wilson and Plame (the darlings of the Georgetown dining out set) and certainly not Libby, whose reputation as a tough, quiet but decent person already has been severely maligned. There is no constitutional crisis in this _ nothing of great national import took place. No harm was done by the disclosure that Plame, who hadn't been undercover for years, worked for the CIA.

Severe damage, however, has been done to the First Amendment by an over zealous prosecutor who, among other things, insisted on jailing a reporter for not revealing her source for a story she never wrote, undercutting a policy and tradition that has been a bulwark of press freedom since the beginning of the nation. The result is a chilling impact on the role of the Fourth Estate as the watchdog of democracy.

So, Mr. President, it is time you exercised your own constitutional prerogatives and ended this nonsense immediately. Even if an impartial jury could be selected, which is highly doubtful in this venue, the trial is an injustice.

Contractor Proves Key In Two Federal Probes (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

A key figure in the case against former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham has become a focus of the federal investigation of another Republican from California, Rep. Jerry Lewis.

The person who has emerged in both probes is Brent Wilkes, a Poway, Calif., entrepreneur, said people with knowledge of the investigation. His firm received defense and intelligence contracts with congressional help from Mr. Cunningham. The former lawmaker pleaded guilty in November to charges that included soliciting bribes from Mr. Wilkes and was sentenced to more than eight years in prison.

ETHICS QUESTIONS

• The News: A defense contractor emerges as a key figure in two federal investigations.

• The Debate: Prosecutors are looking into whether a lawmaker improperly helped companies to secure government contracts.

• What's Next: The probes are renewing attention to congressional earmarks and, more broadly, ethics reform.

Prosecutors in Los Angeles are examining whether Mr. Lewis may have improperly helped Mr. Wilkes's companies obtain government contracts. A spokeswoman for Mr. Lewis declined to comment on the investigation.

Mr. Lewis is under investigation for possible improper conduct in obtaining "earmarks," or legislative language that steers federal funds to specific recipients. The continuing investigation into his actions is significant because the new House Republican leadership decided to keep Mr. Lewis, of California, on the Appropriations Committee as the top minority member, despite the probe. He had been chairman until Democrats took control of the House this month.

Mr. Lewis has represented California's 41st district since 1979. He was chairman of an appropriations subcommittee on armed services before moving up to become chairman of the Appropriations Committee in January 2005.

The inquiry promises to sustain the debate over congressional earmarks, which has been at the center of this year's attempt to enact new ethics rules for Congress. The House has passed a bill imposing major restrictions although a vote yesterday cast doubt on whether a similar bill will be approved by the Senate.

Prosecutors designated Mr. Wilkes an unindicted co-conspirator in the charges against Mr. Cunningham. Mr. Wilkes himself has been under investigation separately, by the same federal prosecutors in San Diego who investigated the Cunningham case. People with knowledge of that investigation said prosecutors are bringing in last-minute witnesses before a grand jury and expect Mr. Wilkes will be indicted early next month. These people said Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney in San Diego who has been asked to resign by the Justice Department, requested that prosecutors on the case wrap up the investigation and bring charges before she officially steps down Feb. 15. The Justice Department has confirmed that several U.S. attorneys were asked to step down for reasons it said were related to performance but has declined to give details.

Mark Geragos, one of Mr. Wilkes's lawyers, said, "We're comfortable that everything Brent Wilkes did was above board and legal and we don't think that there is any cause for anyone to question it, let alone indict him."

Rep. Lewis' close relationship with a Washington lobbying firm, Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White, is a subject of the probe. The firm was founded by former congressman Bill Lowery, a friend of Mr. Lewis.

Copeland Lowery flourished by signing up corporate and local government clients, which subsequently won earmarks pushed through with Mr. Lewis' help. One Copeland Lowery client, the Lake Arrowhead Community Services District in California, disclosed that the lobbying firm helped obtain for it federal grants totaling $680,000. After the University of Redlands hired Copeland Lowery, it obtained Mr. Lewis's help in securing $21.5 million in federal money for research and a new science center.

One matter under investigation is the tens of millions of dollars in earmarks Mr. Lewis obtained for clients of the firm, which since has split up. Prosecutors also are focusing on campaign contributions Mr. Wilkes and his associates made to Mr. Lewis, and contracts Mr. Wilkes's companies obtained after hiring Copeland Lowery. Among other things, they are looking for possible evidence that Mr. Lewis directed Mr. Wilkes to hire Copeland Lowery as the price for getting earmarks passed, said the people with knowledge of the case.

Barbara Comstock, a spokeswoman for Mr. Lewis, said she wouldn't have any comment on possible links between Messrs. Lewis and Wilkes.

Prosecutors have cast a wide net, some months ago subpoenaing voluminous records from county and local governments in Southern California and companies, all of which hired Copeland Lowery to lobby for them. Many received federal money for local projects with Mr. Lewis's help. People close to the case said prosecutors have focused heavily on contracts awarded to Mr. Wilkes's companies and large campaign contributions he made.

Records on file with the House clerk show Copeland Lowery lobbied on behalf of one Wilkes company, ADCS Inc., from 1998 to 2000, and from 2002 to 2005. ADCS, or Automated Document Conversion Systems, specialized in converting military documents on paper into computerized records. Beginning in 1997, with help from members of the appropriations committee, including Mr. Cunningham, the Poway, Calif., company began winning multimillion-dollar military contracts. Copeland Lowery disclosed receiving about $160,000 for the work. After Mr. Wilkes' name surfaced publicly last year in connection with the corruption investigations, Copeland Lowery revised its disclosure reports to state that it received more than $340,000 from ADCS. A lawyer for Copeland Lowery said the error was inadvertent.

The Project on Government Oversight, a nonpartisan organization that focuses on exposing government corruption, last year found a travel report showing that Mr. Lewis traveled from Washington to visit ADCS headquarters in 1998, shortly before

ADCS received a government contract. Mr. Lewis' office confirmed that in the early 1990s, he traveled to Belize on a trip sponsored by Mr. Lowery that included Mr. Wilkes, among others.

Federal campaign records also show Mr. Wilkes and five employees or relatives donated on the same date in 1999 a total of $11,000 to Mr. Lewis's campaign fund. Mr. Wilkes and related individuals also contributed $7,000 in early 1998.

On Sept. 18, 2002, Mr. Wilkes, his wife, nephew and two employees donated $10,000 to Mr. Lewis's Future Leaders Political Action Committee. In 2003, Mr. Wilkes donated another $2,000 to the fund. Mr. Lewis, as with many congressional leaders, maintained the PAC to collect funds that then could be doled out to help fellow Republican lawmakers who faced re-election fights. That largess was credited with helping Mr. Lewis get the Republican leadership's backing to become appropriations chairman.

Mr. Wilkes and people associated with him donated in total about $60,000 to Mr. Lewis' campaign fund or political-action committee. (Mr. Cunningham received campaign donations of $84,500 from Mr. Wilkes and associates.)

It is illegal for a congressman to support legislation as a direct quid pro quo for campaign contributions, but direct links between contributions and actions are difficult to prove. The government must show that the lawmaker took official action only because of the donation. The Constitution's "speech and debate" clause also prevents prosecutors from using evidence from congressional debates, and limits their access to records or testimony about meetings lawmakers held to discuss legislation.

The Los Angeles prosecutors examining Mr. Lewis' actions are looking for a possible direct link, the people with knowledge of the investigation said.

In January 2003, longtime Lewis aide Letitia White left his staff to become a Copeland Lowery partner. Another top aide to Mr. Lewis, Jeffrey Shockey, left the congressman's staff in 1999 to work for the firm. He then returned to become the appropriations committee's deputy staff director when Mr. Lewis became chairman.

Through a spokesman, Copeland Lowery principals have denied any wrongdoing. A spokesman for the principals said "the firm's work is consistent with the laws, rules and regulations that govern federal lobbying." He declined to comment further.

The Cunningham case involved soliciting direct bribes for personal use. According to Mr. Cunningham's plea agreement, Mr. Wilkes paid $636,000 in bribes, including $525,000 to pay off a mortgage on Mr. Cunningham's home.

Man, 26, Admits His Role In Fatal Fight (BOS)

SOMERVILLE

A 26-year-old Somerville man pleaded guilty yesterday to second-degree murder in Middlesex Superior Court in Lowell, admitting that he helped another man kill Ryan Sullivan, 16, in Somerville during a fight on Warwick Street in July 2004. Van Gustave was sentenced to life in prison with the possibility of parole after 15 years, the Middlesex district attorney's office reported. Prosecutors said Gustave and Joseph Spinucci, who was convicted last year of first-degree murder, got into an argument with a friend of Sullivan's that escalated into the murder.

R.J. Reynolds responds to nicotine report Responding to a Harvard study on nicotine levels, cigarette maker R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. said in a statement yesterday that the company "does not have a program to systematically increase the nicotine content or smoke nicotine yields of its products." Researchers from the Harvard School of Public Health issued a report yesterday that examined industry-supplied data on the nicotine content of cigarettes as well as other factors in cigarettes that can affect nicotine delivery. The Harvard researchers confirmed an earlier Massachusetts Department of Public Health study that showed an upward trend in inhalable nicotine levels. The Harvard report also found that actual nicotine content in the tobacco used in cigarettes increased from 1997 to 2005.

Retired FBI agent's murder trial delayed A Miami judge agreed yesterday to a defense request to delay the murder trial of retired FBI special agent John J. Connolly Jr. until Oct. 22 to give lawyers more time to prepare. Connolly was indicted in May 2005 on state murder charges in allegedly helping longtime informants James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi orchestrate a 1982 gangland slaying in Florida. The victim, John B. Callahan, a Winchester financier , was killed allegedly because the gangsters feared he would tell the FBI they were involved in the slaying of Tulsa businessman Roger Wheeler, who owned World Jai Alai. Connolly, 66, is serving a 10-year prison term for his 2002 conviction on federal racketeering and obstruction of justice charges for protecting Bulger and Flemmi from prosecution.

Teachers OK English High as pilot school Teachers in Boston's English High School agreed yesterday to turn the troubled school into a Commonwealth pilot school, converting the 1,300-student school into a smaller college preparatory school starting in September. Under the school's proposal, which 81 percent of teachers approved, the school will set tougher graduation requirements, require daily courses focused on getting students into college, and institute a longer school day. The school will be divided into two communities of 400 students each. In November, the state Board of Education offered English High and three other schools a chance to fix themselves by becoming pilot schools, which gives teachers and principals more flexibility in budgets, schedules, and curriculum.

Suffolk names new law school dean A former Indiana University law school dean will replace Robert Smith as dean of Suffolk University Law School on July 1, the school announced yesterday. Alfred Aman Jr. is now director of the Institute for Advanced Study and a law professor at Indiana University, and he has also worked at Cornell Law School and in England, France, and Italy. During Smith's eight-year tenure, Suffolk opened graduate and international programs at Suffolk. After a sabbatical, he will return to teaching. The school enrolls about 1,600 students.

DA wants Worthington evidence sealed Prosecutors have filed a motion to seal permanently the graphic photographs and video used in the trial of a trash collector convicted of killing former fashion writer Christa Worthington. Cape and Islands District Attorney Michael O'Keefe filed the motion in Barnstable Superior Court on Tuesday after a CBS television request earlier this month to gain access to pictures and video from the trial. Christopher M. McCowen was convicted in November of murdering and raping Worthington in her Truro home in 2002. Evidence during the five-week trial included horrific crime scene photos and police video of Worthington's body. The images should be kept from the public because of their "personal nature" and "to protect the privacy of Worthington's family and estate," the district attorney's motion said. (AP)

Ney's Friends, Foes Speak Out Before His Sentencing Friday (GANNETT)

By Malia Rulon, Gannett News Service

Gannett, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — The federal judge who will sentence disgraced former Rep. Bob Ney to prison Friday has received a barrage of opinions about how much prison time he should get, according to documents filed Thursday.

Most of the 75 letters sent to the judge came from supporters, including a handwritten note from Ney's parents, and letters from childhood friends, his doctor, local officials, including Dover Mayor Richard P. Homrighausen, and several former staff members and campaign workers.

"Frankly, we are all disappointed with the activities in which he engaged that led to his conviction, however, I want to assure you that he has many other admirable traits that we believe are worthy of your consideration," wrote Brook A. Cheney, who was a classmate of Ney's at Ohio State University.

Ney, of Heath, pleaded guilty in October to two felony charges of conspiracy to commit fraud and making false statements. The charges stem from a series of free trips, meals and gifts Ney accepted from convicted former Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff and others in exchange for official favors.

His actions carry a maximum sentence of 10 years and a $500,000 fine, but Justice Department prosecutors have agreed as part of Ney's plea deal to ask for a little over two years in prison and between $5,000 and $60,000 in fines.

Nine letters came from people who want U.S. District Judge Ellen Huvelle to sentence Ney to the maximum amount of time possible.

"If the punishment really fit the crime, he'd have been shot at sunrise," Ben Alvin Walker wrote. "Throw the book at him; throw two books at him."

DOJ_NMG_0118648

The former six-term congressman has been undergoing treatment for alcohol abuse since September, and in court papers, his lawyers have asked Huvelle to allow him to continue his treatment while incarcerated.

Several letters also included requests that Ney continue his treatment.

“Bob was a functioning alcoholic who could rarely make it through the day without drinking and would often begin drinking beers as early as 7:30 a.m., ” wrote Matt Parker, Ney’s former campaign manager.

Parker wrote that Ney has been attending recovery meetings sometimes as early as 7 a.m. and often three times a day.

“I am pleading for Bob to be able to continue with rehabilitation programs while he is incarcerated,” Parker wrote.

Charges Filed In Killing Of Beaumont Boy (LAT)

By Maeve Reston, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

A drifter who murdered and abducted members of an Idaho family is accused in the long-unsolved case of Anthony Martinez.

INDIO — A drifter who brutally murdered at least three members of an Idaho family in 2005 and kidnapped two of their young children was charged Thursday with the decade-old slaying of a 10-year-old Beaumont boy abducted at knifepoint near his backyard.

The 1997 killing of Anthony Martinez weighed heavily on the town of Beaumont, where billboards pleading for information about Anthony's disappearance remained for years.

Joseph Edward Duncan III, 43, was named as a suspect in Anthony's death in 2005 after he reportedly told FBI agents he was involved in the slaying. Investigators also said Duncan's fingerprint was discovered near Anthony's body, which was found nude and bound with duct tape on a remote canyon road north of Indio.

Riverside County Dist. Atty. Rod Pacheco on Thursday announced that Duncan had been charged with first-degree murder, and the newly elected prosecutor vowed to seek the death penalty.

Duncan, a convicted sex offender, pleaded guilty in October to three murder and three kidnapping charges in Idaho and is awaiting his final sentence for those crimes.

During that rampage, Duncan bludgeoned to death Brenda Groene; her fiance, Mark McKenzie; and her 13-year-old son, Slade Groene, inside their home near Coeur d'Alene. He then kidnapped the other two children in the house, 8-year-old Shasta Groene and her 9-year-old brother, Dylan.

A Coeur d'Alene waitress ended the nationwide hunt for Duncan when she recognized Shasta Groene, whose face was on "missing" fliers around town, at a Denny's in July 2005. Dylan Groene was later found dead at a Montana campsite.

On Thursday, just hours after Pacheco's news conference, a federal grand jury in Idaho indicted Duncan in the killings of Dylan Groene and the kidnapping of the two Groene children, which may make it more difficult for Riverside County authorities to extradite Duncan to California any time soon.

To prevent California from prosecuting Duncan first, federal officials in Idaho scrambled over the weekend to file a complaint against Duncan in federal court for taking a stolen Jeep across state lines.

"We've been aware that a number of places had an interest" in Duncan, said Jean McNeil, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Idaho. "We just wanted to make sure that he has to stand trial for these charges and he has to do that soon."

State prosecutors in Idaho have said they would seek the death penalty for the three killings in the house if Duncan escapes it in his federal trial for the kidnapping of the two remaining Groene children, the killing of Dylan Groene and the sexual assault of both. Duncan was sentenced to three consecutive life terms at the state level without parole for kidnapping.

The announcement of the Riverside County murder charges in the Anthony Martinez case marked the end of a long and often frustrating investigation by state, county and federal officials, who chased down about 15,000 leads before they found their suspect eight years later.

In the same press conference Thursday in Indio, Riverside County Sheriff Bob Doyle spoke directly to Anthony's mother, Diane Gonzales, who held back tears.

"While we cannot bring Anthony back to you, we can bring his killer to justice," Doyle said.

Anthony was playing outside with his brothers and friends in April 1997 when a man approached in a white sedan asking for help looking for his cat.

He jumped out of his car, pulled a knife from his waistband and grabbed Anthony, who struggled as he was dragged into the car.

Hundreds of law officers descended on Riverside County, combing the remote canyons and surrounding areas on horseback, on foot and in helicopters. Fifteen days later, a federal Bureau of Land Management employee on patrol spotted Anthony's body.

Mitch White, a lead investigator on the case with the Beaumont police, said investigators struggled for years as one lead after another fell through.

"I thought sooner or later, given the nature of this guy, he would get caught on some other crime," said White, a retired lieutenant. "We believed that he was not going to stop, that this was not an isolated thing."

Pacheco said prosecutors decided to seek the death penalty because of the vulnerability of the victim, the brutality of the crime and Duncan's record. Investigators believe Anthony was killed by blunt force against a rock, and he was sexually assaulted.

Duncan first served time for the 1980 rapes of a 14-year-old boy in Washington state. He told psychiatrists at a state mental hospital that he had raped other boys, as young as 12.

Anthony's mother said her family had wrestled with the death penalty question.

"We came up with the conclusion that we would stand by whatever the district attorney decided to do in the case of Joseph Duncan — provided that Joseph Duncan never see the light of day again, whether that be through death or incarceration for the rest of his life," Gonzales said. "We believe justice will prevail whether it be through the courts or through the eyes of God."

RETHINKING REHAB Treatment For Prisoners Draws Fire Over Scientology (WSJ)

By Lauren Etter

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. -- Last November, in a cedar sauna cranked up to 160 degrees, a crowd of sweaty men read books and chatted amid mariachi music. They emerged to nibble from a tray of raw vegetables or take shots of olive oil.

This is not a spa. This is Second Chance, one of the country's most unusual alternatives to the nation's prison systems. Founded by a Scientologist and former real-estate developer -- and funded partly by federal tax dollars -- Second Chance is a treatment program for nonviolent prisoners with substance-abuse problems.

It is based on principles of L. Ron Hubbard, founder of the Scientology religion, who argued that toxins from drugs and pesticides accumulate in the body's fatty tissues, making it difficult for addicts to kick their habit. Saunas and vitamins are intended to purge these residues. Facing few options for successful long-term ways to treat criminal defendants with serious drug problems, 24 of New Mexico's 84 district judges have sentenced more than 50 prisoners to terms at Second Chance.

Even before it opened its doors to inmates last September, Second Chance and its unconventional methods had ignited a controversy in New Mexico's legal community. At the center of the debate are two former friends and sometime adversaries. William Lang, chief district judge in the area that includes Albuquerque, doesn't want his colleagues to sentence inmates to Second Chance. On the other side is Judge Lang's predecessor, W. John Brennan, who was hired by Second Chance to convince judges to do just that.

"There's a dire need for a secure residential facility for defendants with substance-abuse problems," says District Judge Ross Sanchez. He has sent three inmates to Second Chance, where the minimum stay is six months.

'Highly Suspicious'

But Judge Lang says he is "highly suspicious" of the program. "If it is connected to Scientology, just say so," he says. Second Chance officials and a spokeswoman for the Church of Scientology say there are no ties.

For most of his 25-year career, Mr. Brennan was a highly respected member of the legal community. He and Judge Lang were close; Mr. Brennan presided over Judge Lang's wedding 18 years ago. But the men had a falling out in 2002, when Judge Lang unsuccessfully attempted to gather enough votes from judges to unseat Judge Brennan.

Then, late one night in May 2004, Judge Brennan was arrested. Within four months he had resigned as judge and pleaded guilty to drunk driving and cocaine possession. He was sentenced to a year's probation. Judge Lang assumed Mr. Brennan's post as chief judge of New Mexico's Second Judicial District.

Now a consultant for Second Chance, Mr. Brennan believes that Judge Lang is cool toward the program because of his personal grudges. "I think it has to do with me," says Mr. Brennan, who lobbies judges to send convicts to Second Chance. "I don't think it has to do with the program." He adds Judge Lang's own battle with alcoholism makes him skeptical of unorthodox treatment programs.

Judge Lang, who attends Alcoholics Anonymous meetings, says personal grudges have nothing to do with his skepticism about Second Chance. Judge Lang says he believes funding for treatment should go to existing programs that have a track record.

Now the $350,000 in federal funds granted to Second Chance is running out. Last month Mr. Brennan appeared with one state representative before New Mexico's Legislative Finance Committee and asked for $3.6 million for the program.

Second Chance is the brainchild of Rick Pendery, a former real-estate developer who says he has spent decades studying world religions with a focus on the writings of Mr. Hubbard.

In 1995 Mr. Pendery opened the first Second Chance program in Ensenada, Mexico, using his own money and funds from the Mexican government. His first attempts to open a program in the U.S. failed.

Then in 2002, Mr. Pendery gave a presentation on Second Chance to a conference of women legislators in San Diego and took about 60 of them to Ensenada. Anna Crook, a Republican state legislator from New Mexico, came away impressed, she says.

Ms. Crook asked New Mexico's Department of Corrections to work with Second Chance to establish a pilot project. The department declined because Second Chance isn't a "good fit," according to a spokeswoman. Undeterred, Ms. Crook says she then went to Washington and secured $350,000 for Second Chance from the 2004 appropriations bill.

With federal funds approved, Mr. Pendery says the "overwhelming majority" of the remaining $300,000 needed to start Second Chance came from businessman Randall Suggs, a Scientologist who owns a stake in the Arizona Diamondbacks baseball team. The state of New Mexico later allocated $300,000. Mr. Suggs didn't return phone calls.

Another Challenge

Second Chance's next challenge was to persuade judges to send addicts convicted of either misdemeanors or felonies to the program. In September 2005, Mr. Pendery approached Mr. Brennan, who had recently returned from two months of rehabilitation at the Betty Ford Center. Mr. Brennan wanted to get back into the criminal-justice field, but says he initially wasn't sure what Scientology was. After trying some of the Second Chance treatments himself, Mr. Brennan was sold and signed on.

"In the back of my mind I thought five years down the line, if this works, I'll have some sort of public redemption," he says.

In August 2006, Mr. Brennan was scheduled to make a presentation about Second Chance to a panel of New Mexico criminal judges. Judge Lang made his opposition clear. "I suggested it would probably not be a good idea" for Mr. Brennan to give the presentation, says Mr. Lang. "The whole pall that [the arrest] cast over the court, and the great cloud of suspicion, had not completely lifted."

Ultimately, Mr. Brennan didn't make the presentation. He says he was told Judge Lang didn't want him entering the courthouse, an account Judge Lang disputes.

Last summer, Judge Lang cautioned many of New Mexico's district judges and Kari Brandenburg, district attorney for the Second Judicial District, about the program, he says. Ms. Brandenburg argues any kind of treatment -- however unusual -- is better than no treatment at all. "We need to have an open mind," she says. "If it doesn't work we'll get rid of it."

The center received its first inmate in September. Currently, about half of the inmates who are qualified to go to Second Chance ultimately go to the program, Mr. Brennan says.

Still, some judges are balking. "I'm not ordering or sentencing anybody to that program at this time," said Judge Denise Barela Shepherd at a Nov. 8 hearing where she sentenced a probation violator to prison instead. In an interview, Ms. Shepherd said there isn't enough evidence for her to conclude the program works.

Mr. Hubbard's principles have been taken to prisons before. For many years a program called Criminon, also based on Mr. Hubbard's teachings, has operated drug-intervention programs in jails. But Second Chance represents the first time in the U.S. that an incarceration facility has been designed around Mr. Hubbard's methods, which involve not just behavioral treatments but saunas and specific diets as well.

Located on a tumbleweed-strewn patch of desert, Second Chance's cement structure is ringed by a chain-link fence topped with barbed wire. Inside, linoleum hallways give way to an open dormitory. A nearby room houses the sauna, which is used by every inmate for a four-week period, five hours a day.

Inmates eat organic beef. They choose from an array of vitamins to ingest, including potassium pills if they're feeling dizzy, or bioplasma pills to offset salt depletion. Inmates addicted to heroin can get a massage, called a "nerve assist," from another inmate. Scientologists believe nerve assists help drugs depart the body.

In addition to saunas and specific diets, Second Chance focuses on helping inmates communicate more effectively, on the belief that better communication skills will reduce offenders' need to act out in negative ways.

One recent morning, Vincent Gutierrez, 29 years old, who has been in and out of jail for drug use since age 13, sat with a group of other inmates working on a series of communication drills that are also based on techniques developed by Mr. Hubbard.

Bull-Baiting

One drill, called bull-baiting, is designed to help participants learn how to tolerate verbal assaults. Mr. Gutierrez stared into the eyes of another inmate stationed three feet away. As his partner yelled scripted statements at him like "You look like a frog!" Mr. Gutierrez was supposed to remain impassive. Another drill has inmates sit opposite each other, look each other in the eye and read lines from Lewis Carroll's Alice in Wonderland.

Mr. Gutierrez says the drills have helped him "figure it out the positive way instead of using my knuckles."

Mr. Pendery says that by addressing the root causes of drug abuse, his program reduces the number of inmates who return to jail after being released. He says a study shows that the Second Chance program in Ensenada resulted in a drop in recidivism rates to 10% from 83% over a six-year period. The Mexico program recently closed its doors after losing its government funding, he says.

Advocates say Second Chance also saves money because it doesn't require maximum-security guards and doesn't administer pharmaceutical drugs. It costs about $55 a day for one inmate in the Second Chance program, compared with about $70 a day for an inmate at the county jail.

Bill Miller, an addiction expert and a retired professor of psychiatry at the University of New Mexico, reviewed Second Chance at the request of the city of Albuquerque. "There's a lot of use of sauna with the idea that you sweat out toxins in the system. I don't know of any scientific basis for that," he says. "It wasn't clear to me what sort of scientific basis there was even for the conception of the program to begin with."

Does it work? "Basically we just don't know," he says.

Teen Says He Was 'Terrified' Of Captor (WP)

By Kari Lydersen

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Michael J. Devlin, the suburban St. Louis man accused of abducting two boys and holding one for four years, pleaded not guilty yesterday in Franklin County, Mo., court to one count of kidnapping in last week's abduction of William "Ben" Ownby, 13.

Devlin was also charged with felony kidnapping and felony armed criminal action in nearby Washington County, Mo., on Wednesday in the 2002 abduction of Shawn Hornbeck, 15. Prosecutor John D. Rupp Jr. has alleged that Devlin, 41, initially brandished a handgun to control Shawn, then 11 years old.

Shawn told Oprah Winfrey during an interview aired yesterday that he did not try to flee from Devlin because he was "terrified," even though he would regularly ride his bike alone and had access to a cellphone and a computer. He confirmed that he posted a message signed "Shawn Devlin" on the Web site that his parents, Pam and Craig Akers, set up to search for him and other missing children. The post, which asked how long the Akerses planned to look for their son, was an effort to send a signal, he told Winfrey.

The Akerses told Winfrey they thought Shawn had been sexually abused during his time with Devlin, though they said they had not asked him directly.

Hornbeck and Ownby were found last week after police recognized Devlin's white pickup truck while serving a warrant to another resident at the apartment complex where he lived.

Sharon Cooper, a forensic pediatrician at the University of North Carolina and a consultant for the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, said it would not be hard for someone such as Devlin to make an 11-year-old afraid to leave.

"At that age, it's very easy to convince them of anything once you have removed them from their support system," she said. "He was in such isolation, deprived of his family, deprived of school and normal social contact, he was in a circumstance without other outlets to help him make a decision. He's totally helpless and having to rely almost totally on an offender for his basic needs -- food, clothing, shelter. He is dependent on that individual for his own survival."

Devlin's relatives, locally well known, did not know until the arrest that he had children living with him. For security reasons, he made his not-guilty plea via closed-circuit television, and he declined to make a statement.

The Franklin County prosecutor's office, which would not comment further, said Devlin's first hearing will be March 15. His attorneys are asking for a change of venue for the trial. Devlin is being held in isolation in the Franklin County Jail in lieu of $1 million bail, and his bail is set at $3 million in Washington County.

The U.S. attorney's office in St. Louis has been working with local prosecutors, but no federal charges have been filed, said local Justice spokeswoman Jan Diltz. An FBI spokesman in St. Louis said federal charges will be considered.

Detectives in Lincoln County, Mo., an hour's drive from St. Louis, are looking for clues that might link Devlin to the disappearance of Charles Arlin Henderson, who was 11 when he vanished while riding his bike in 1991, or to the case of Bianca Piper, who disappeared from a rural road in March 2005, when she was 13. Police in nearby St. Charles are also investigating whether Devlin could be linked to the disappearance 19 years ago of Scott Kleeschulte, then 9.

"When you look at Ben, Shawn and Arlin, there are some striking similarities, both physically and in the way they disappeared," said Lt. Rick Harrell, spokesman for the Lincoln County sheriff's department. "Like Shawn, Arlin was on his bike in a rural area. And Bianca is female, but we can't automatically discount her case either. When you have Ben and Shawn found alive, you have a glimmer of hope that we'll find our missing kids and get them back in their parents' arms."

Faith-based Initiative (WT)

By Deborah Simmons

Every year, 600,000 or so prisoners are given their walking papers to return to a neighborhood near you. The odds of their walking the straight and narrow are overwhelmingly against them, with an estimated two-thirds likely to be rearrested within three years of their release. The annual tab is staggering because American taxpayers spend $60 billion to keep criminals behind bars (compared with the $34 billion we spent on the Department of Homeland Security's budget last fiscal year). Our wallets are wedged between a rock and a very hard place.

Sometimes, we pay upward of $40,000 per prisoner. Either we can allow policies to continue as they have been and throw good money after ornery lawmaking, or we can change course slightly and experiment. President Bush said as much in his 2004 State of the Union address: "a plan to harness the resources and experience of faith-based and community organizations in dealing with the challenges of helping returning inmates contribute to society."

Whether we like it or not, the ex-offenders are coming back, many to homes with no hearth. When they return in such large numbers, they put a strain on our police and sheriff's departments, which are responsible for keeping track of ex-offenders. Some neighborhoods are overwhelmed by the sheer number of ex-offenders, with local and county governments establishing halfway houses and group homes, and court-intervention and counseling sites in traditional residential neighborhoods — often depressing housing values in the process.

The Second Chance Act, federal legislation that has bipartisan support, offers a different course. While the bill, which failed to get through the 109th Congress, muddles some of the taut lines that ordinarily distinguish law-and-order hard-liners from progressive Democrats, it fits comfortably into the mold of compassionate conservatism with a faith-based component. In fact, the Second Chance Act helps explain why "blue states" in the Northeast are willing participants in the Bush administration's faith-based initiative when compared to "red states" and other regions, according to a 2006 study by the Joint Center for Political Studies.

Ex-offenders often return home with no family support, no job skills and no means to support themselves, circumstances that swing wide the revolving door to recidivism. Sometimes, faith is all an ex-con has.

Demetrius Davis walks in faith. Boxing since he was of school-age, he wears his Christian faith as comfortably as he does his boxing gloves. But that wasn't always so. Demetrius grew up in the ring. His father is renowned former Golden Gloves champ-turned-trainer Adrian Davis and, his mom, Brenda, is the longtime "go-to-man" for the regional Golden Gloves. (The Davises are proprietors of Round 1 Gym.) In a way, Demetrius has been punching his way through life since he was a tot.

In a recent interview, Demetrius, now 38 years old, chose his words carefully, reluctant to tell this stranger the details of why he landed himself in prison. So I let Demetrius' sleeping demons lie and allowed his explanation of becoming "a follower not a leader" speak for itself.

A lover of sports, he played football and basketball as a teen and accepted the fact that boxing is literally in his veins. He's been ranked by the International Boxing Federation, World Boxing Association, World Boxing Council and International Boxing Organization, and points out that his "dad taught me everything I know. ... He will always be my trainer."

Understand, the list of boys and men with whom Demetrius has had to share his dad is quite lengthy — Hasim Rahman, Sharmba Mitchell and William Joppy, to name a few — and they all made long green following Mr. Davis' lead. Such a list easily could shake the faith of the proudest man-child, but Demetrius doesn't flinch. "I thank the Lord for him every day," he says.

Sensing that Demetrius had become a bit more comfortable with this stranger, I turned the conversation to leadership, asking him what advice he had for boys and men who are looking in all the wrong places for leadership. "Get to know God," Demetrius replied without hesitation regarding his personal faith-based initiative. "I'm not supposed to be here talking to you right now....Get them in the gym.... They need more people who care about them around them. ... Most people don't understand. ... [They are] glorifying the bling-bling. ... [After prison] they revert back to the same environment."

"The same environment." Violent crime. Drug wars. Gangs. Gun control. Rampant substance abuse.

It costs on the front end. It costs on the back end. We pay as individuals for the consequences of our actions and as a society for the consequences of our inaction. Sometimes, we have to walk on faith and give a person a second chance.

Justice Dept. Tries To Block Wage Payout (BUFFNEWS)

By Matt Gryta, News Staff Reporter

The U.S. Justice Department renewed efforts Wednesday to block a state court from approving payment of wages owed to 85 former employees of the government-closed St. Augustine Center.

A week ago, State Supreme Court Justice John A. Michalek refused to permit the Internal Revenue Service to intervene in the court case, which is aimed at closing the human services center's financial books and paying the back wages.

Wednesday, the Justice Department asked U.S. District Judge John V. Elfvin to quash that case, claiming that it "threatens to impair the ability of the U.S. to enforce its tax liens."

In its latest legal effort, the Justice Department has filed a federal civil action against State Supreme Court in Erie County, the state Labor Department and Adam W. Perry, the Buffalo attorney Michalek named last year to serve as receiver to close the books on the center.

"I'm very disappointed that the government is attempting to deny the employees wages that they earned" in closing down the center and ensuring all its clients were properly placed with other Buffalo-area human services agencies, Perry said.

Last February, Michalek ordered the shutdown of the debt-plagued nonprofit agency, which for decades had served Buffalo's black community.

Study On Nicotine Levels Stirs Calls For New Controls (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — A Harvard study concluding that cigarette makers have for years deliberately increased nicotine levels in cigarettes to make them more addictive led to renewed calls Thursday for greater federal oversight of the industry.

"Given the harm that tobacco causes, it shouldn't be a game of cat-and-mouse to figure out what the industry is doing to cigarettes," said Dr. Josh Sharfstein, commissioner of health for the City of Baltimore.

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who is now chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, promised to reintroduce within weeks a bill that would allow the Food and Drug Administration to regulate cigarettes.

Mr. Kennedy said the Harvard study, which was released this week, "is dramatic new proof that Big Tobacco is addicted to addicting millions of young smokers."

Mr. Kennedy's bill passed the Senate in 2004 but failed in the House. With Democrats now in control of both houses, public health advocates said they had new hope that the legislation — debated for more than a decade — could pass.

Philip Morris, the nation's largest cigarette maker, released a statement Wednesday taking issue with the Harvard study but saying the company supported Mr. Kennedy's bill.

The company, which is owned by the Altria Group, said its own reports showed that nicotine yields for its top-selling Marlboro brand were the same in 2006 as they were in 1997. Changes between those years, it said, "reflect that there are random variations in cigarette nicotine yields."

The Harvard researchers analyzed data only through 2005, although they promised to include 2006 figures in future analyses.

Dr. Gregory Connolly, a professor at the Harvard School of Public Health who was a leader of the study, said there was nothing random about the growth in nicotine yields, which occurred across all cigarette brands and makers.

"We know from our data that there are intentional design changes that result in more nicotine in smoke that increases the capacity for the cigarette to cause and maintain addiction," Dr. Connolly said.

Company representatives at Lorillard Tobacco, owned by Loews, and R. J. Reynolds Tobacco, owned by Reynolds American, did not respond to phone messages.

Cigarette makers have for decades denounced scientific efforts to measure the byproducts and effects of cigarette smoking. And for decades, experts have been arguing over the best ways to measure smoke from smoking.

One common way has been to use machines to mimic smoking. For years, these tests were done at the Federal Trade Commission.

In recent years, however, government regulators have asked cigarette makers to do these machine tests themselves. And beginning in 1997, Massachusetts regulations required cigarette makers to file an annual report with health regulators on the results of these tests.

In August, the Massachusetts Department of Public Health issued a study showing that according to the industry's own reports, the amount of nicotine that could be inhaled from cigarettes had increased an average of 10 percent from 1998 through 2004. The report was immediately criticized by cigarette makers.

So Dr. Connolly and colleagues decided to undertake a far more sophisticated analysis of the underlying data provided by cigarette makers. The Harvard group found that nicotine yields from smoking had increased each year from 1998 through 2005, by about 11 percent altogether.

A sophisticated mathematical analysis of the data demonstrated that the increase could not be due to random variations, Dr. Connolly said.

DOJ_NMG_0118655

In August, in a racketeering suit brought by the Justice Department against the tobacco industry, a federal judge found that tobacco companies had for decades "manipulated the use of nicotine so as to increase and perpetuate addiction."

In ordering strict new limitations on tobacco marketing, the judge, Gladys Kessler of Federal District Court for the District of Columbia, also said that for decades, tobacco companies had "lied, misrepresented and deceived the American public."

Julie Brill, an assistant attorney general in Vermont, said she did not think the latest study would do anything to alter a deal reached in 1998 in which the tobacco industry agreed to pay states $246 billion. The money was to settle lawsuits seeking to recover expenses related to the treatment of tobacco-related illnesses.

Ms. Brill said she was "disappointed but not surprised" by the Harvard study.

"It leads one to question how long this industry can continue to be as unregulated as it is," she said.

Dr. Richard Hurt, director of the Mayo Clinic's nicotine dependence program, said he had reviewed the Harvard analysis and found it credible. And Dr. Hurt said documents disclosed in litigation against the industry showed that cigarette makers closely controlled the nicotine content of their products.

"If anyone thinks that tobacco companies have changed for the better and are now reformed, I have some beachfront property in Nebraska I'd like to sell them," he said.

Dr. David Kessler, who as commissioner of the F.D.A. during the Clinton administration sought to impose regulatory authority over cigarette makers, said cigarette makers had been manipulating nicotine levels for decades.

"Tobacco makers still have not answered some fundamental questions about why this is happening," said Dr. Kessler, now dean of the University of California, San Francisco, School of Medicine.

FOR YEARS, the federal government has tried, ineffectively, to litigate away the effects of smoking on people and the public purse, pursuing expensive lawsuits against an industry that nevertheless continues to produce a needlessly dangerous product. Then, in 2004, it seemed that Congress might opt for a better strategy by giving the Food and Drug Administration -- which already scrutinized everything from aspirin to Alpo -- the authority to regulate tobacco products. To make the measure palatable, its sponsors attached it to a proposal that handed tobacco farmers a $10 billion buyout package. Even so, the proposal died in conference at the hands of a hostile Republican House leadership and an indifferent White House.

Now the new Democratic majority has a chance to finally pass this needed reform. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) plans to reintroduce the 2004 legislation before the end of the month, and his office foresees holding hearings on the matter shortly after. This is a good idea that has languished for too long. We hope Mr. Kennedy can stick to this timetable and that the 110th Congress quickly passes the bill.

Proponents of the legislation point out that the FDA would be able to crack down on tobacco advertising, especially that which targets children; require that packs carry much larger warning labels with much more explicit messages; and provide authoritative information about the contents of cigarettes and their dangers. Even more significant, the FDA would have the power to require reasonable changes in the composition of the product so that it would be less dangerous to smokers and those around them. As it stands, tobacco companies are generally loath to alter their products, especially if doing so is merely to protect the health of their customers.

Yesterday, yet another study was released concluding that, unregulated, tobacco companies are going precisely in the wrong direction. The Harvard School of Public Health found that the amount of nicotine delivered to smokers' lungs increased by an average of 11 percent between 1998 and 2005, reflecting an increase in cigarettes' addictive potency. Tobacco companies accomplished this not only by changing ingredients but by modifying cigarette design to encourage smokers to take more puffs from each cigarette. As common-sense policies such as high cigarette excise taxes and smoking bans reduce the prevalence of smoking nationwide, the FDA should be allowed to do the same to tobacco's harmful effects.

Truck Driver Sentenced To Life In Prison In Deadliest U.S. Human Smuggling Attempt (AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 19, 2007

(AP) - HOUSTON-A truck driver was sentenced to life in prison Thursday, avoiding a death sentence for his role in the United States' deadliest human smuggling attempt in which 19 illegal immigrants died from dehydration and suffocation inside an overheated tractor-trailer.

Tyrone Williams, 36, was convicted last month on 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting immigrants.

A jury deliberated for 5 1/2 days before sentencing Williams, himself an immigrant from Jamaica.

Williams was sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole for each of the 19 counts of transporting the illegal immigrants who died. U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal will sentence Williams on Aug. 23 for the remaining 38 counts of harboring and transporting immigrants and for the conspiracy count. The maximum sentence for the conspiracy count is life in prison.

Williams looked down as the verdict was read and gave no visible reaction. His attorney, former U.S. Rep. Craig Washington, wept and wiped his eyes with a tissue.

Later, Washington said he was crying tears of joy.

"We're grateful to God and to the jury for saving Tyrone's life," Washington said.

Prosecutor Daniel Rodriguez looked grim after the sentence was announced as his boss, U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle, spoke to reporters.

"We did everything we could to impose a sentence of death. Nineteen life sentences is not something to be disappointed about," DeGabrielle said. "One human being had the chance to let those people out. That was Tyrone Williams."

In May 2003, Williams tractor-trailer was packed with more than 70 immigrants from Mexico, Central America and the Dominican Republic. As temperatures skyrocketed inside the airtight refrigerator truck, the immigrants kicked walls, clawed at insulation, broke out taillights and screamed for help.

Nineteen of the immigrants died from dehydration, overheating and suffocation during the smuggling attempt from South Texas to Houston. Williams abandoned the trailer at a truck stop near Victoria, Texas, about 100 miles (160 kilometers) southwest of Houston.

"Justice is served from today's sentencing," Assistant Homeland Security Secretary Julie Myers said in a written statement. "We hope this significant sentence will help dissuade potential alien smugglers away from this dangerous, dehumanizing and illegal business."

Jurors, who spoke to reporters on condition of anonymity, said they began each day of deliberations with 19 seconds of silence in memory of Williams' victims.

"It will probably be a very long time before any of us passes an 18-wheeler on the freeway without looking at it twice," said juror No. 9, a teacher.

Williams' attorneys argued he never intended for the immigrants to die and did not know they were succumbing to the deadly heat until it was too late. They blamed the deaths on other members of the smuggling ring who overstuffed the trailer.

Williams' family, including his mother and father, begged the jury to spare his life during emotional testimony presented at the retrial's punishment phase.

Prosecutors said Williams deserved a death sentence because he intentionally caused the immigrants' deaths by not freeing them when he knew their lives were in danger. They also noted he failed to take life-saving measures, like turning on the trailer's air conditioning, although some survivors testified they thought it had been turned on.

Washington said Thursday that jurors told him after the sentencing that he did not spend enough time during the trial proving that Williams had turned on the air conditioning.

Relatives of the 19 victims also testified, demanding justice and telling jurors their loved ones did not deserve to die the way they did.

Williams, who lived in Schenectady, New York, was the only one of 14 people charged in the case who faced the death penalty.

DOJ_NMG_0118657

This was the second time Williams was tried for the smuggling deaths.

In 2005, a jury convicted Williams on 38 transporting counts, but he avoided a death sentence because the jury could not agree on his role in the smuggling attempt. The jury deadlocked on the 20 other counts.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the verdict, saying the jury failed to specify his role in the crime.

Jury Spares Driver In Smuggling Deaths Case (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

HOUSTON, Jan. 18 — The truck driver who carried 19 illegal immigrants to their deaths in his suffocating trailer in 2003 was spared execution on Thursday and sentenced instead to life in prison without parole.

In a punishment verdict after five days of deliberations, the federal jury that last month convicted the driver, Tyrone M. Williams, on all charges in the nation's deadliest human smuggling case rejected the government's calls for the death penalty but meted out the stiffest possible life sentence.

Mr. Williams, who turned 36 on Thursday, reacted with impassivity but was hugged by his lawyers. His lead counsel, Craig Washington, wept — "tears of joy," he later said.

The foreman of the jury of seven women and five men said outside court that the death penalty had not been a close call.

"We felt as a consensus, as a jury, he didn't deserve it," said the foreman, an airline worker and one of three jurors who agreed to be interviewed afterward but insisted that their names not be disclosed.

The United States attorney in Houston, Don DeGabrielle, said prosecutors respected the verdict.

"We did everything we could to encourage them to impose a sentence of death," Mr. DeGabrielle said, adding that "19 sentences of life imprisonment were not something to be disappointed about."

On one count of conspiracy, the jury left it up to Judge Lee H. Rosenthal to impose sentence. She set Aug. 23 for a sentencing hearing.

The lead prosecutor, Daniel C. Rodriguez, presented anguished testimony of survivors and argued that Mr. Williams was the only one who could have saved the victims. But Mr. Washington repeatedly questioned why Mr. Williams, the only major African-American defendant among the ring of human smugglers, should be singled out for execution when co-conspirators made deals to testify for the government.

Mr. Williams was convicted on Dec. 4 of all 58 counts of human smuggling. Mr. Washington said he would appeal.

A first trial ended in March 2005 with the jury's finding of guilty on 38 counts but deadlocking on 20 others, including some eligible for death. The incomplete verdict was thrown out by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

Evidence in both trials showed that Mr. Williams, a milk trucker and small-time drug dealer from Schenectady, N.Y., was recruited to transport at least 73 illegal immigrants from Harlingen past a Border Patrol checkpoint, where they were to be transferred to a van and a pickup. But the other vehicles were blocked, and Mr. Williams was told to drive toward Houston.

With the passengers punching air holes in the sweltering trailer, Mr. Williams halted in Victoria, about 100 miles southwest of Houston, where he opened the trailer's doors, provided bottles of water and fled.

Along with the bodies of 19 victims, two of whom died later in the hospital, rescuers found 54 survivors. Some others may have escaped.

In his final prosecution arguments in the sentencing phase, Mr. Rodriguez said Mr. Williams had committed "acts of violence" by using what he called "in essence an unplugged refrigerator to transport these people." He said Mr. Williams had been motivated by "the oldest reason in the world, greed."

Mr. Washington, in his closing arguments, portrayed Mr. Williams as concerned about his riders once he realized their plight.

"I think the question is intent," he said, arguing that the government had not proved "that Tyrone intended to kill these poor souls."

And he said of the smuggling ringleaders: "Why aren't they facing the death penalty? They're all part of the conspiracy."

Jurors said they began each session of deliberations with 19 seconds of silence — one for each victim.

Brown's Attorney Closely Questions Expert In Federal Trial (AP)

By Ross Dellenger

AP, January 19, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - Attorneys for Noxubee County Democratic Party official Ike Brown continued a rigorous cross-examination of a government witness on Thursday in an attempt to find flaws in the witness' testimony.

Theodore Arrington, a University of North Carolina political science professor testifying for the U.S. Justice Department, examined the politics of Noxubee County and found that Brown and the county's Democratic Executive Committee are disenfranchising white voters.

He took the witness stand early Wednesday morning and finished at 4 p.m. Thursday after sometimes heated exchanges with Brown's defense attorney.

"I think we destroyed the expert," Brown said after testimony concluded.

The department accuses Brown of violating the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which was written to protect racial minorities when Mississippi and other Southern states strictly enforced segregation.

It is the first use of the act to allege discrimination against whites. Noxubee County is a rural area along the Alabama line with a majority black population.

While on the stand, Arrington said the government pays him $150 an hour during his investigations. Over the last five years, he has made hundreds of thousands of dollars, he said.

"The weight of the government and their resources are against us," said Brown, whose attorney is working for free.

Arrington testified Wednesday that Brown, the county Democratic Executive Committee's chairman, and others used racial slurs to alienate blacks who support white candidates. He also referred to six lawsuits prompted by complaints of voter irregularity in Noxubee County.

Brown's attorney, Wil Colom, closely questioned Arrington on Thursday about his earlier testimony and his investigative documents. Of the six election complaints cited by Arrington, five were overturned. The one upheld was the only election that took place under Brown's supervision as head of the executive committee.

Colom asked Arrington, the former vice chairman of the Republican Party in Charlotte, N.C., to give specific proof of ballot fraud and that coercion took place at the polls. A clearly frustrated Arrington could not.

Colom took each one of Arrington's studies and analyzed it for flaws.

Arrington interviewed a group of white women who wanted to assist in the Democratic primary, but were not allowed. Colom inferred that it was possibly because of their ages - they were all in their 70s - and not their race.

Arrington said Brown "chased" a candidate from a precinct and allowed others to stay, but when Colom asked Arrington to identify others who were allowed to stay at the precinct, Arrington couldn't identify any.

Colom also proved that Arrington did not interview Democratic poll workers. He also said that in one of Arrington's studies he interviewed 21 people, yet only five were black.

"And you think that your report is fair and balanced?" Colom asked.

Persecutors later proved that Arrington did try to interview blacks. They also pointed out that he has testified for blacks in several other trials and donated money to Democrat John Kerry's presidential campaign.

The trial resumes Friday and is expected to last another two weeks.

Brown is a former tax preparer who served 21 months in prison in the 1990s on a felony conviction of preparing fraudulent federal income-tax returns. He also was indicted in 1979 for absentee ballot fraud.

Whites once controlled politics in Noxubee County, but now there are only two white countywide office holders because Brown manipulates election, the U.S. Justice Department says.

He faces no jail time or fines, but would be forced to cease fraudulent activities if convicted, prosecutors said.

Witness: Dems Discriminated, Didn't Break Law (JCL)

Ike Brown mobilizing black voters in Noxubee County isn't illegal. It's admirable, a government expert testified Thursday on cross-examination.

But University of North Carolina Political Science chairman Theodore Arrington reiterated earlier testimony that he believes evidence shows Brown and his associates have engaged in a pattern of racial activities that discriminate against white voters in the majority-black county.

In the first lawsuit of its kind in the United States, the Department of Justice is accusing black political leaders in Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters.

Arrington testified Wednesday for the Justice Department in federal court in Jackson that Brown, chairman of the Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee, uses race to get his way and bully people who don't agree with the candidates he supports.

Also, Arrington said Brown and his associates had formed racial intent and discriminated against white voters in their actions.

But Thursday, Arrington said he couldn't identify any black person given preferential treatment over a white person at a Noxubee County polling place.

Wil Colom, attorney for the Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee and for Brown, its chairman, grilled Arrington for about five hours. "All I see is conclusion by you but no facts," he told Arrington.

Arrington had suggested a high number of absentee ballots cast in a 2003 race in the county may indicate fraudulent ballots.

"Do you have one single ballot where Ike Brown notarized?" Colom asked Arrington.

"No," Arrington replied.

He said he interviewed a group of white women who wanted to assist in the Democratic primary but were not allowed. Colom inferred it may have been because of their ages - all in their 70s - and not their race.

Arrington said Brown "chased" a candidate from a precinct and allowed others to stay, but when Colom asked to identify others allowed to stay, Arrington couldn't.

Colom also showed Arrington did not interview Democratic poll workers. He also said that in one of Arrington's studies he interviewed 21 people, but only five were black.

"And you think that your report is fair and balanced?" Colom asked.

Prosecutors later showed Arrington tried to interview black poll workers and pointed out he has testified for black plaintiffs in several other trials and donated money to Democrat John Kerry's presidential campaign.

Complaints from white candidates and voters prompted a federal investigation, leading to the civil action.

The lawsuit, filed in February 2005, seeks preliminary and permanent injunctions to stop the defendants from coercing, threatening or intimidating anyone voting or attempting to vote. The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Bush Open To Idea Of Pardon For Former Border Patrol Agents (AP)

By Suzanne Gamboa, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush on Thursday left open the possibility of a pardon for two Border Patrol agents serving federal prison sentences for shooting a Mexican drug dealer as he fled and covering up the crime.

Bush said "there's a process for pardons" and the case has to work its way through the system. In an interview with KFOX-TV in El Paso, Bush said the White House will review the case, and he urged people to "take a sober look at the case."

"People need to take a tough look at the facts, the evidence a jury looked at, as well as the judge. And I will do the same thing," he said.

Several lawmakers have urged the president to pardon former Border Patrol agents Jose Alonso Compean and Ignacio Ramos for the shooting of Osvaldo Aldrete Davila, who retreated to Mexico after he was shot and later admitted he was transporting marijuana while in the country illegally.

The agents began serving their sentences Wednesday — 11 years and one day for Ramos and 12 years for Compean. Both were fired after their convictions on several charges, including assault with a deadly weapon, obstruction of justice, and a civil rights violation.

Rancor over the convictions and sentencing of the agents has been simmering for months, and the two have become a cause celebre among conservatives and on talk shows. Their supporters have said they were defending themselves and have called them heroes. The agents' prosecution occurred as the issue of illegal immigration was being debated in Congress and amid campaigns for last November's midterm elections.

Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., introduced a bill Thursday calling for a congressional pardon of the agents. Congress has never issued pardons to anyone convicted of a crime, said Joe Kasper, Hunter's spokesman. But Kasper said Hunter believes there's enough ambiguity in the law on pardons to give it a try.

"Agents Compean and Ramos fulfilled their responsibilities as Border Patrol agents and rightfully pursued a suspected and fleeing drug smuggler. It is irresponsible to punish them with jail time," he said in a news release.

U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton took the unusual step of issuing a five-page document of the "myth vs. reality" of the case as the agents began serving their sentences.

The document covered everything from the claims that the former agents were just doing their jobs to reports that the shooting was at night when it actually happened about 1 p.m. on Feb. 17, 2005.

White House spokesman Tony Snow also seemed to support the agents' conviction, listing details of the case in a briefing with reporters Thursday. He said an officer hit Aldrete in the chest with a gun after he got out of his car and that "a lot of the allegations about a scuffle and discovering drugs at the scene and all that, they're simply not supported by the fact record of the case."

Texas Sen. John Cornyn said the Justice Department should have the chance to explain why the agents were prosecuted. Cornyn sent a letter to Vermont Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, asking for a hearing.

"I understand that the Justice Department believes all the facts have not come out on this prosecution and would welcome the opportunity to explain its decisions. I believe such a public explanation and opportunity for questioning is necessary," Cornyn wrote.

Cornyn said he and Sen. Arlen Specter, who chaired the committee last year, investigated the case and that his office personally interviewed Sutton.

Justice Inquiry Demanded On Duke Rape Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

Did a North Carolina prosecutor, members of his staff, Durham police and a DNA testing laboratory conspire to violate the civil rights of three Duke University lacrosse players in bringing high-profile rape charges against them?

That is what Rep. Peter T. King, New York Republican and former chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, wants to know, calling on Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales this week to assign Justice Department attorneys and the FBI to find out.

"I have been following with great interest and deepening concern the prosecution by Durham County District Attorney Michael B. Nifong," Mr. King said in a terse letter to Mr. Gonzales. "I have done so not only because members of Collin Finerty's family are my constituents but because I have been accorded the privilege of representing all the citizens in this country and their interest in guaranteeing not only the appearance of justice but its actual implementation."

Mr. King said a review he conducted of documents and summaries of Mr. Nifong's investigation, along with discussions with other members of Congress, led to his call for the Justice Department probe.

"I am deeply disappointed by your apparent decision to defer a decision whether to investigate Mr. Nifong's prosecution of this case," Mr. King said, referring to rejections last week of probe requests by Reps. Walter B. Jones, North Carolina Republican, and Carolyn McCarthy, New York Democrat.

"I urge you to reconsider your decision."

DOJ_NMG_0118661

Mr. King said the Justice Department probe should target Mr. Nifong and members of his staff, including investigator Lindell Wilson; the Durham Police Department, including Officers Mark Gottlieb and Benjamin Himan; and DNA Security Inc., including its director, Brian Meehan.

He said the investigation should determine whether "these and other individuals conspired to violate and violated the constitutionally guaranteed civil rights of Collin and his two former teammates." In addition to Mr. Finnerty, 20, of Garden City, N.Y., Reade W. Seligmann, of Essex Fells, N.J.; and David F. Evans, 23, of Annapolis, are charged.

Mr. Nifong was not available for comment. Durham Police Department spokesman Cpl. David Addison referred inquiries yesterday to the district attorney's office. Justice Department officials have said it would be premature to initiate an investigation while criminal charges are pending.

The prosecutor has come under intense public scrutiny over his handling of the case. He was named Dec. 28 by the North Carolina State Bar in an ethics complaint, accused of "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation" in his public comments about the case. The complaint said Mr. Nifong "knew or reasonably should have known" the statements "would have a substantial likelihood of materially prejudicing" the case.

Last week, Mr. Nifong asked to be removed from the case and North Carolina State Attorney General Roy A. Cooper has since taken it over. His review has begun, but it was not clear whether he would be ready for a pending Feb. 5 hearing.

"We accept the case with our eyes wide open to the evidence, but with blinders on for all other distractions," Mr. Cooper said.

Mr. Nifong handed over the case after two major revelations:

•A Dec. 21 interview of the 28-year-old black woman who accused the three white players of raping her after she had been hired as a stripper to perform at their dorm house, during which she said she was not certain Mr. Seligmann had taken part in the assault and was not sure whether she had been penetrated during the attack, a necessary element of the crime of rape under North Carolina law.

•A Dec. 15 hearing at which Mr. Meehan said he shared tests results with Mr. Nifong but a summary report given to the defense did not contain the information that semen found inside the accuser did not match any of the Duke players. He said the decision not to give the defense the material was "an intentional limitation" at which he and Mr. Nifong arrived.

Sen. Ben Cardin Wants The Investigation To Look Into Election Fraud Around The Country. (DCEX)

By Daniel Fowler, The Examiner

DC Examiner, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON - U.S. Sen. Ben Cardin is calling on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to investigate instances of voter intimidation and election fraud the senator says occurred in Maryland before the November election.

Cardin, D-Md., made the request Thursday during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing.

The accusations involve former Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich and then Lt. Gov. Michael Steele. Ehrlich was seeking re-election, while Steele was competing with Cardin for an open Senate seat. Both candidates lost.

Democrats blasted Ehrlich and Steele on Election Day after their campaigns sent out a last-minute voter guide titled “Ehrlich-Steele Democrats” that targeted black voters.

Called an “Official Voter Guide” for “Ehrlich-Steele Democrats,” the Ehrlich and Steele campaigns mailed a “Democratic Sample Ballot” to residents, encouraging them to vote for Ehrlich, Steele and a variety of Democrats, including state attorney general candidate Douglas Gansler and comptroller candidate Peter Franchot.

Cardin told The Examiner Thursday said he wants Gonzales to look at the situation in Maryland and around the country.

“I would like to see election officials know and candidates know that there is a price to pay if they do not conduct their responsibilities as election officials properly, and as candidates there is a limit to what you can do,” Cardin said.

The Ehrlich and Steele campaigns also distributed the sample ballots in Prince George's on Election Day.

The literature also was mailed and distributed in black communities in Baltimore City and Baltimore County, Cardin said.

In November, Ehrlich spokeswoman Shareese DeLeaver said the sample ballot was not meant to be misleading.

Research Sparks Federal Scrutiny Of Elections (YAKHR)

By Pat Muir, YAKIMA HERALD-REPUBLIC

Yakima (WA) Herald-Republic, January 19, 2007

SUNNYSIDE -- The U.S. Justice Department is looking into the way this city elects its leaders after a recent Whitman College report said the city's system violates the Voting Rights Act and keeps Hispanics from being elected.

Four people -- including a former city councilwoman and a community activist -- say they've been in contact with a Washington D.C. attorney from the department's civil rights division about the study.

In December, Whitman College released a report by Ian Warner, an undergraduate, showing that Sunnyside's at-large council elections create barriers to more equitable representation, a violation of the federal Voting Rights Act. Under the 1964 Act, a violation can be proven if there is a discrepancy in representation and there is racially polarized voting -- if people of one race vote predominantly for candidates of the same race.

Warner says he proved this by comparing thousands of voting records against a Hispanic surname list that showed Hispanic candidates got more votes in precincts with high Hispanic populations.

Warner and the professor who oversaw the research both say the Justice Department attorney, Sean O'Donnell, contacted them after an article about the study was published in the Yakima Herald-Republic.

"He's obviously taking it seriously and thinks there are some legal implications," said Paul Apostolidis, chairman of Whitman's politics department and the professor for whom Warner wrote the report.

Former Sunnyside Councilwoman Bengie Aguilar and local Hispanic activist Hector Franco say they too have talked about Warner's study with O'Donnell. The attorney was in Yakima County last month to talk with them about bilingual voting materials when the article was published. O'Donnell took an interest in the story, Aguilar and Franco said.

O'Donnell declined to comment for this story. A spokeswoman for the Justice Department said it's the agency's policy not to comment on such matters.

Like several Yakima County cities, Sunnyside has a much higher percentage of Hispanics in the general population than it does on the City Council.

According to 2000 Census data, 73.1 percent of Sunnyside is Hispanic, compared with one of seven City Council members, or 14.3 percent.

Cities such as Watsonville and Salinas in California have revised their elections from at-large to district voting because of legal challenges under the Voting Rights Act based on similar circumstances.

Joaquin Avila, former president and general counsel of the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund (MALDEF) and the attorney who filed the lawsuit against the city of Watsonville, served as a mentor for Warner in his Sunnyside research.

Aguilar and Franco said O'Donnell told them he would need help getting statistics furthering research in the Whitman College report. According to O'Donnell, they said, the Justice Department will provide support in a legal effort to change Sunnyside's election system, but only if the local community does the initial legwork. For one thing, the Justice Department would need information about how the city could geographically define voting districts that would be primarily Hispanic.

The Chicano-Latino Coalition, an informal group of leaders from Yakima Valley groups, plans to start that effort by the end of January, Franco said. He sought to publicize the study's findings to the Spanish-speaking community by bringing Warner onto his show as a guest on Radio KDNA earlier this month.

The coalition plans to circulate petitions urging cities in which Hispanics are underrepresented to voluntarily change to district voting. It also plans to extend Warner's research by identifying areas from which largely Hispanic districts might be drawn in cities.

DOJ_NMG_0118663

"It really rests on us to provide the research and the statistics they (the Justice Department) need. É Why Ian's work is so important is it brought up the discussion," Franco said.

The city of Sunnyside made Warner's report available to council members at the request of Paul Garcia, the only Hispanic on the City Council.

Sunnyside City Manager Bob Stockwell, who has criticized Warner's methodology as "flawed" and his conclusions as "bogus," said he has not heard from the Justice Department.

"The only discussions we've had (on the study) is the result of reporters calling and asking us questions," he said.

While he does not agree with Warner that a change in voting systems is needed, Garcia said he believes the issue of Hispanic underrepresentation needs to be discussed.

"The issue is certainly a true one, the question of why don't we have more Hispanic representation on councils É But to draw the conclusion it's just because of the way we're structuring our voting, I just can't come to that same conclusion," Garcia said.

Stockwell echoed that sentiment: "The issue of whether or not Hispanics are participating in the local election process has nothing to do with whether they are in a district or whether the council is elected at large."

He says many residents are struggling economically and are not yet involved in local government, but he expects Hispanic voter participation to improve when their children reach voting age.

Warner, who is planning to write his senior thesis about elections in Yakima County, believes it's up to government to ensure there are no barriers to participation. And he sees the interest from the Justice Department as validation.

"That's exactly what I was looking for," he said. "When you start writing something like that, you hope it somehow has an impact."

Fed Retirements Make Rates Harder To Predict (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

Regional bank turnover clouds forecasting of Fed stance.

Minehan's retirement from the Boston Fed and the expected retirement of Chicago's Moskow mean nine of 12 banks will have changed presidents since 2003. Changes make it harder to predict rates and Fed rhetoric.

Local bank boards, search firms and Washington governors juggle differing priorities for management, economics and regional experience. A noneconomist may fill Atlanta presidency, vacant more than three months. Boston and Chicago's proximity to top universities favors academic economists or internal candidates.

Another opening: Fed's top monetary policy staff job in Washington, as veteran Vincent Reinhart retires in September.

Democrats jump-start administration proposals to shrink tax gap.

To finance small-business tax breaks in a minimum wage bill, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Baucus embraces two Bush ideas that languished under Republican control. One would make it easier for the Internal Revenue Service to collect from employers who don't make payroll tax payments; another intensifies scrutiny of firms that "lease" employees to others.

Front-runners face unexpected early 2008 headwinds.

One Republican veteran warns "no one's in charge" of McCain's campaign, as strategist John Weaver, 2000 manager Rick Davis, Senate chief of staff Mark Salter, and ex-Bush hand Terry Nelson all play major roles. All have "unique assignments," a McCain adviser responds, noting that Nelson has "hiring and firing authority."

War woes jeopardize the Arizona senator's appeal to wary conservatives: as Republican best-positioned to beat Hillary Clinton. An unaffiliated Democratic strategist notes Obama's entry has dented Clinton's aura of inevitability, too.

"If she runs," adviser Howard Wolfson says, "we know she will have to earn it and she will."

LOWERING EXPECTATIONS? As the Roe v. Wade decision reaches 34-year anniversary, abortion-rights activists press the Democratic Congress for enhanced access to emergency contraception for rape and incest victims, and parity in health-plan contraception coverage. Nancy Keenan, chief of NARAL Pro-Choice America, cautions, "One election can't change everything," as clear opponents of abortion rights still outnumber advocates by 219 to 165 in the House and 48 to 35 in Senate; other lawmakers have mixed positions.

Some lobbyists expect administration to seek up to $90 billion over five years from hospitals and other health providers as White House pursues balanced budget by 2012. BREACH OF CONTRACT? Business complains provision signed by Bush for 3% "withholding tax" on payments to federal contractors represents interest-free loan to the government. Some in Congress move to accelerate 2011 effective date. "In an environment where they are looking for revenue, it will be difficult" to stop, says Dorothy Coleman of National Association of Manufacturers.

Robert E. Lee, Version 200 (WP)

By Brigid Schulte

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Today, the United Daughters of the Confederacy plan to fly a Confederate flag on Washington Street in Alexandria, on the statue of a rebel soldier who faces South. The Virginia Sons of Confederate Veterans will gather for dinner in Richmond to honor the man they hail as "one of the greatest Americans."

It's the 200th birthday of Robert E. Lee, the Confederate general who is revered by some and reviled by others. Commemorations and protests are planned across Virginia and other Southern states, proving that more than 140 years after the end of the Civil War, Lee is still a pivotal, controversial and complicated figure in American history and continuing race and culture wars.

In Virginia, where Lee was born, fought in the Civil War and died -- no matter whether he's viewed as a hero who fought brilliantly and valiantly for state's rights or as a traitor bent on protecting his state's right to own slaves -- his legacy looms large. Lee highways crisscross the state, including in the Washington region, Lee bridges cross rivers, high schools are named for him and the phone book lists hundreds of Robert E. Lees.

But beyond the heat and noise created by Lee's 21st-century defenders and detractors, there is a new move to reevaluate Lee and his legacy.

The premise of the new look is perhaps as controversial as Lee's image: As the South has become more racially and ethnically diverse and has prospered economically, perhaps the South doesn't need Lee so much anymore. Or at least not in the same way. Perhaps it is time to let him pass from marble icon and touchstone of white Southern identity into the annals of history as a charismatic and important human figure.

"Now there are all sorts of other ways in which Southerners identify themselves -- Salvadorans, Mexicans, Asians -- [and] the politics and economics of the region are no longer based on white supremacy," said W. Fitzhugh Brundage, a historian at the University of North Carolina and a member of the Society of the Lees of Virginia. "It makes all the sense in the world that for more and more Southerners, Robert E. Lee is just a footnote."

At Arlington House at Arlington National Cemetery -- the old Lee mansion and plantation where Union officers began burying the Civil War dead -- Lee's bicentennial was commemorated with a symposium, "Does Lee Matter?"

And at Washington and Lee University, where Lee became president after the Civil War, the bicentennial is being marked with "Re-visioning Lee," an art exhibit exploring how Lee's image has been exploited for various causes. A big draw was the discussion "What Lee Means Today," led by two history professors, one white and one African American.

Not too far from Lee Chapel, where Lee is buried and which boasts a marble statue of him reclining with his hand on his sword, ready for battle, Theodore Carter DeLaney, the black professor, passed out a 1928 essay on Lee by African American writer W.E.B. DuBois. "It is ridiculous to seek to excuse Robert Lee" because he "led a bloody war to perpetuate human slavery," DuBois wrote.

"At Washington and Lee, all things are on the table for debate and discussion, including Robert E. Lee," Delaney said. "Nothing's too sacred. And that's an important change."

The white professor, J. Holt Merchant, remembers growing up in Virginia when few people questioned Lee's heroic stature as the "Last Gentle Knight."

"But the days when William Faulkner could say that any Southern boy, any time he wanted to, could conjure up images of Pickett's Charge at Gettysburg and relive it for himself, are gone. Life's not like that anymore, and it's probably just as well," Merchant said. "Changes in demography, geography, wealth and sophistication have led us to pay attention to other things. As life has gotten better for Southerners, they've been able to look to the present and the future and not hang on to the past quite so passionately."

Robert E. Lee was born Jan. 19, 1807, at Stratford Plantation on the Northern Neck of Virginia and was the fifth child of Revolutionary War hero Henry "Light Horse Harry" Lee. He attended West Point and never received a demerit. By all accounts enormously handsome, tall, charismatic and humble, he had a long and illustrious career in the U.S. Army. In 1861, as Southern states contemplated secession, Lee privately ridiculed the idea. Still, when he was offered command of the Union Army, he turned it down once Virginia -- his "country" -- seceded.

During the Civil War, Lee's troops were often vastly outnumbered but managed to win or fight to a stalemate for years. Once the war ended, Lee resisted calls to continue the fight in the hills as a guerrilla and instead encouraged his soldiers to go home and begin rebuilding the nation. He retired to what was then Washington College, where he set about innovating the offerings, including the first classes in the country in business and journalism.

In other countries, leaders of failed civil rebellions are often reviled. But a strange thing happened to Lee after he died. He became beloved by many. Over the years, he has been praised by the likes of Theodore Roosevelt, Winston Churchill, Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Dwight D. Eisenhower, who had a picture of Lee hanging in his office.

Northerners, seizing on Lee's early ambivalence about the war, his gentlemanly sense of honor and duty, and his distaste of slavery -- he once wrote that it was a "moral and political evil" -- embraced the Confederate general as a way to foster reconciliation, said John Coski, a historian at the Museum of the Confederacy in Richmond. In 1901, he was one of only 29 Americans inducted into New York University's Hall of Fame. Julia Ward Howe, who wrote the lyrics for the Battle Hymn of the Republic, composed a poem in Lee's honor.

At the same time, his former generals wrote of him as so perfect and his cause so noble that Lee became fixed as the tragic hero of a romantic "Lost Cause" and that cause became synonymous with white Southern identity.

"There's an old saw in the South of a little girl asking, 'Mommy, is Robert E. Lee from the Old Testament or the New?' " Coski said. "Lee has been so praised and distorted that they made him more than human, and in so doing, made him less than human. He's a complex figure. If we want to understand history in its complexity, we have to understand Robert E. Lee."

The loud and public culture war continues. A Richmond-area Boy Scout troop created a furor over "craven surrendering to political correctness" when it decided recently to strip Lee from its name and logo. The NAACP has protested the use of almost $500,000 in state funds to refurbish the towering Lee statue on Richmond's Monument Avenue. And when the Virginia General Assembly created a special commission last year to plan a year of events to commemorate the Lee bicentennial, the panel wanted Lee license plates and more lessons about Lee in the public schools. Instead, after intensely emotional debate -- one African American delegate said Lee's likeness reduced him to tears -- all that was given was a $5,000 grant to publish a tourist brochure on Lee-related events in the state.

But take a walk inside Arlington's Washington-Lee High School for a look at the New South. Inside the front door, a "diversity quilt" is displayed with symbols of the countries and cultures represented at the school. A map of the world and a photo mosaic of students show them in all colors and hues. The assistant principals are Latino and black. Students pass by the portrait of Lee in the library shrugging. "No one really notices him," 16-year-old Andrew Gilbert said.

FBI Raids Offices Of 2 Area Citrus Companies (TCPALM)

By Jim Turner

Treasure Coast (FL) Palm, January 19, 2007

FORT PIERCE — FBI agents served warrants and inspected computer records at citrus businesses on the Treasure Coast at the request of the antitrust division of the U.S. Department of Justice.

DNE World Fruit Sales in Fort Pierce and Seald Sweet International in Vero Beach are alleged to have colluded to set prices, according to Richard Carnell, general counsel for fruit importer DNE.

Advertisement

Carnell dismissed the allegations. They "ultimately will be seen to be meritless and have no substance to it," he said.

Federal officials weren't talking about the charges.

Justice spokeswoman Gina Talamona said Thursday evening that she could not confirm the nature of the warrants, and agents for the FBI in Miami and Atlanta deferred comment to the department.

Carnell said he knew little of the claims, but that it appears the investigation is the result of a disgruntled competitor in the citrus industry.

"Frankly, it's a pretty litigious society and people try to air their grievances by filing claims," he said. "The investigators came in this morning and are looking at records, primarily involving the import programs from South Africa and Australia."

With offices in Visalia, Calif., and North Brunswick, N.J., DNE has loading and shipping locations in Arizona, California, Florida, New Jersey and Texas.

Coralee Penabad, general counsel for another fruit importer, Seald Sweet International in Vero Beach, said his company had also been contacted by federal authorities.

"Seald Sweet has received a request for information regarding an investigation by the Department of Justice," she said. "Sealed Sweet is cooperating regarding the investigation and request."

Staff writers Will Greenlee and Nadia Gergis, along with Bryan Garner of WPTV NewsChannel 5, contributed to this report.

Microsoft Wants To Question Class-action Plaintiffs (DMR)

Des Moines Register, January 19, 2007

The focus of the Microsoft trial in Polk County District Court shifted Thursday to the named plaintiffs and their relationship to Des Moines lawyer Roxanne Conlin, who is one of the attorneys representing the four individually named plaintiffs, as well as all other Iowans who purchased certain Microsoft products between 1994 and 2006.

With no jury present, lawyers for Microsoft renewed an earlier request that they be allowed to ask the individual plaintiffs about their connections with Conlin. The earlier request was turned down last year by Judge Scott Rosenberg, who indicated he might rule on the new request as early as Friday.

Conlin was visibly angered by the request and acknowledged that some of the four named plaintiffs were friends of hers before the case began. She said the request was unfair and a “propaganda move” by Microsoft.

“Microsoft is trying to show that the people with the most to gain are the lawyers, and that is not proper in this law suit or any law suit,” Conlin said.

Conlin and Minneapolis attorney Richard Hagstrom are co-lead counsels in the class-action, antitrust suit which is seeking as much as $330 million in damages from Microsoft for Iowa consumers.

In a similar case in Minnesota in 2004, in which Conlin and Hagstrom were the lead counsels, Microsoft settled the case, after a jury trial had begun, for about $175 million, which was less than half what the plaintiffs were seeking in that case.

In the Minnesota case, plaintiffs lawyers fees totaling nearly $60 million were paid by Microsoft, according to news reports. There will be no determination of lawyers fees in the Polk County case, until the case is completed.

Microsoft lawyer David Tulchin told Judge Rosenberg that Conlin and Hagstrom had opened the door for questions about the named plaintiffs personal relationships with Conlin during jury selection and opening statements.

Conlin and Hagstrom had portrayed their clients as "just regular people."

"It was an attempt to plant the idea that these people were doing a public service," Tulchin said, indicating that he suspected all four had been recruited by Conlin and Hagstrom.

One of the plaintiffs, Patricia Anne Larsen supported Conlin when she ran for governor in 1982 and was later represented by Conlin in a discrimination lawsuit against her employer, Eaton Corp., Tulchin said.

A second plaintiff, Joe Comes, "has been best friends since high school with Ms. Conlin's son," Tulchin said.

In an unrelated move, Conlin and Hagstrom told Judge Rosenberg on Wednesday that they had discovered evidence that Microsoft is in violation of a 2002 federal court consent degree.

The judge gave the lawyers permission to notify the justice department and Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller of the violation, but said they could not publicly disclose the information.

Microsoft did not oppose the effort to notify the government agencies. The company's associate general counsel, Rich Wallis, said Microsoft is monitored by independent experts to insure compliance with the consent degree. He said he doubts that Conlin and Hagstrom have information that would surprise the government or the independent monitors.

Delta Pilots Seek Seat At D.C. Merger Hearing ALPA Fighting To Block US Airways Deal Through Political Pressure (AJC)

By Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 19, 2007

Delta Air Lines' pilots union is angling to put its objections to US Airways' hostile takeover bid in the national spotlight next week at a Senate hearing on airline mergers.

Lee Moak, chairman of the Delta unit of the Air Line Pilots Association, said Thursday that the union has asked to testify on the at the Senate commerce committee hearing scheduled for Wednesday.

We're not leaving this to chance. ...We will not stop until this [deal] is dead.'

The union, which opposes US Airways' $10 billion-plus bid for Delta, last week announced that it temporarily moved its officers to Washington D.C. and budgeted $15 million for its lobbying, legal and public relations fight against the deal.

"We're going senator to senator explaining that this is the wrong merger at the wrong time," said Moak.

Delta's unsecured creditors committee, which will have a large say in whether Delta is acquired or emerges from bankruptcy this spring as an independent carrier, has remained mum since US Airways boosted its bid last week by 20 percent. The pilots union is a major creditor on the committee.

"I'm confident that reasonable minds will prevail related to the creditors committee and US Airways," said Moak. Still, he added that the union also planned Thursday to picket the New York offices of an investment banking firm that is working with a group of hedge funds and other Delta creditors that wants Delta to seriously consider US Airways' proposal.

"It's not about billions of dollars to us. It's about having a viable airline," said Moak. "For a bondholder, he's just wanting to monetize his claims."

While creditors mostly weigh the financial aspects of a buyout, they must also consider the chances that a Delta-US Airways merger would be approved by the U.S. Justice Department, and political sentiment could play a role in that calculation.

GE's Deal With Abbott Labs Displays Immelt's New Strategy (WSJ)

By Kathryn Kranhold And Avery Johnson

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

General Electric Co.'s $8.13 billion deal with Abbott Laboratories is the latest step in GE Chairman Jeffrey Immelt's strategy to redouble investment in the conglomerate's market-leading businesses, from aviation to health care.

The companies confirmed that GE had agreed to acquire Abbott's laboratory-testing unit and a smaller blood-analysis division. The deal, which needs regulatory approval, is expected to close in the first half of the year.

GE 'In Vitro'

The acquisition would mark GE's entry into what is known as "in vitro" diagnostics, or laboratory testing, while Abbott sheds a unit growing more slowly than other parts of its business.

"In vitro" diagnostics generally test blood or urine for diseases from cancer to HIV. Germany's Siemens AG, a GE rival in medical equipment, entered the market last year by paying $5.3 billion for Bayer AG's diagnostic unit.

The Abbott unit had sales of roughly $2.5 billion last year. GE would also acquire Abbott's smaller point-of-care diagnostic group, which makes testing tools used at the bedside in hospitals, among other diagnostic tools.

Deals Science

The proposed deal is comparable to one of Mr. Immelt's boldest moves since taking over in 2001 -- the $9 billion-plus acquisition of Britain's Amersham PLC, which took GE into bioscience and molecular diagnostics. Most of GE's $17 billion in annual health-care sales stems from diagnostic equipment such as sophisticated X-ray machines, ultrasounds and MRI.

Mr. Immelt said the Abbott deal would give GE a "pretty complete" health-care business, which also includes information-technology systems.

Mr. Immelt, who once ran GE's health-care unit, said he had been looking at entering the market for some time; he started talking to Abbott Chairman and Chief Executive Miles White about six to eight months ago.

The health-care deal is also another sign that Mr. Immelt is looking to increase business where the conglomerate already has a strong presence. "As we allocate capital, we wanted to allocate capital back into big markets where we thought we had a very strong competitive advantage," he said in an interview.

On Monday, GE agreed to buy Smiths Group PLC's aerospace unit for $4.8 billion, aiming to expand its aviation business beyond engines and into electronic instrumentation.

Last week, GE, of Fairfield, Conn., announced a deal to acquire oil-and-gas-equipment maker Vetco Gray for $1.9 billion, bulking up a GE unit that has grown in recent years with higher oil prices.

Abbott's decision to sell the slower-growth portions of its diagnostics business fits squarely into Mr. White's strategy to move the company into higher-return businesses. Abbott, of Abbott Park, Ill., will keep its faster-growing but smaller diagnostics businesses for glucose monitoring and molecular diagnostics.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Firms Press Washington On Climate (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

WASHINGTON -- A new coalition of environmental groups and major corporations such as Alcoa Inc., General Electric Co., DuPont Co. and Duke Energy Corp. will boost pressure on Congress and President Bush next week to address climate change more rapidly.

The informal coalition plans a news conference Monday to publicize its recommendations, ahead of Tuesday's State of the Union address, according to a person familiar with the situation. It will suggest that Congress and the administration move quickly to address global warming through steps such as capping greenhouse-gas emissions and discouraging construction of conventional coal-burning power plants, which are a big source of carbon-dioxide emissions.

While the U.S. rejected the Kyoto accord that created greenhouse-gas caps and an emissions-credit trading system for developed countries in Europe and elsewhere, some U.S. executives believe such regulation is inevitable here. They want more certainty about the future, as they plan for capital investments.

Many of the big-name corporations involved in the effort already have emerged as advocates of addressing climate change more rapidly.

A spokesman for Duke Energy confirmed Duke is part of the effort and said its report would be released this month. Spokesmen for members of the group generally either declined to comment or couldn't be reached.

The group's formation shows the unity that is emerging on climate change between some of the country's biggest manufacturers and its most influential environmental groups, such as the Natural Resources Defense Council.

In his State of the Union address, President Bush is expected to highlight climate change but stop short of embracing an economywide cap-and-trade system, White House officials say. Instead, he will point to the greenhouse-gas benefits of using renewable fuels.

Administration officials have been mulling sector-by-sector measures to address climate-change concerns, particularly for the auto industry. The administration is likely to renew its push for more control over automobile fuel efficiency and could suggest higher fuel-efficiency goals, and possibly even a new system aimed at maximizing the industry's improvement.

Newly empowered Democrats in Congress are showing signs of moving more rapidly than the administration. Yesterday, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi announced creation of a select committee on climate change. The move was quickly denounced by Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell of Michigan, a close ally of the Detroit auto makers and a fellow Democrat. Ms. Pelosi is expected to release more details today. The chairman of the new committee is likely to be Rep. Ed Markey of Massachusetts, a longtime environmental advocate.

A Coalition For Firm Limit On Emissions (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — Ten major companies with operations across the economy — utilities, manufacturing, petroleum, chemicals and financial services — have banded together with leading environmental groups to call for a firm nationwide limit on carbon dioxide emissions that would lead to reductions of 10 to 30 percent over the next 15 years.

Introduction of this group, which includes industry giants like General Electric, DuPont and Alcoa, is aimed at adding to the recent impetus for Congressional action on emissions controls and the creation of a market in which allowances to emit carbon dioxide could be traded in a way that achieves the greatest reduction at the lowest cost.

The diversity of the coalition — some members had already come out for other forms of emissions control, like a carbon tax or voluntary controls, but others had been silent on climate-change issues until now — could send a strong signal that businesses want to get ahead of the increasing political momentum for federal emissions controls, in part to ensure that their long-term interests are protected.

Many energy producers and manufacturers have expressed concern that various state efforts, if not coordinated, could lead to a scattershot system of regulation. Others worry that harsher measures, like a stiff tax on fossil fuels, the biggest contributor to global-warming gases, could be imposed if they do not reach a consensus on a legislative approach.

The group’s formal announcement is scheduled for Monday, the day before President Bush is to deliver his State of the Union address and offer the administration’s newest basket of proposals to promote energy security and combat global warming.

Aside from General Electric and Alcoa, Caterpillar is the leading manufacturing company among the group, which also includes four utilities — Duke Energy, based in North Carolina; PG&E of California; the FPL Group of Florida; and PNM Resources of New Mexico. The group counts the multinational oil company BP and Lehman Brothers as members as well.

Jonathan Lash, the president of the World Resources Institute, said Thursday that "this signals that the differences in the interests between these sectors and within these sectors can be resolved."

Peter A. Darbee, chief executive of PG&E, said, "My hope and expectation is that Congress, the White House and the public will look at these chief executives" and note that companies with a motive to oppose emissions controls are nonetheless saying, "Here's a serious problem; it needs to be dealt with, and it needs to be dealt with now."

The negotiations, conducted primarily by the chief executives of the companies, did not produce a model piece of legislation, but rather a detailed set of principles that they suggest as a guide to any legislation. In the Senate, there are already four Democratic proposals for limiting carbon emissions and creating a market-based system, under which the government gives or sells permits to businesses, allowing them a certain level of emissions.

Once established, such a system would allow better-performing companies to sell or trade unneeded credits, and all companies involved would be able to determine whether it would be more efficient for them to clean up their own emissions or buy credits from others.

The group's principles include recommending a range of emissions levels — from 100 to 105 percent of current levels within five years, then down to 90 to 100 percent of current levels in 10 years, and 70 to 90 percent of current levels in 15 years. In addition, the chief executives agreed after some discussion, to "strongly discourage further construction of stationary sources that cannot easily capture" carbon dioxide.

This comes close to a rejection of almost all new coal-fired power plants on the drawing boards, including the 11 plants recently proposed by TXU, a Texas utility. The technology that would isolate carbon dioxide emissions and bury them is still in the earliest phases of development, so this near-repudiation of existing coal technology would have a disproportionate impact on utilities that depend largely on coal, like TXU and the Southern Company.

But Jeff Sterba, the chief executive of PNM Resources, whose company gets about two-thirds of its power from coal and is a member of the coalition, explained why he supports such an approach. "The most important thing for us is to have a viable, diverse portfolio of resources, and coal has got to be part of that mix," he said. "Today, the biggest problem coal has is uncertainty about carbon."

The group, called the United States Climate Action Partnership, had its origin in conversations last spring among Mr. Lash; Fred Krupp, the president of Environmental Defense; and Jeffrey R. Immelt, the chief executive of General Electric. Mr. Lash had worked with Mr. Immelt on the rollout of GE's Ecomagination program in 2005 — which combined pledges of emissions reductions with a new emphasis on energy-efficient and climate-friendly technologies.

Mr. Sterba and the leaders of the other environmental groups, which also includes Frances Beinecke of the Natural Resources Defense Council and Eileen Claussen of the Pew Center on Global Climate Change, said that an efficient, flexible cap-and-trade system would stimulate the development of new technologies to cut energy use and provide renewable energy.

General Electric claims significant advances in these areas already. According to Peter O'Toole, a company spokesman, "Revenues from the sale of energy-efficient and environmentally advanced products and services hit $10 billion in 2005," up from $6.2 billion in 2004.

The chief executives in the group met for the first time in July. During the meeting, Mr. Krupp said, "it became clear that cap-and-trade is an element of the deal that is good for everybody."

"It's good for the environmental community," he said, "because a hard cap guarantees the integrity of the environment" and "industry likes it because it's so efficient."

Timing also played a role in the executives' thinking. As Mr. Darbee said, "We have the opportunity to construct something more pragmatic and realistic while President Bush is in office." A future political climate, after 2008, he said, might produce "solutions less sensitive to the needs of business."

Pelosi Puts Climate Change On The Agenda (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0118671

By Caroline Daniel

Nancy Pelosi, the House speaker, on Thursday vowed to make energy independence and climate change legislation the next focus of Democrats' congressional agenda, as the clock stopped on the first 100 legislative hours of the new Congress.

Flanked by giant posters detailing the legislation passed during the first 100 hours of the Democratic - controlled Congress, including minimum wage legislation, Ms Pelosi said she would create a new select committee to focus attention on energy independence and global warming. "I want a package of legislation through the committees by July 4 towards fully declaring our energy independence."

In the clearest sign the White House is responding to international and domestic pressure to act on climate change, Tony Snow, White House spokesman, on Thursday said that in the president's State of the Union on Tuesday Mr Bush would seek to "balance the needs of security and, at the same time, also the environment. And you can expect him to make that linkage in the speech."

Making a more explicit link between energy security and the environment would be a significant step for the administration, which has been criticised for its doubts about climate change science and has shunned imposing mandatory caps on carbon emissions. It accepts there is some human component to climate change.

Ms Pelosi's comments came as the House voted 264-163 to approve the last piece of the Democrats' 100-hour agenda, the Clean Energy Act. The act would rescind a 2004 tax break worth $8bn for oil companies and require full royalties for drilling leases granted in 1998 and 1999 in the Gulf of Mexico, which could generate $6bn in income.

Republicans said the bill would impose $6.5bn in new taxes on US energy producers. Red Cavaney, chairman of the American Petroleum Institute, warned undoing the tax provisions would discourage capital investment. "Imposing new costs, whether in the form of taxes, fees, or royalties is contrary to the goal of providing stable and affordable energy supplies for American consumers."

Critics of the 100-hour agenda have said that it focused on easy issues rather than more difficult problems, such as Iraq. Ms Pelosi on Thursday pledged that House Democrats would support a Senate resolution on Iraq calling on Mr Bush not to send more troops.

John Boehner, House minority leader, dismissed the 100-hour agenda, and said the bills were flawed because they had been passed without the opportunity to offer amendments.

High Prices Prod Developed World To Curb Oil Use (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree

Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

Mild winter weather has something to do with it. So does heavy selling by financial funds. But a largely overlooked factor in the recent plunge in oil prices may portend an end to the multiyear rise in crude: For the first time in years, the developed world is burning less of it.

Fresh data from the International Energy Agency show oil consumption in the 30 member countries of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development fell 0.6% in 2006. Though the decline appears small, it marks the first annual drop in more than 20 years among the OECD countries, which drain close to 60% of the 84.4 million barrels of oil used globally each day. Industrialized nations' demand tiptoed into negative territory in 2002, but the dip was so slight that it registered as flat.

Yesterday, U.S. benchmark oil for February delivery settled at $50.48 a barrel, down $1.76, or 3.4%, on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Earlier in the day, futures fell below $50 a barrel for the first time since May 2005, hitting a fresh 20-month low after the Energy Department said U.S. crude-oil stockpiles rose the most in more than four years. Oil has been sliding since peaking above $77 in July. This year, prices have fallen 17%.

The tipping point where oil prices begin to erode demand was reached last summer, several industry analysts said.

The fall in oil use by the industrialized world is a sign that the reactions to higher oil prices by businesses and consumers from the U.S. to Germany to Japan may be adding up to a cycle-turning downdraft in demand. The resulting shift in global cash flows could mean a big boost for oil consumers' economies at the expense of producers and exporters.

Other signals, both economic and psychological, have been popping up for some time: Demand for gas-guzzling sport-utility vehicles has been falling, while investment in and sales of alternative fuels such as ethanol are booming. Even the Bush administration is vowing to reduce America's dependence on crude.

Gasoline prices in the U.S. are also falling, both because of swelling inventories and the slide in crude-oil prices, which can take four to eight weeks to fully pass down to retail pumps.

Yesterday, the AAA automobile club reported regular-grade gasoline below $2 a gallon in Michigan, and at $2 a gallon in Missouri and Oklahoma. The Energy Information Administration of the Energy department said the national average price of a gallon of gasoline was $2.23 as of Jan. 15. The national average may continue to fall in coming weeks, the EIA said in a weekly review published yesterday; it said prices could get close to $2 a gallon by the end of this month or early in February, noting the possibility that the national average could fall below that level.

To be sure, global oil demand grew 0.9% in 2006, owing to steady growth in China and the Middle East. But that was down from growth of 3.9% in 2004 and 1.5% in 2005. And the price fluctuations highlight the role played by expectations, rather than simple supply and demand, in determining the price of oil on world markets.

Many analysts are just starting to review, and lower, their price forecasts for this year, though a fair number still expect crude to rebound to $60 a barrel or even higher. So do some investors who have placed big bets with their own money, including Texas oilman T. Boone Pickens. For some, this stems in part from a belief that $60 is the price the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries aims to defend, though the cartel's de-facto leader, Saudi Oil Minister Ali Naimi, seemed to cast doubt on that notion this week when he said he saw no reason to support further output cuts. But a few analysts say oil's four-year surge could be ending.

"The bubble is bursting," said Frederic Lasserre, head of commodity research at Société Générale in Paris. "The sentiment has changed, and for the first time since January 2002, the hedge funds are going short at the start of the year."

News of the oil-demand drop comes as the debate over how to curb energy consumption is reaching a fever pitch in the U.S., the world's biggest oil consumer. Next week, President Bush is expected in his State of the Union address to expand on a call he issued last year for the country to end its "addiction" to oil. In Congress, bills are circulating to impose cap-and-trade programs, which amount to putting a price on global-warming emissions produced by the combustion of fossil fuels. While this government debate goes on, the OECD data suggest, the market itself is having an effect: When energy prices go up, people consume less energy.

A lasting downdraft in oil prices would trigger a profound redistribution of wealth around the world, putting more money in the pockets of consumers in the West and ending the bonanza enjoyed by oil-company investors and by petro-states such as Venezuela and Iran.

Currencies of some bigger oil exporters, including the Mexican peso, have faced downward pressure in line with falling oil prices. Airlines -- including British Airways PLC and Cathay Pacific Airways Ltd. -- have begun removing fuel surcharges imposed on passengers. Nations with significant oil industries -- including Saudi Arabia, Russia and the U.S., the top-three producers -- stand to take a hit to employment, profit and tax receipts in their oil sectors.

The signs of waning demand for oil began bubbling up early last year. Saudi Arabia began to quietly cut back its output in April because it couldn't find buyers for all its crude. Iran, OPEC's second-largest producer after Saudi Arabia, was forced to store unsold oil in tankers last summer.

Yet oil prices were sending contrary signals, peaking on July 14 at $77.03 a barrel because of fears that geopolitics or natural disasters were bound to reduce supplies. At the time, supplies were perceived to be tight, with little spare production capacity available globally to offset sudden losses. Since then, oil prices have fallen by 34% despite supply cuts by OPEC to shore up prices.

Mr. Lasserre's take on the situation is that prices of close to $70 a barrel -- they averaged $66.22 a barrel for 2006 -- marked a turning point. "People wanted to know the point at which oil prices would affect demand; now they have the answer," he said.

One factor that could insulate the world from a big price rebound, paradoxically, is OPEC's recent output cuts. By trimming production, the cartel has swelled the world's volume of spare oil-pumping capacity, particularly in Saudi Arabia, thus easing fears of a supply disruption in some part of the vast global oil chain.

In remarks to reporters in New Delhi this week, Mr. Naimi said the kingdom's spare-capacity cushion would expand to three million barrels a day by Feb. 1, when the second round of output cuts agreed to by OPEC take effect. That is a half-million barrels a day more than is exported by Iran, whose nuclear-research standoff with the U.S. has stirred jitters about supply disruptions in the Persian Gulf.

Oil buyers are watching for signs of OPEC's next move. Some OPEC members, such as Venezuela and Iran, were clamoring for further production cuts, though Mr. Naimi shot down that idea this week.

Some analysts see larger, game-changing forces in motion. One is the rise of nonoil transport fuels. "Last year was a tipping point in a lot of ways," says Philip Verleger Jr., an oil economist who heads PK Verleger LLC. "Biofuels will take bigger and bigger bites out of petroleum demand," Mr. Verleger said, noting climate-change and security concerns relating to the supply and use of petroleum. "Alternate fuels will take up all the growth, leaving petroleum demand static in the next two or three years."

Forecasts by the IEA suggest biofuels output could rise to the equivalent of more than five million barrels of crude oil a day by 2011, close to triple output of such fuels in 2005. Global oil demand last year rose by 780,000 barrels a day to 84.4 million barrels a day, the latest IEA data show.

"Virtually every day, there is a new biofuels plant announced somewhere in the world," says Lawrence Eagles, head of the IEA's oil-industry and markets division.

Mr. Eagles said that in 2005, world output of biofuels was some 650,000 barrels a day, the equivalent of 1.95 million barrels of conventional Middle Eastern crude oil. Biofuel output could rise to as much as 1.7 million barrels a day, or the equivalent of 5.1 million barrels of conventional crude, by 2011, if capacity-expansion plans are taken into account.

According to data published yesterday by the IEA, oil demand last year fell in all three major OECD regions -- North America, Europe and the Pacific. The latter two regions have from time to time had weak oil demand when economic growth was weak. But growth in U.S. oil demand had typically offset this weakness for the OECD as a whole.

But last year, the picture changed more noticeably. "Maybe they started to use less when we hit $3-a-gallon gasoline," Adam Sieminski, an oil analyst at Deutsche Bank, said of U.S. consumers. "Perhaps, toward the middle of 2006 we hit a tipping point."

But Mr. Sieminski questions whether people will forget the pain because oil prices have dropped -- and oil use will again start to increase.

Global Warming Emerges As 2008 Election Issue (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

Presidential candidates for 2008 mostly agree that global warming is a problem that merits government action, a signal that debate on the issue will be more practical than conceptual.

Democrats actively seeking the nomination or thought to be considering White House bids say climate change is real and promise plans to curb carbon emissions, a view shared by several Republican hopefuls.

"I would anticipate that both the Republican and the Democratic nominee will be arguing over who is best to solve the problem of global warming," said Sen. Barbara Boxer, California Democrat and chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee. "We're going to need a president who gets it."

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, are co-authors of a bill aimed at drastically reducing greenhouse gas emissions. The senators, who have formed presidential exploratory committees, say the Senate must pursue a solution to climate change.

"I am confident that given our will and what's at stake, America can and must assume its proper leadership role in addressing the pre-eminent environmental issue of our time, the consequences of which so directly affect our national interests," Mr. McCain said.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat and likely 2008 candidate, has said climate change is a pressing problem.

"Given the scientific evidence that we have and the potential consequences of continued warming, I strongly believe this nation needs to take sensible first steps to slow and ultimately reduce emissions of carbon dioxide and other gases that contribute to climate change," Mrs. Clinton says on her Web site, noting that New York would be affected by any coastal flooding caused by serious climate change.

Mr. Obama alluded to the issue in his announcement of a presidential exploratory committee Tuesday, saying, "Our continued dependence on oil has put our security and our very planet at risk."

"I think it's going to be a very significant issue, no question about it," said Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 Democratic nominee who has been mentioned as a 2008 candidate.

Mr. Kerry soon will introduce his own bill to "quantify the cost of carbon in some way."

Highlighting the issue are former Vice President Al Gore's film, "An Inconvenient Truth," and news that 2006 was the warmest year on record. Mr. Gore, a Democrat who ran for president in 2000, has not ruled out running in 2008.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, this week introduced a resolution calling on the United States to negotiate to join the Kyoto Protocol treaty to limit greenhouse gas emissions.

"The climate has changed," said Mr. Biden, who has said he will run for president. "It has changed outside, where the year just concluded was the warmest on record in the United States. And the climate has changed in halls of the Senate, where the causes and consequences of global warming, and how we should respond, will be a major concern of this new Congress."

All but one senator weighing a White House run voted in June 2005 for a nonbinding "sense of the Senate" measure supporting mandatory action on global warming. Fifty-three senators voted for it, and of the known potential candidates, only Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, opposed it.

Mr. Brownback told the Wichita Eagle last year: "Climate change is happening and I believe it is a problem."

The League of Conservation Voters Education Fund has created a campaign to keep the focus on climate change in the 2008 races.

"The next president needs to be a leader on this issue," said Navin Nayak, director of the environmental group's "The Heat Is On" campaign.

"You have more and more candidates who without even being prompted are talking about global warming and the need to address the issue," Mr. Nayak said.

The project's Web site (www.heatison.org) lists the positions of White House candidates, including former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

"Everyone accepts the fact that [global warming is] happening and it has an impact," the Republican is quoted as saying in June.

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, won praise for his administration's Climate Protection Plan to reduce greenhouse gases.

A Warning From The Garden (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

Well, so much for our daffodils! They all bloomed in our front yard last week. They now form a nice bright yellow cluster at the bottom of our driveway. Temperatures of 65 degrees in Washington in January will do that. Frankly, daffodils in January do brighten up the lawn. Maybe next year we'll try for roses in February.

Don't know about you, but when I see things in nature that I've never seen in my life, like daffodils blooming in January, it starts to feel creepy, like a "Twilight Zone" segment. I half expect to wake one day and find Rod Serling mowing my lawn — in shorts.

Why not? Last December was the fourth warmest on record, and 2006 was the hottest year in America since 1895. It was declared the hottest in Britain since 1659.

Even the White House seems to have noticed. Al Hubbard, the president's economic adviser, says Mr. Bush will soon unveil an energy independence strategy that will produce "headlines above the fold that will knock your socks off." Since everything the president has done on energy up to now has left my socks firmly in place, I will be eager to hear what Mr. Bush says.

Neither the White House nor the Democratic Party seems to grasp that the public and business community are miles ahead of them on this energy/environment issue. The presidential candidate who finally figures that out, though — and comes up with a compelling energy/environment agenda — is going to have a real leg up in 2008.

What would be compelling? I used to think it would be a "Manhattan Project" on energy. I don't any longer. I've learned that there is no magic bullet for reducing our dependence on oil and emissions of greenhouse gases — and politicians who call for one are usually just trying to avoid asking for sacrifice today.

The right rallying call is for a "Green New Deal." The New Deal was not built on a magic bullet, but on a broad range of programs and industrial projects to revitalize America. Ditto for an energy New Deal. If we are to turn the tide on climate change and end our oil addiction, we need more of everything: solar, wind, hydro, ethanol, biodiesel, clean coal and nuclear power — and conservation.

It takes a Green New Deal because to nurture all of these technologies to a point that they really scale would be a huge industrial project. If you have put a windmill in your yard or some solar panels on your roof, bless your heart. But we will only green the world when we change the very nature of the electricity grid — moving it away from dirty coal or oil to clean coal and renewables. And that is a huge industrial project — much bigger than anyone has told you. Finally, like the New Deal, if we undertake the green version, it has the potential to create a whole new clean power industry to spur our economy into the 21st century.

To spark a Green New Deal today requires getting two things right: government regulations and prices. Look at California. By setting steadily higher standards for the energy efficiency of buildings and appliances — and creating incentives for utilities to work with consumers to use less power — California has held its per-capita electricity use constant for 30 years, while the rest of the nation has seen per- capita electricity use increase by nearly 50 percent, according to the Natural Resources Defense Council. That has saved California from building 24 giant power plants.

Had Ronald Reagan not rolled back the higher fuel efficiency standards imposed on Detroit, we might need no Middle East oil today. High standards force innovation, and innovation leads to conservation at scale.

But prices also matter. I don't care whether it is a federal gasoline tax, carbon tax, B.T.U. tax or cap-and-trade system, power utilities, factories and car owners have to be required to pay the real and full cost to society of the carbon they put into the atmosphere. And higher costs for fossil fuels make more costly clean alternatives more competitive.

"The regulated utilities are the most important consumers from the perspective of long-term investment, and if they are not required to value carbon reduction then they will under-invest in energy efficiency and renewable energy," Peter Darbee, chairman of Pacific Gas and Electric, said to me.

This isn't rocket science. Government standards matter. They drive innovation and efficiency. And prices matter. They drive more and cleaner energy choices. So when the president unveils his energy proposals, if they don't call for higher efficiency standards and higher prices for fossil fuels — take your socks off yourself. It's going to get hot around here.

House OKs Pursuit Of Lost Oil Royalties (WT)

By Brian Debose, The Washington Times

The House yesterday passed an energy policy aimed at getting back more than $10 billion in federal royalty payments and eliminating tax relief and other subsidies that oil companies have enjoyed for the past decade.

The Clean Energy Act, which passed on a 264-123 vote, would create a fund called the Strategic Energy Efficiency and Renewables Reserve using the recouped oil dollars. The reserve also would be used to fund more investment in renewable ethanol, wind, hydrogen and biofuels technologies, as well as energy conservation programs.

The energy bill represented the fulfillment of Democrats' promise to pass a package of six bills in the first 100 legislative hours of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0118676

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said her party wasn't finished and announced that she would create a Select Committee on Energy Independence and Global Warming.

"I have also instructed my committee chairs to hold hearings so that, by July 4, we will have a package of bills that will truly get us to energy independence in 10 years."

Democrats for years have targeted oil companies that bought and signed federal land leases in 1998 and 1999. Because of a congressional oversight, these companies did not have to pay the royalty fee for oil when its price went above $34.73 a barrel or natural gas when its price rose higher than $4.34 for every million thermal units.

The prices for both oil and natural gas have been well above the royalty thresholds for years, with the loss of more than $10 billion in fees. Democrats say their energy bill will recoup those dollars.

"The American people are owed a fair value for the resources they own. Yet when the government gives tax breaks in the form of royalty relief to Big Oil and fails to accurately monitor its oil leasing programs, it is the American people who are footing the bill," said Rep. Nick J. Rahall II, West Virginia Democrat.

The White House was not pleased with oil and gas incentives that Congress enacted as part of the 2005 Energy Policy Act, calling them unnecessary.

It also opposed mandatory royalty relief and prohibitions on drilling-related user fees and tax incentives allowing some oil firms an almost automatic write-off of certain geological and geophysical expenditures.

The White House, however, is against the provision to renegotiate the 1998 and 1999 leases that Democrats seek.

The House bill limits the executive's discretionary power to modify royalties by stripping that authority from the secretary of the interior.

A report by the Interior Department's inspector general said the department had not been performing the proper oversight to track oil royalty payments to the federal Treasury and had not engaged in due diligence to ensure oil companies were paying them.

"In the compliance reviews, the Interior Department relies on the information given to them by the oil companies," Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney, New York Democrat, said in response to the report. "This is incompetence, cronyism and it could be corrupt."

The Justice Department has begun an investigation into the matter.

Republicans leaders attempted to block the House bill's passage with motions to adjourn, recommitting the legislation with instructions striking most of the provisions and arguing that passing it by a majority instead of two-thirds vote violated House rules.

"This bill will hurt domestic production and increase the price of oil and gas in this country," said House Minority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican. "If you take away the oil industry's incentives to invest in domestic production, you increase our dependence on foreign oil."

Indian Tribes Bet On Big Firms (LAW)

By Zusha Elinson, The Recorder

California Recorder, January 19, 2007

When the Pojoaque Pueblo in New Mexico decided to go ahead with a huge $245 million casino, resort and infrastructure development last year, they turned to the capital markets for financing instead of the bank loans or government grants traditionally used by tribes.

They also turned to mega law firm Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe for legal advice on the financing instead of a more traditional legal resource -- Indian law boutiques.

"When I started, it was a practice area that only a few boutique firms were involved in," said Townsend Hyatt, who advised on the Pojoaque financing and, a decade after entering the practice, now heads Orrick's tribal finance group. "As tribes have expanded economically, politically, numerically -- and certainly, as their socio-economic status has risen -- they have the economic means to hire law firms that they would not have hired before."

DOJ_NMG_0118677

To serve this need, larger firms are increasingly organizing formal Indian law practice groups. Holland & Knight, Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, Dorsey & Whitney and Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman are some of the other Am Law 100 firms with similar practice groups, most of which range from 10 to 30 lawyers.

Those lawyers are kept busy. Tribes have to deal with federal law, state and local laws, large business partners such as Las Vegas casino operators and major financial institutions.

"They need the same type of legal representation as any Fortune 500 company would need," said Dan Casas, general counsel for the Table Mountain Rancheria Band of Mission Indians near Fresno, Calif., who uses Sonnenschein Nath & Rosenthal for the tribe's litigation matters.

Casas hired Sonnenschein in 1999 when he decided that the boutique firm handling a dispute with a terminated gaming contractor lacked the expertise.

Sonnenschein partner Paula Yost, a civil litigator in San Francisco, was quickly thrust into the complexities of federal Indian law.

"It was one of the hardest cases I worked on and one of the most rewarding," Yost said.

The tribe was being sued by a Las Vegas management company, American Vantage Cos., that the tribe believed had exerted illegal control over its casino, violating federal law. The litigation, American Vantage Companies, Inc. v. Table Mountain Rancheria, was dismissed in both state and federal courts in part on the grounds of sovereign immunity, with the final ruling coming in 2003.

Since then, Yost has continued to represent the tribe and co-founded the firm's Indian law practice group, which was formalized in 2005 and encompasses more than 25 lawyers across the country. And while Casas still turns to smaller firms for some of the tribe's work, the more difficult cases go to Sonnenschein.

Another tribe, the Shingle Springs Band of Miwok Indians, also hired the firm for a complicated court battle. The firm has nearly wrapped up a five-year slog through state and federal courts against a set of challenges by California's El Dorado County and others to the tribe's plans for a casino.

TRIBAL TRANSACTIONS

Litigation that ends up in a federal court is complex enough, but transactional lawyers face an added challenge -- they often have to learn the particular laws governing each tribe. Any detail of a proposed transaction may be governed by a unique tribal regulation.

"It is in the approval process, the ability to enter into contracts, the ability to pledge certain assets, the election of which law to apply, the election of which means to settle a dispute -- all of that is something each tribe has control over," said Orrick's Hyatt, whose practice group was formalized in 2003 and includes 18 lawyers. "It's something that varies from tribe to tribe."

In 2006, the Portland, Ore.-based Hyatt dealt with several sets of laws, advising tribes and underwriters like JP Morgan Chase on financing deals across California, Arizona and New Mexico. Many of these tribes, like the Pojoaque Pueblo, turned to bond financing last year. Bonds can raise big money, but they require a good credit rating. And until recently, most tribes didn't have a rating at all.

"Many more tribes want to have more financing options, and they're getting rated," Hyatt said. "Five years ago, you could count on one hand the number of tribes that had credit ratings. Now it's a lot more common."

Attorneys say many tribes are now on the financial scale to use the same business tools and investment strategies as major corporations.

"This is going to be an increasing phenomenon going forward," said Blaine Green, co-chairman of Pillsbury's Indian law practice team, which was formalized eight months ago and consists of about 15 lawyers. "[Tribes are] moving beyond entertainment venues to financial services, insurance and real estate development."

The trend doesn't just mean more business for the tribes' lawyers. Large companies and financiers are increasingly interested in doing business with the tribes, said Green, a partner in Pillsbury's San Francisco office.

"As the rest of the country becomes more aware of the business success the tribes have had, and more aware of how tribes are diversifying, companies that previously wouldn't have thought of investing with these tribes are interested in learning about Indian law to invest or partner with them," he said.

KNOWING THE CLIENT

Despite the money, the construction deals and high-stakes litigation, an Indian tribe is not just another corporate entity. Firms serving tribes have to deal with the complexities of sovereign nations that have had long and often bitter relationships with the government and its laws.

"There's a lot of things law firms need to do [to work successfully with tribes], and the most effective way to do that is hire Native American attorneys," said Heather Dawn Thompson, a Cheyenne River Sioux and president-elect of the National Native American Bar Association.

The trouble is, there aren't a great number of American Indians at big law firms. Neither Sonnenschein nor Orrick has any in its Indian law practice groups, though the firms say they'd like to recruit them.

"Indian attorneys have historically gone back to work for their tribes. They haven't been so interested in big law firms," said Thompson, a former Patton Boggs attorney. "Unlike any other practice of law, Indian law is really about the preservation of nationhood."

The importance of this issue to tribes plays out in many ways, one of which is a broader sense of what constitutes a conflict. A case involving an entirely unrelated tribe may still offend a client who sees that other case as attacking the basic concept of tribal independence.

"Just because a case doesn't have your tribal client as a party, if it's anti-sovereignty it hurts all tribes," Thompson said, "and law firms must take that into account."

Sovereignty is a matter not only of sensitivity and legal nuance but can be the crux of a dispute.

The California Supreme Court recently ruled in Agua Caliente Band of Cahuilla Indians v. Superior Court (Fair Political Practices Commission), 06 C.D.O.S. 11719, that tribes can be sued for violating state campaign disclosure laws, even though they enjoy sovereign immunity under federal law.

Despite the additional complexities, Jeffry Butler, another co-founder of Sonnenschein's Indian law group, said there are also intangible rewards to helping a tribe navigate the legal system.

"It's easy to help large companies like a lot of law firms do," said Butler, a partner in the firm's San Francisco office. "It's more satisfying to represent a client like Shingle Springs because they were treated poorly -- historically and not so historically."

Sioux To Illini: Return Regalia (CHIT)

By Jodi S. Cohen And Michelle S. Keller

Chicago Tribune, January 19, 2007

In a 1982 halftime ceremony at Memorial Stadium, a 93-year-old Oglala Sioux chief and medicine man presented the University of Illinois with tribal regalia for use by the university's mascot, Chief Illiniwek.

The university paid $3,500 for the moccasins, blanket, peace pipe pouch, breastplate and war bonnet with 90 eagle feathers, all owned by Sioux Chief Frank Fools Crow, according to the university's archives.

On Thursday, Oglala Sioux tribal members, including Fools Crow's grandson, asked for it all back.

The tribe's demands are the latest in a growing campaign by students, faculty, Native American groups and the National Collegiate Athletic Association—which has already penalized the U. of I.—to dump the mascot.

A resolution passed Thursday by the Oglala Sioux asks the university to stop using the mascot and return the attire, including the original feathers.

Eagle feathers were replaced on the mascot's headdress with painted turkey feathers by 1990, according to the school's sports media guide. Where the original eagle feathers now are is unclear, both with the university and with tribal headquarters on the Pine Ridge Reservation in South Dakota.

University officials, already mulling the future of Chief Illiniwek, first learned of the demand at a trustees meeting Thursday.

"The university is going to review the resolution that was presented and take it under advisement," said U. of I. spokesman Tom Hardy.

The resolution, passed by three of the tribe's five-member executive committee, points out that Chief Illiniwek, intended to honor Illinois-based tribes, does not belong in Oglala clothing in the first place, because that tribe is not from Illinois.

"The antics of persons playing 'Chief Illiniwek' perpetuate a degrading racial stereotype that reflects negatively on all American Indian people," according to the resolution.

Debate over the mascot, a barefoot student who performs at football and basketball games in the buckskin costume and feather headdress, has raged for years. This episode comes as a U. of I. student faces possible expulsion over a comment on a pro-Chief Web site threatening to hurt a student who opposed the mascot.

Some university students and Native Americans have asked university trustees to end the Chief tradition, saying it is humiliating and creates a hostile environment on campus.

Supporters say the Chief respects Native American culture and is a revered tradition that dates to 1926.

Lawrence Eppley, chairman of the U. of I. board of trustees, said Thursday that the board should decide this year about the future of the Chief, citing a ruling by the NCAA that prohibits the university from hosting postseason competition as long as the Illiniwek tradition continues.

Last year the school lost an appeal, and men's tennis and women's soccer teams were unable to host postseason play.

"It is also time to ... bring to a conclusion the matter of Chief Illiniwek, so that the university can be removed from the list of NCAA policy violators, move our institution forward and allow our student athletes to compete at the highest levels and free of sanctions," Eppley said at Thursday's board meeting.

Critics hopes' grow

Faculty and staff members in American Indian studies at the Native American House at the U. of I. said they hoped the resolution would finally push university administrators to end use of the mascot.

"This is a moment for them to actually get out from under the whole controversy," said Debbie Reese, assistant professor of American Indian studies. "It is an important moment for native people across the country who are asking that mascots like this be retired."

Reese said she disagreed with the argument that the Chief respects Native American tradition by using authentic regalia.

"Here they have a situation where they have a native tribe asking for that back. If they honor and respect native people, they will give it back," Reese said.

Fools Crow's grandson, Mel Lone Hill, said in a telephone interview Thursday that he was upset when his grandfather handed over the clothing because he thought it would be passed down to him.

"It's more of a family heirloom. It is a special costume that he wore. It was given to me by him, and then he borrowed and took it with him," said Lone Hill, the tribe's ceremonial chief. He said the regalia probably was made a year or two before it was turned over.

Fools Crow, who traveled with Buffalo Bill Cody's Wild West Show, died in 1989.

A former Illiniwek surprised

One former Chief Illiniwek, Steve Raquel, said Thursday that he was surprised by the demand because he thought the university and the tribe had a good relationship.

"To hear this request come back just kind of saddened me and saddens a lot of the chiefs," said Raquel, of Naperville, a member of the Council of Chiefs, a group of 27 alumni who portrayed Illiniwek. Raquel was Chief from 1992 to 1993.

"We did purchase it," said Raquel, referring to the university. "The ceremony that we had was a presentation of gratitude. It was an exchange. The uniform is a very significant part of the tradition."

University spokeswoman Robin Kaler said there is a second costume, used from 1967 to 1982, before the purchase from Fools Crow. She said there are now two Chiefs; one performs at men's basketball and football games wearing the Oglala Sioux regalia and the other performs at women's games in the older costume.

An even older outfit was displayed until last year in the university's Sousa Archives: Center for American Music, Kaler said.

Deward Walker, an anthropology and ethnic studies professor at the University of Colorado, said the Oglala Sioux clothing could be considered sacred, depending on how it was used by the tribe.

"It depends on who wore it, it depends on the significance to the people from whom it came. ... It is up to the tribe to decide if it is to be regarded as culturally significant," said Walker, an expert in Native American artifacts. "Sometimes they are made with the intended purpose of gifting them to someone outside the tribe. At other times, headdresses worn by famous tribal leaders have been given over, much to the embarrassment and chagrin of the tribes."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Joins L.A. Policing Effort In War On Gang Crime (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy And Richard Winton, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

Director Mueller stands with city and county leaders, saying DEA and ATF agents also will be enlisted in the fight.

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III joined local law enforcement officials Thursday as they announced a campaign for the "strategic dismantling" of two street gangs after the killing last month of 14-year-old Cheryl Green in the Harbor Gateway area.

In addition, Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee Baca said he plans to keep convicted gang members in jail for their full sentences, exempting them from an early release program underway to relieve overcrowding.

Mueller was in Los Angeles to pledge FBI assistance in the city's battle against gangs after a 14% increase in gang violence last year, including a hike of nearly 25% in South L.A.

The arrest of two members of the 204th Street gang in the shooting death of Green sparked outrage after police said they believed the Latinos targeted the girl because she was African American.

The FBI director stood with Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, Police Chief William J. Bratton, Baca and others in front of a market in the tiny gang-plagued neighborhood as officials outlined their multi-agency attack on the 204th Street group and an affiliate, the Eastside Torrance gang.

"No one should have to fear for their life because of the color of their skin; not in our city, not in our country and certainly not in this neighborhood," Villaraigosa said. "We have a message for these gang leaders: We are coming with everything we have. We are coming with services and suppression, and we are putting you out of business."

The news conference was held in front of a market on Harvard Boulevard, just north of 204th Street, that some African Americans are afraid to patronize because of the area's predominantly Latino gangs.

Authorities will use search warrants, hate crime investigations and graffiti, trespassing, narcotics, truancy and curfew laws to go after the gangs, Los Angeles Police Department officials said.

The 204th Street gang has 120 members and is accused of terrorizing African American residents of a nearly 2-square-mile area that it considers its turf. The Eastside Torrance gang is associated with the 204th Street group but is smaller.

Police are already planning to ask judges to approve "stay-away" orders for gang members to keep them out of the neighborhood. And starting today, LAPD officers and sheriff's deputies will share patrol cars while driving through the area.

Because 17 members of the 204th Street gang live in Torrance, and have crossed city boundaries to escape Los Angeles police, the crackdown will include cooperation with the Torrance Police Department and regular county parole officers as well as the joint patrols.

"It allows for the sharing of intelligence and getting the message to these characters that the boundaries they go across so freely don't matter," Bratton said.

The LAPD-led initiative will gather intelligence on the gangs, including the identity of members, in hopes of obtaining an injunction to limit their ability to gather on streets, the mayor said.

The federal Drug Enforcement Administration will target drug crimes, and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives will go after guns.

Federal agents will provide electronic surveillance of gang activity and operate observation posts in the neighborhood; the U.S. attorney may use federal hate crime and civil rights laws to put violators in federal prison, where sentences are longer, officials said.

"We will be working shoulder to shoulder with police officers in these areas," Mueller said.

Baca's decision to exclude gang members from the jail's early release program removes a big hurdle to the success of any crackdown, officials said.

An increase in gang crime citywide has Bratton drawing up a list of the 10 to 20 worst gangs in the city for similar targeting.

The Harbor Gateway area has experienced racial tensions for more than a decade as African Americans have moved from a nearby housing project to the predominantly Latino neighborhood, the officials said.

In 1997, a black youth was killed in the area, followed by three racially motivated homicides including the killing of Green, city officials said.

The stepped-up enforcement effort was denounced by some community activists, including Aqeela Sherrills, who for years headed the Community Self Determination Institute.

Sherrills questioned why the city is not doing enough to provide youth programs and after-school services, and he noted that Najee Ali, director of Project Islamic Hope, a local civil rights organization, has announced that gang members had agreed to a truce earlier this week.

"They are going to spend millions of dollars even though Najee Ali already brought about a peace treaty," Sherrills said.

Earlier in the day, Mueller told about 100 members of the Los Angeles Area Chamber of Commerce that increases in gang violence were being seen across the nation but that the problem was a special challenge in Southern California.

"Los Angeles, for better or worse, is ground zero for modern gang activities," Mueller said.

"Here in Los Angeles the ratio of gang members to police officers is overwhelming," he added. "This is where we in the FBI can help."

204th Street Gang Focus Of Crackdown (LADN)

By RICK ORLOV And TROY ANDERSON, Staff Writers

Los Angeles Daily News, January 19, 2007

Some fear wrong message sent

Even as a South Los Angeles gang agreed to a truce in a troubled neighborhood where two youths were killed, city officials vowed further action against the gang believed to be responsible for a recent increase in violence.

Joined by a squadron of law enforcement officers from city, county and federal agencies, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa said the city will target the 204th Street gang that has terrorized the Harbor Gateway area.

"What I want to do is develop a plan to have a strategic dismantling of this gang," Villaraigosa said. "I support the idea of a gang truce, but it's no good unless we can guarantee peace for this community."

Villaraigosa said the effort will be headed by the Los Angeles Police Department, but will also draw on the the county Sheriff's Department, the FBI, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, state Department of Corrections and the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Federal Bureau of Investigation Director Robert Mueller on Thursday pledged to work with local and state law enforcement agencies to crack down on gangs and use federal resources, intelligence and laws to crush gang leadership.

"Taking apart a gang is much like demolishing a building," Mueller said. "Hacking

away at individual walls and beams only does so much. But using federal drug and racketeering statutes is akin to dynamiting the foundation. Once the gang's leadership infrastructure implodes, all members are weakened. It becomes more difficult for the gang to operate, and eventually it crumbles."

Mueller, speaking at a Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce luncheon, told LAPD Chief William Bratton that his 700 agents in Los Angeles would work more closely with the LAPD, the Sheriff's Department and other agencies.

Traditionally, the FBI targets the leaders of organized gangs using federal racketeering charges and stiff federal prison sentences to dismantle gangs, sometimes crippling the entire organization.

Mueller also plans to use emerging technologies to investigate gangs, including databases that show the geographic locations of gang members, their bench warrants, shootings and those overstaying their visas.

Connie Rice, co-director of The Advancement Project, said smart law enforcement techniques are only part of the solution to reducing gang violence.

"They will arrest all the kingpins and half a generation later they will be replaced," Rice said. "That's why after spending $85 billion in the last 25 years on getting rid of gangs, we have six times as many gangs. So law enforcement can't do it alone.

"The best research shows that gangs do not exist in a vacuum. They have to have conditions to brood in. If you don't get rid of those conditions, the gang will simply perpetrate."

Officials said efforts will focus on finding individual gang members who have been responsible for much of the violence and getting them off the streets.

The city also will expand its effort with the county Probation Department - similar to a plan announced earlier this week for the San Fernando Valley - to identify and work with individual gang members.

The crackdown also calls for expanded use of gang injunctions, stay-away orders for individual gang members and stepped-up enforcement of everything from vandalism and trespassing to curfews and truancy.

But Najee Ali of Project Islamic Hope said he is concerned the stepped-up crackdown sends the wrong message.

"This gang injunction is no more than a Band-Aid," said Ali, who brokered the gang truce. "The LAPD and the mayor are only reacting to the problem. To eradicate gangs, we must get to the roots of why young people join gangs."

"Where is the mayor's plan to support and maintain intervention strategies to interrupt the recruitment of gang members? The city needs to hear ... positive alternatives, not this lock them up and throw away the key solution."

Harbor Gateway has become a symbol for much of the city's gang problem in recent days with two shootings by gangs.

On Dec. 5, immigrant Arturo Ponce, 34, was shot and killed in the neighborhood and 10 days later, 14-year-old Cheryl Green was shot when she was believed to have crossed a gang line.

Since then, residents have tried to unite against the gang violence, holding a rally where more than 200 people turned out to decry the violence.

L.A. Officials Launch Crackdown On Gang Suspected In Girl's Slaying (SDUT/AP)

By Jeremiah Marquez, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 19, 2007

LOS ANGELES – Authorities announced Thursday an offensive against the Hispanic gang allegedly behind the racially charged shooting death of a 14-year-old black girl, the first part of what they said will be a major crackdown on street gangs this year.

“We have a message to the gang leaders,” Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa said at a news conference in the South Los Angeles neighborhood where Cheryl Green was killed.

Green was shot Dec. 15, allegedly by a Hispanic gang bent on killing blacks following a confrontation between the gang members and a black men.

Police described the attack as a hate crime. Two reputed Hispanic gang members have been arrested in the slaying.

Gang crime increased by 14 percent last year at a time when overall violent crime was down. The spike has come amid ongoing conflict between black and Hispanic gangs.

Officials said the 204th Street gang is the first to be targeted in a citywide effort to suppress gang violence.

Police Chief William Bratton said police were putting together a list identifying the top 10 to 20 worst gangs involved in violent crimes, bias-related attacks and assaults on officers. Also under consideration are more gang injunctions and “stay away” probation orders to prevent gang member released from prison from returning to their neighborhoods.

The effort would involve federal and local law enforcement agencies.

“Our intention is ... to look at each gang individually to determine who we can best attack them,” said Bratton, who was joined by FBI Director Robert Mueller and other law enforcement officials.

Mueller, who earlier in the day called Los Angeles "ground zero for modern gang activity, " said he would bring to bear the federal government's resources in gang investigations. Aside from manpower and intelligence, that includes federal statutes such as racketeering that help demolish a gang's hierarchy.

Mueller said there were more than 30,000 gangs and 800,000 members nationwide.

"Like a cancer," he said earlier in the day, "gangs are spreading across America."

Officials Say They'll Break Up Latino Gang In Los Angeles (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 18 — The authorities said Thursday that they would dismantle a Latino gang that has been accused of racially motivated violence, including the shooting death last month of a 14-year-old black girl.

The announcement was made in the heart of the gang's territory, in the Harbor Gateway neighborhood, by Mayor Antonio R. Villaraigosa; Chief William Bratton of the Los Angeles police; the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Robert S. Mueller III; and city and county prosecutors.

Two members of the gang, known as 204th Street, have been charged with murder in the death of the girl, Cheryl Green, who was shot as she talked with friends near an unofficial boundary separating blacks and Latinos.

The district attorney has submitted a filing that the killing, part of years of tension in the neighborhood, was motivated by hate, making the defendants eligible for the death penalty.

The killing has raised concern about racial strife among gangs elsewhere in the city, though the Harbor Gateway problem has been called particularly serious because of Cheryl's killing.

The crackdown is to include an infusion of police officers and federal agents to step up electronic surveillance of the gang and make arrests even for relatively mundane infractions like curfew violations, truancy and trespassing.

The city attorney will seek an injunction barring gang members from congregating at certain places and times, a tactic that the police say has proved successful in other areas.

Gang crackdowns have in the past yielded mixed results at best. Typically, the violence subsides until the police pull back as pressure to patrol other areas increases.

"It's like a ship passing in water," said Wes McBride, executive director of the California Gang Investigators Association. "As soon as the ship passes, the wake fills in. It's too manpower intensive."

KNBC-TV, January 19, 2007

HARBOR GATEWAY, Calif. -- An injunction will be filed against 120 documented members of a Harbor Gateway gang implicated in the racially motivated shooting death of a 14-year-old black girl in the racially divided South Bay community, authorities announce Thursday.

Video

A truce that activists said they brokered with the 204th Street Gang appeared to be too little, too late, as city, county, and federal law enforcement agencies agreed to collaborate on efforts to dismantle the violent gang.

The crackdown on the 204th Street gang comes after two of its members allegedly shot and killed Cheryl Green and wounded three of the teenager's friends on Dec. 15.

Cheryl and a total of seven friends were standing at the intersection of Harvard Boulevard and 204th Street when the gunfire erupted, about an hour after they got out of Stephen M. White Middle School for winter recess.

Authorities said the eighth-grader was not involved with gangs and was targeted solely because of the color of her skin.

Latino gang members Ernesto Alcarez, 20, and Jonathan Fajardo, 18, have each been charged with one count of premeditated murder and six counts of attempted premeditated murder in connection with the shooting.

Under the enforcement program against the 204th Street Gang, to involve federal, state and local agencies:

The Los Angeles Police Department will serve as the lead agency in all investigations.

The county sheriff's department will head up arrests for curfew, truancy and other violations of the proposed injunction.

DOJ_NMG_0118684

The FBI and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms will conduct electronic surveillance of gang activity and monitor the area from a series of observation posts.

The city attorney's, district attorney's and U.S. attorney's offices will coordinate civil, criminal and federal prosecution of crimes committed by the gang.

The Los Angeles Unified School District police force will patrol the gang's territory and coordinate gang prevention and intervention programs at neighborhood schools

If deemed successful, the joint effort, which also involves the California Department of Corrections, could be enforced in other gang-plagued neighborhoods across the city, officials said.

Harbor Gateway's racial tensions date back to the mid-1990s, when blacks began moving into the predominantly Latino neighborhood, according to the mayor's office.

Since then, Latino gang members have threatened violence toward black residents of the South Bay community if they cross south of 206th Street, the so-called "forbidden line" that divides Latinos to the north and blacks to the south.

Before Cheryl was killed, at least three other racially-motivated homicides have been reported in Harbor Gateway since 1997, according to the mayor's office.

Earlier Thursday, the girl's mother, Charlene Lovett, hugged a Latino mom as they joined other residents in signing the so-called peace truce brokered by community activist Najee Ali of Project Islamic HOPE

"We are all human beings. We all are the same," Lovett said, adding that residents were "looking forward to being able to move about this community every way we all choose to without fearing for our lives and fearing for our kids' lives."

But no gang members showed up, as Ali had hoped.

They stayed away for fear of being singled out by police, he said, "but we have met and they have agreed to spread the peace. They're also aware that their days are numbered, anyway."

Spike In Gang Murders Prods L.A. Toward Action (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

from the January 19, 2007 edition - http://www.csmonitor.com/2007/0119/p01s04-ussc.html Spike in gang murders prods L.A. toward action The hope is that key players – schools, community leaders, and police – will unite to defuse racial tensions.

By Daniel B. Wood | Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

LOS ANGELES

At Lucy Florence Coffeehouse in the city's South Central district, neighborhood residents gather for a grief-and-anger ritual that has become as common as the growing wave of gang violence that spawned it. In a small gallery space, parents of gang-related murder victims step to the microphones to express outrage, sorrow and calls-to-action to assembled civic leaders and reporters.

"This wicked evil has to stop," says Charlene Lovett, mother of 14-year-old daughter Cheryl Green, killed in December. Cheryl, a black girl, was playing with friends on the wrong side of town when she was shot by a Latino gang member, according to police. It was one of 269 gang-related murders citywide in 2006. Overall, crime is down but black leaders say a new level of Hispanic versus black hate crimes has erupted – a claim that police say is not showing up in statistics.

Neither side disputes that violent gang battles have spiraled out of control in recent months – from prisons to schools to the streets – producing a "climate of fear higher than any time in the history of this world capital of gangs," in the words of Najee Ali, a local black activist. That happened as Hispanics numbers have grown, pushing into neighborhoods that were predominately black.

If any city in the US has the know-how to attack the plague of gang violence, it would be L.A., which tried many approaches during the urban warfare that rocked this city in the 1980s. There is hope that it will not have to reinvent the wheel, but rather that key players – city leaders, the schools, the police, the courts, churches, and community activists – are poised to spring into collective action to try to defuse the tensions underlying the violence.

Some call it an antigang "Marshall Plan," a reference to the US tactic after World War II of a massive investment in what was formerly enemy terrain. A shocking 14 percent jump of violent gang crime in 2006 – even as the city as a whole has seen overall crime drop for five straight years – is what is spurring all to act now.

New category of hate crime

Recent killings of blacks by Hispanics is a new category of hate crime, says Earl Ofari Hutchinson, a political analyst and author of several books on the black image in America. Riots fanned by tensions between blacks and Hispanics in L.A. jails last year and in inner city high schools reflect a new competitiveness for jobs, services, parks, and other public spaces, he says.

"There is a spiral of violence over turf, drugs, guns, crime," Mr. Hutchinson says. "Now there is another element of fear for lives and safety that multiplies the tension and the resentment."

Gang violence is contained in pockets of the city, and has been somewhat hidden by the fact that violent-crime rates citywide have, in general, been dropping.

"I never knew [the gang violence] was as strong as it is until this happened," said Ms. Lovett, speaking of her daughter's murder.

Los Angeles police are ratcheting up enforcement with tactics such as "Top Ten" lists – one of "worst gangs" and one of "worst leaders" – to target the most egregious suspected offenders of the city's 720 street gangs and their 40,000 members. They are increasing the use of injunctions to prevent public gathering of gangs and nuisance-abatement lawsuits that target their permanent hangouts.

New collaborations with federal, state, and local agencies will pool money and resources. Among new ideas: better tracking of gang members who reenter neighborhoods after release from prison.

But officials say they have come to realize that the gang epidemic here is largely immune to increased crime crackdowns.

"We have been stuck on 'stupid' in fighting gangs," says Constance Rice, author of a new study and 100 recommendations presented to the L.A. City Council Wednesday.

Police see they "cannot arrest their way out of the gang violence crisis," and are moving to a "comprehensive, neighborhood-based, schools-centered" approach, in the words of the study.

The City Council in 2005 ordered the multiyear study by the Advancement Project – a national group that seeks to build multiracial democracy – with the intent of implementing it in phases after researching and testing new ideas.

"Over the past three decades the city has spent $50 billion on the problem and now has six times as many gangs and twice the number of gang members," says Rice. The study concludes: "The city needs nothing less than a Marshall Plan to end gang violence."

This means new ideas for job and community development, child development, and education and public health initiatives.

Officials say the broader view is needed to keep the metropolis from reaching a point in which violence spills into affluent and safer communities.

"The proliferation of gangs and their increased violence threatens to undo all that we have achieved in crime reduction all over the city," says Anthony Pacheco, one of a five-member Board of Police Commissioners.

Community leaders working together

Through the years, studies have attempted to fix L.A.'s image as the "capital of gangs," but no approach has been as comprehensive, according to the lead gang-liaison for the mayor's office.

"What is different now is that everyone realizes for the first time that enforcement is only a short-term fix," says Jorja Leap, a social welfare professor at the University of California, Los Angeles, who has studied L.A. gangs for 20 years. She says some recommendations from prior offensives were not implemented due to lack of political will and public attention. That seems to have changed.

"The stars are aligned with everyone on the same page ... a committed police chief, a new mayor, a city council that is truly interested and a community that has had enough," she says. So far, $22 million annually is spread mainly between two programs, one for school-based prevention and the other for community development.

Lack of coordination made the 23 separate antigang programs ineffective even though L.A. was spending $82 million per year on them. The report suggests a single "gang czar" who can "transcend the drag of torpid bureaucracies."

Researchers looked at what has worked in other gang capitals – Chicago, New York, and Alameda County, Calif. – but concluded that Los Angeles is unique in its geography, structure, history, and culture of gangs.

Instead, researchers point out a community model that had been tried in L.A., which they want to emulate. For nine weeks during the summer of 2003, local basketball courts stayed open past midnight for games. Community groups offered computer games and tutoring from 8 p.m. to 3 a.m. – the hours when most violence occurs. Gang intervention workers negotiated with local gangs for no-violence agreements, while a local radio station provided coverage of progress.

"At the end of 14 weeks there was a clear record ... not one shooting or killing or battery or assault," recalls Rice.

New county-city initiative

Just this week, L.A. Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, Supervisor Zev Yaroslavsky, and City Councilman Tony Cardenas announced a county-city initiative for five new parole officers to deal with gang problems in the San Fernando Valley, home to about 1.2 million. The region saw a 42 percent rise in gang violence in 2006. The city council has already committed to 1,000 more police officers over the next five years, increasing the ratio of 1 officer for every 445 residents, less than half the rate in New York.

Some observers worry that momentum for change could stall. The mayor and police chief "will pay lip service to Rice's recommendations, but you won't see a concerted effort ...to seek out the massive resources needed to implement the social service, jobs, and education approach to curbing gang violence," predicts Hutchinson.

For Lovett, the added force is welcome, but only part of the picture. "We need to come together as a community to get to the root of the problem between races here. This has been going on for years, and I've never faced it until it happened to me."

Calls Made To Void Subpoenas For Reporters In Steroid Case (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

The new chairman of the House Judiciary Committee and an influential Republican congressman asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales on Thursday to withdraw grand jury subpoenas to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters facing 18 months in federal prison for refusing to disclose their confidential sources of information about steroid use in professional sports.

In 2004, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams wrote articles quoting closed-door testimony of Barry Bonds of the San Francisco Giants, Jason Giambi of the New York Yankees and sprinter Tim Montgomery about the use of drugs supplied by the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, known as BALCO.

Five defendants, including Victor Conte, BALCO's founder, have pleaded guilty to illegal drug distribution. Another grand jury is investigating whether Bonds committed perjury by denying that he knowingly used steroids.

"There can be no doubt that the work of" Fainaru-Wada and Williams "has been significant," Rep. John Conyers, D-Michigan, and Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., ranking minority member on the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, wrote to Gonzales.

"This coverage spurred Congress to action ... and forced Major League Baseball, among others, to announce an historic change in their steroid rules and policies," the congressmen added. "The subpoenas issued to those reporters and their newspaper seeking confidential source information are troubling both on the specific facts of their case and because of the great damage they could cause to our nation's press and the First Amendment.

Although a protective order is "an important interest," they said, "this case is significantly different from others involving a breach of national security, terrorism of serious criminal conduct."

In September, U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White in San Francisco sentenced the two reporters to up to 18 months in prison for contempt and imposed a $1,000-a-day fine on the Chronicle. But he suspended those penalties until the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, which is set to hear the matter in March, rules on the case.

In addition to the letter, Conyers made a speech on the issue at the National Press Club in Washington on Thursday, where he called for a federal law that would shield reporters from facing jail time for refusing to divulge the names of confidential sources. A bill on this issue died in the Senate last year. Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, said she expected a bill on the issue to be introduced this year.

Tasia Scolinos, a Justice Department spokeswoman, said the department is reviewing the letter. "As a matter of policy," she said, "the Justice Department issues subpoenas to members of the media only when absolutely necessary."

Feds Asked To Back Off In BALCO Case Chronicle Reporters Get Backing Of Two Congressmen (SFC)

By Zachary Coile, Chronicle Washington Bureau

San Francisco Chronicle, January 19, 2007

Washington -- The new Democratic chairman of the House Judiciary Committee Thursday urged the Justice Department to withdraw its subpoenas for two San Francisco Chronicle reporters, which seek to force them to name their confidential sources for federal grand jury testimony in which top athletes admitted illegal steroid use.

House Judiciary Chairman John Conyers of Michigan and Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., the top Republican on the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, wrote Attorney General Alberto Gonzales criticizing the agency's efforts to jail Chronicle reporters Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada for refusing to comply with the subpoenas.

"The subpoenas issued to those reporters and their newspaper seeking confidential source information are troubling both on the specific facts of their case and because of the great damage they could cause to our nation's press and the First Amendment," the lawmakers wrote.

The Justice Department was still reviewing the letter late Thursday, but a spokeswoman insisted the agency "issues subpoenas to members of the media only when absolutely necessary."

The unusual bipartisan letter showed that Congress is closely watching the case of the two Bay Area journalists, who could be ordered to jail for refusing to comply with a federal judge's order to divulge their sources. Lawmakers and legal experts say it's a crucial test of far the government will be allowed to go to extract information from journalists.

"It sends a message that really goes beyond these two courageous reporters," Conyers said in an interview Thursday. "It sends a message to all reporters that this could happen to you."

The Chronicle case has become Exhibit A for lawmakers pushing a federal shield law that would protect journalists from efforts by the government to force them to name their sources or turn over notes. The measure stalled in the Republican-controlled Congress last year, partly because of Justice Department opposition. Democrats are vowing to revive efforts to pass the law, but it still faces major hurdles.

Some lawmakers believe that if the two reporters are sent to jail, it could actually increase the chances that Congress would approve a media shield bill this year.

"It pains me to think that these two men might have to follow Judith Miller behind bars to make that point," said Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., a chief sponsor of the shield bill who met with the two reporters in his Capitol Hill this week, referring to the former New York Times reporter jailed for 85 days in connection with the investigation into the public disclosure of a CIA agent's name.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams were ruled in contempt of court in September by U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White for refusing to testify to a grand jury investigating leaked transcripts in the steroid distribution case involving the Bay Area Laboratory Co-operative.

White sentenced Fainaru-Wada and Williams to up to 18 months in prison, and imposed a $1,000-a-day fine on The Chronicle, but suspended those penalties pending an appeal.

A panel of the Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in San Francisco is scheduled to hear the case in March.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams wrote hundreds of articles about steroid use in sports, including several in 2004 that quoted grand jury testimony by San Francisco Giant slugger Barry Bonds, New York Yankees star Jason Giambi, sprinter Tim Montgomery and other athletes describing their use of substances supplied by the lab known as BALCO.

Five defendants, including BALCO founder Victor Conte, have pleaded guilty to illegal drug distribution. A separate grand jury is investigating whether Bonds lied by denying he knowingly used steroids.

Williams and Fainaru-Wada, in Washington this week for a First Amendment summit sponsored by the American Society of Newspaper Editors, have pressed their case with top lawmakers, including House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, California's two senators and members of both parties on the House and Senate judiciary committees.

Pelosi pledged to push the reporters' case at the top levels of the Bush administration, including urging Gonzales to "consider the bipartisan request to withdraw these subpoenas," her spokesman Brendan Daly said.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., had a previously scheduled call with Gonzales on Wednesday, and said she "expressed my concern about jailing two fine reporters who did a major public service by exposing the steroid scandal in sports." But the attorney general gave no hint he would budge from his position, she said.

Pence pledged to write a letter to Gonzales in the next few weeks, adding his voice to those urging him to drop the prosecution of the reporters.

"Justice demands that the attorney general reconsider these subpoenas and prevent this sentence from being carried out against these two noble members of the Fourth Estate," Pence said.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. said Thursday she has asked her staff to investigate whether the Justice Department followed its guidelines when it issued the subpoenas.

"In my view, if the guidelines were, in fact, not followed and criminal laws were not broken, then, this is a case where leniency seems appropriate," Feinstein said.

But Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos insisted the agency went through a long review process and followed all its guidelines.

"This exhaustive and rigorous process is undertaken for a reason - to enable close scrutiny by career prosecutors and to ensure that subpoenas seeking confidential source information are issued only as a matter of last resort," Scolinos said.

Conyers, who appeared at the First Amendment conference Thursday, drew applause from newspaper editors when he said he would press Gonzales to drop the subpoenas.

Conyers also pledged to use his power as chairman to hold hearings this year to build support for a federal shield law. Pelosi has promised to help Conyers get a federal shield law to the House floor.

Phil Bronstein, Chronicle editor and executive vice president, said the comments by lawmakers help support the paper's case that prosecutors have gone too far by seeking to jail the reporters for honoring their confidentiality agreement to sources.

"There is a 'reasonable quotient' -- what is reasonable and appropriate," Bronstein said. "The members of Congress will add another voice ... suggesting to the Justice Department what is a reasonable approach -- and so far they haven't taken it."

WASHINGTON (AP) — The new chairman of the House Judiciary Committee on Thursday called on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to stop trying to compel two San Francisco Chronicle reporters to identify the source who leaked confidential grand jury testimony in the steroid abuse investigation.

A federal judge already has ordered reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams jailed until they comply with government subpoenas demanding detailed information about how the reporters received the grand jury testimony of baseball stars Barry Bonds, Jason Giambi and others. The reporters have remained free while the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals considers the case.

"The issuance of these subpoenas appears to run directly counter to the protections afforded to the press under the First Amendment," Conyers, D-Mich. said in a speech at the National Press Club in Washington. "It is not just about a single case. We in the Congress need to examine the effect of these aggressive new prosecutorial tactics."

Conyers sent a letter to Gonzales asking the attorney general to withdraw the subpoenas. Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., also signed the letter.

"Like most Americans, we have watched with great concern as the Department of Justice issued grand jury subpoenas to the reporters and their newspaper to learn the identities of their confidential sources on some of the most significant reporting in the history of professional sports," Conyers and Davis wrote. "We write to you now to express my deep concern over the issuance of these subpoenas and to urge you to withdraw them."

Davis, as chair of the House Government Reform Committee, held a steroids hearing in March 2005, when the witnesses included former baseball players Mark McGwire, Rafael Palmeiro and Jose Canseco. Davis was one of a handful of representatives and senators who sponsored bills proposing to mandate stronger steroid testing and penalties for U.S. pro sports.

A DOJ spokesman didn't return a telephone call. In court filings, prosecutors asked the San Francisco-based appeals court to uphold a judge's contempt order against Fainaru-Wada and Williams, arguing that reporters do not have special privileges that allow them to keep evidence from a grand jury.

The appeals court is expected to hear the reporters' appeal sometime in March, though an exact date hasn't been set.

FBI Sends Citizens Terrorism Alerts By E-Mail (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan

The FBI has sent out 600,000 E-mail alerts to a base of 14,000 subscribers, the bureau tells U.S. News.

The E-mail alert program was launched in October to provide the public, businesses, and law enforcement agencies with timely information on everything from terrorists to fugitives, scammers, and crooks, as well as updated information on terrorist threats. John Miller, FBI chief spokesman, said the system can also be used for crisis communication during a disaster or terrorist attack.

To sign up, one clicks on red envelope icons on the FBI's main website or its 56 field office websites and provides an E-mail address. No personal information is required.

"The new FBI E-mail alert system lets us do several things," Miller says. "It becomes a high-speed information portal for anyone from local law enforcement to the media to the public. As you sign up for it, you can tailor what you want to be notified on based on your interests. It also can be used as a crisis communication tool in the event of a disaster or even a terrorist attack. By letting people know when our website is updated, we can tell them about developments in missing children investigations or most wanted suspects as well."

Miller said the FBI expects the alert system will also help them catch criminals.

"It's a fast, effective way of keeping our partners and the public informed," he said.

7 Weapons Stolen From FBI Vehicle (WP)

By Allan Lengel

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Seven weapons, including two submachine guns, were stolen last weekend from an FBI agent's vehicle in Southwest Washington, the agency said yesterday.

Also taken were ammunition, a police radio, bullet-resistant vests, body armor and photography equipment, the FBI said.

The theft triggered an intensive search for the property and whoever took it. The FBI decided yesterday to seek the public's help by offering a $25,000 reward.

"We understand the seriousness of those weapons in the hands of untrained individuals," said Joseph Persichini Jr., head of the FBI's Washington field office. "We have employed significant resources and have been working on this since Saturday. We are doing everything possible to identify those responsible and recover the property."

The FBI vehicle belongs to a 35-year-old member of a special response team who was authorized to take it home. It was one of about 20 vehicles randomly vandalized in the 800 to 1100 blocks of Water Street between midnight Friday and 3 a.m. Saturday, according to D.C. police and the FBI.

A second bureau-issued car belonging to an agent at the FBI's headquarters also was vandalized, but nothing of importance was taken, authorities said. Both FBI agents live in the area and were issued vehicles to take home because of their assignments.

Persichini said one of the agents stored equipment in his vehicle, an SUV, because he has to be in a "ready position 24-7" as part of a special response team. He said that the vehicle had an alarm and that the equipment was kept in security containers that were broken into.

FBI officials will investigate to determine whether policies or procedures were violated, Persichini said, a step he described as routine.

FBI investigators are working with D.C. police; the U.S. Park Police; the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; and the U.S. Marshals Service. As part of the inquiry, a security camera was being reviewed, Persichini said.

"We're making some progress," he said.

D.C. police, who were investigating the break-ins and other vandalism, notified the FBI about the theft about 6 a.m. Saturday, authorities said.

According to a police report, someone entered the agent's 2004 Chevy TrailBlazer after punching in the lock on the driver's door. The vehicle was parked in the marina parking lot in the 1000 block of Water Street.

The stolen items included two MP5 machine guns, an MP5 training weapon, two M4 rifles, a .45-caliber semiautomatic weapon, a Remington 870 shotgun, a police radio, bullet-resistant vests, body armor, and a camera and photo lens, according to the police report and the FBI.

Persichini said "technological adjustments" were made so the police radio was no longer functional.

The FBI said that it began investigating the matter Saturday and decided to go public yesterday to announce the $25,000 reward and enlist the public's help.

Other vehicles used by law enforcement officials have been stolen in recent years.

In June 2005, someone swiped the car of Charles H. Ramsey, the police chief at the time, a block from his home in Southwest. "Cars are getting stolen every day," Ramsey said then.

In 2000, an FBI car with weapons was stolen outside a high-rise apartment building in the 800 block of North Pitt Street in Alexandria. In 1997, an ATF agent's car was stolen from a parking lot near Stafford. A gun, two bullet-resistant vests and the agent's credentials were inside.

Guns, Equipment Stolen From FBI Employee's Car (WT)

By Daniel Taylor

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

Guns, ammunition and equipment were stolen from a car registered to the FBI, the bureau announced yesterday.

The car was one of about 20 that were vandalized in a public parking lot in the 1000 block of Water Street Southwest sometime between midnight and 3 a.m. Saturday, the FBI said.

The car belongs to a member of the FBI's Washington field office who lives near the lot, spokeswoman Debbie Weierman said.

The thieves took guns, ammunition and "other FBI technical equipment" from the car, Ms. Weierman said. She would not talk in detail about what the equipment was or what it was used for.

"This employee was a member of a special response team," she said. "He had an operational reason to have all that equipment in there. He's on call 24 hours."

Another car registered to the FBI also was vandalized in the lot, but nothing belonging to the bureau was taken from it.

Ms. Weierman declined to give estimates on the cost of the damage or the value of the stolen guns and equipment.

Police do not know how many people were involved.

"We have some very good leads and we're working on those leads trying to solve this crime as soon as possible," Ms. Weierman said.

She said there was a surveillance camera near the parking lot, but it wasn't operated by the FBI. The Associated Press reported that security cameras captured images of five suspects.

The lot is near the Potomac River waterfront just a few blocks south of the Mall.

The FBI is offering up to $25,000 for information leading to the identification and arrest of the thieves, Ms. Weierman said.

Mitchell Has Strong Words For Baseball Players, Owners (LAT)

By Bill Shaikin, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

He urges them to cooperate with his steroids probe or face the possibility of a new round of Congressional subpoenas

Mark McGwire refused to tell Congress whether he had used steroids. Rafael Palmeiro insisted he never had.

That day in Washington haunts both men, two years later, and the leader of baseball's steroid investigation warned Thursday there could be another day like it. In remarks delivered to club owners and then released publicly, Sen. George Mitchell urged owners and players to cooperate with his probe or face the possibility of a new round of Congressional subpoenas.

"I believe that a report that is not credible and thorough will significantly increase the possibility of action by others, especially if it's the result of a lack of cooperation by the clubs, or by anyone who is or has been involved with baseball," Mitchell said.

McGwire and Palmeiro joined Jose Canseco, Curt Schilling and Sammy Sosa in testifying before the House Government Relations Committee. The new chairman of that committee, Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Los Angeles), said he would not rule out another hearing.

"The use of steroids in professional sports continues to be an issue the committee is interested in," Waxman said, "and we are looking forward to learning more about the progress Sen. Mitchell has made in his investigation."

Under ridicule from some members of Congress and pressure from President Bush, baseball increased the frequency of drug testing and the penalties for positive tests.

Ten months ago, Commissioner Bud Selig directed Mitchell to investigate the history of steroid use. The tougher regimen of drug tests and penalties has not diminished the need for the probe, Mitchell said, citing the results of the recent Hall of Fame election.

McGwire was overwhelmingly rejected by voters, many of whom cited his refusal to discuss steroids with Congress. Palmeiro tested positive for steroids in 2005, several months after he testified he never had used them, and no team signed him last year.

Sosa sat out last year but is close to a deal with the Texas Rangers, so questions surrounding his alleged steroid use figure to resurface when he reports to spring training next month. And, with Barry Bonds 22 home runs from baseball's all-time record, a San Francisco grand jury is investigating whether he committed perjury by testifying he never had knowingly used steroids.

"Whether you think it fair or not, whether you think it justified or not, Major League Baseball has a cloud over its head, and that cloud will just not go away," Mitchell said.

Mitchell's investigators spoke with club officials and former players last year and plan to talk to active players this year. Mitchell cannot force anyone to speak with his investigators. Union spokesman Greg Bouris declined to comment.

Agent Barry Axelrod said he understands the union and management have agreed on guidelines for active players willing to cooperate, but such guidelines have not been distributed. Axelrod said he represents two former players who were asked to speak with Mitchell's investigators last year; one accepted and one declined.

By publicly releasing the contents of a speech delivered privately to owners, one baseball official said Mitchell and Selig wanted to assure the public the investigation remains a priority after 10 months and no report. Mitchell said his staff has "reviewed tens of thousands of documents and conducted hundreds of interviews" but said some clubs have not cooperated.

"Setting up a commission that lacked subpoena power meant either they were going to get 100% cooperation or they would say, 'Our recourse is to go back to Congress,' " Axelrod said. "I don't think it's unexpected the commission would take the stance that they're frustrated."

But another round of baseball hearings would be "a relatively low priority" for a Congress newly controlled by Democrats, said University of Virginia political scientist Larry Sabato.

Sabato said the publicity value of a hearing could not be discounted — "If you have baseball stars on Capitol Hill, you'll have cameras show up," he said — but cautioned the Democrats have more pressing matters.

DOJ_NMG_0118692

"They have much more interest in investigating Iraq and Katrina and 9-11 — and I could list 40 other things — than they would have in baseball," Sabato said.

Mitchell's Remarks (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

Remarks by former Sen. George J. Mitchell at Major League Baseball owners meeting in Phoenix:

The Commissioner asked that I give you an update on our investigation, and I'm pleased to do so.

Nine months ago, in explaining the need for this investigation, the commissioner said that "when it comes to the integrity of this game, an impartial, thorough review is called for and baseball must confront its problems head on."

In the intervening months it's become evident to me that not everyone in baseball agreed with the commissioner's decision.

Some felt that the best course for baseball was to sit tight, to ride it out, to hope that over time interest would decline and the issue would fade away.

Some may still feel that way. But there must be fewer of them this year than there were last year.

If nothing else, the results of the Hall of Fame voting last week, and the reaction to it, offer fresh evidence that this issue will not just fade away.

Whether you think it fair or not, whether you think it justified or not, Major League Baseball has a cloud over its head, and that cloud will not just go away.

It won't go away because the issues are so serious. Since 1990 the use of steroids or other performance-enhancing substances without a valid medical prescription has been a federal crime.

It also is an egregious form of cheating. The principal victims of that cheating are the majority of players who don't cheat. That reality is too often overlooked in discussions about steroids.

Much has been said and written about the adverse effect on the integrity of the game, on the fans, and on the general public. All are important.

But those who are most harmed, those whose careers and livelihoods are put at risk, are the players who don't cheat.

They rely on their talent, skill, and hard work, as should all players.

And a younger generation of aspiring major league players is affected as well, as they are led to believe that, even though baseball currently has a tough drug policy, they cannot succeed without cheating.

The commissioner was right. Baseball must meet this issue head on. A thorough investigation and a credible report are necessary to regain the confidence of the fans, the press, and the Congress, on this issue.

From the reaction I've received from many of them over the past several months, I can tell you that they're interested and they're concerned; they're watching and they're waiting. Some of them don't trust baseball and are skeptical of me.

They should not be and they will not be satisfied with anything other than a thorough, fair, objective, and credible report.

I was not involved in the decision to conduct this investigation. After the decision was made I was asked by the commissioner to conduct it.

I agreed to do so, provided that I have total independence in conducting the investigation and making the report. The commissioner promised that I would and he's been true to his word.

My goal from the outset has been to conduct a thorough and objective investigation. But it also must be fair to all whose reputations are at stake.

I will insist that those who might be adversely affected by this investigation have an opportunity to be heard.

Before my report is completed, I will provide to any person who might be the subject of that report the opportunity to speak with me personally to respond to any allegations.

We have reached out to many persons associated with the game, past and present. And, as I have made clear from the beginning, my door is open to anyone who wants to speak with me about these matters.

I've led and participated in many investigations, as a state prosecutor, as a federal prosecutor, as a United States Senator, and, more recently as the chairman of independent commissions.

Those investigations have involved many subjects, from a wide range of federal and state crimes, to allegations of impropriety in bidding for the Olympic Games, to violence in the Middle East. There is a time-tested process involved. An investigation of the kind in which we're involved must first cast a wide net. This involves, among other things, a detailed review and analysis of documents, and interviews of many witnesses who may have relevant information.

Then, based upon an evaluation of all that information, the individuals who may be involved must be interviewed, and given an opportunity to respond to the allegations and to comment on the evidence supporting those allegations.

We've followed that approach here. As a result, to date we've reviewed tens of thousands of documents and conducted hundreds of interviews.

As you know, many of those we've interviewed so far are employees of the 30 major league clubs.

I assure you, however, that we also have interviewed a large number of other witnesses, including many formerly associated with baseball. Quite a few of these persons have been extremely helpful. These persons love the game and want to do all they can to remove this cloud.

We will talk with many more, and we will seek to interview active players, a process we intend to begin soon.

I recognize that this investigation has been a burden for each of your clubs, and for everyone involved. I regret that. But I hope you recognize that it's inevitable, once the decision to conduct an investigation was made.

Since beginning our work, we have repeatedly taken action to minimize these burdens.

But an investigation by definition requires the review of relevant documents and the questioning of relevant witnesses. The only way to avoid these burdens is to do nothing.

The commissioner was not prepared to take that course, and he was right.

When I took on this responsibility I said that I would follow the evidence wherever it leads, and that in writing my report I will stick to the evidence and let the chips fall where they may. That's what I'm going to do.

I believe it will be in your best interests, and the best interests of baseball, if I can report that I have received full cooperation from your organizations, and from others, in conducting this investigation.

Many have asked when my report will be completed. The pace of this investigation is dictated by the rate at which information is received.

As I said when I spoke to you last year, that depends on you, and on others from whom I'm seeking information. I don't have subpoena power. Unlike the Congress, or other federal and state authorities, I cannot compel cooperation. They can, and if they get involved they will.

I've served in the Senate and as a federal and a state prosecutor, and I can tell you from personal experience: If they get involved, they almost certainly will use their subpoena power and everyone will be forced to cooperate.

Of course, I cannot predict what the Congress, or other federal or state authorities, or anyone else, will do.

But based on a review of recent history, and on many discussions I've had over the past several months, I believe that a report that is not credible and thorough will significantly increase the possibility of action by others, especially if it's the result of a lack of cooperation by the clubs, or by anyone who is or has been involved with baseball.

And if that happens, for everyone involved, the burdens, the risks, the time involved and the resources required will be much greater than they are now.

I don't expect my lack of subpoena power to significantly affect the outcome of this investigation. In the end, I believe we're going to get enough information to be able to issue a comprehensive and credible report.

But it does affect the length of the investigation.

You've read my recent statement that cooperation with our requests for information has been good from some, less good from others.

I recognize that many clubs are not accustomed to large-scale document discovery, so for them this is a new and time-consuming process. And there are serious and credible legal issues which can be and must be resolved.

We're working hard to resolve them.

The commissioner's office has done everything humanly possible to minimize any risks and to protect the clubs, as well as to reduce the burden on the clubs.

I ask you to work with me, in an effort to achieve what I hope is our common goal: a thorough, fair, objective and credible report that is published as soon as possible.

I can tell you that no one wants to finish this more than me. We are proceeding diligently and you have my firm commitment that we will conclude as soon as possible.

Thank you for the effort that you and your organizations have put into this matter, and thank you for having me here today.

I'll be happy to answer your questions, although I hope you'll understand that at this stage I'm not able to discuss the specifics of any of the evidence we've gathered.

Baseball Owners Get Warning On Steroids (WP/AP)

By Andrew Bagnato, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

PHOENIX -- Baseball owners heard a clear warning from former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell on Thursday. Mitchell, who is investigating steroid use in the sport, said the chances of government involvement will "significantly increase" if they don't cooperate with him.

Speaking to owners on the final day of baseball's quarterly meetings, Mitchell said he intends to interview active players and raised the possibility that Congress or other government authorities could compel testimony.

"I believe it will be in your best interests, and the best interests of baseball, if I can report that I have received full cooperation from your organizations, and from others, in conducting this investigation," Mitchell said in remarks that were released to reporters.

Mitchell cited last week's Hall of Fame vote to underscore the importance of his investigation. Mark McGwire was picked on 23.5 percent of ballots _ far below the necessary 75 percent needed for induction. The vote was viewed by many as the first referendum on how history will judge an age when bulked-up players came under suspicion of using performance-enhancing drugs. Baseball didn't ban steroids until after the 2002 season.

"If nothing else, the results of the Hall of Fame voting last week, and the reaction to it, offer fresh evidence that this issue will not just fade away," Mitchell said. "Whether you think it fair or not, whether you think it justified or not, Major League Baseball has a cloud over its head, and that cloud will not just go away."

Mitchell cannot compel testimony. He warned the clubs that Congress or other federal or state authorities which do have subpoena power could get involved.

"I believe that a report that is not credible and thorough will significantly increase the possibility of action by others, especially if it's the result of a lack of cooperation by the clubs, or by anyone else who is or has been involved with baseball," Mitchell said.

The House Oversight and Government Reform Committee held a series of hearings on steroids and pro sports in 2005 and 2006.

"The use of steroids in professional sports continues to be an issue the committee is interested in, and we are looking forward to learning more about the progress Senator Mitchell has made in his investigation," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman, the California Democrat who chairs the committee.

Keith Ausbrook, Republican general counsel for the committee, said he's almost certain Mitchell has not been in contact with the panel recently about this issue.

"We've certainly been very interested in his investigation and what the results are going to be," Ausbrook said. "If he's not getting anywhere, we'll certainly consider whether to re-engage in it."

The players' association declined comment, spokesman Greg Bouris said.

Mitchell did not speak to reporters after addressing owners. He was hired by commissioner Bud Selig last March following more than a year of allegations against Barry Bonds, McGwire and other stars. No timetable was set for Mitchell's report.

Bonds is under investigation by a federal grand jury as to whether he perjured himself when he testified in 2003 in the BALCO steroid distribution case that he hadn't knowingly taken any performance-enhancing drugs.

The San Francisco Giants are negotiating a contract with Bonds, who needs 22 home runs to surpass Hank Aaron's mark of 755. Speaking to reporters at a golf tournament in the Dominican Republic this week, Bonds declined to discuss ongoing negotiations with the Giants, or his reported positive test for amphetamines last year. Giants owner Peter Magowan declined to answer questions about Bonds.

Selig also spoke to the owners about Mitchell's investigation. Asked if he had urged the clubs to cooperate with Mitchell, Selig said, "Urge is probably not strong enough."

"Look, some clubs have been more cooperative than others, but at this stage, I'm not concerned about that," Selig said. "He will have cooperation."

Selig would not say which clubs are lagging in their cooperation. Mitchell acknowledged that teams aren't used to dealing with "large-scale document discovery," which can be time-consuming. But he said his investigation would move faster if clubs cooperated more quickly.

"Many have asked when my report will be completed," he said. "The pace of this investigation is dictated by the rate at which information is received."

Houston owner Drayton McLane said the owners weren't surprised by Mitchell's remarks.

"It's a process that's very complicated, and it's just going to take time to complete," McLane said. "The steroids issues continue to emerge, and the public wants to know. For some reason they want to know more about baseball on steroids than they do football or basketball. So it's certainly focused on this."

During the meeting, Selig also spoke about the free-agent market and singled out the Chicago Cubs and San Francisco Giants, among others, for their spending, one official at the meeting said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the remarks during the session were not intended to be made public. Selig also mentioned the Toronto Blue Jays, the official said.

Selig wouldn't specify what he said to owners about the game's economics.

"We discussed some things, but we do that at every meeting," Selig said.

Tough Talk On Steroids In Baseball (AR)

By Joseph A. Reaves, The Arizona Republic

The Arizona Republic, January 19, 2007

Commissioner orders owners to aid inquiry

Commissioner Bud Selig wrapped up two days of meetings with baseball's owners in Phoenix on Thursday with a fiery call for reluctant clubs to begin cooperating with former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell's nearly yearlong investigation into steroid use in the game.

"The commissioner was very forceful," Houston Astros owner Drayton McLane said with a grin after the final session of the meetings at the Ritz-Carlton in the Camelback Esplanade. "He knew what he needs, and he can be pretty forceful."

Selig's remarks came behind closed doors shortly after Mitchell briefed owners on the status of his slow-moving investigation.

Mitchell told the owners that he and his staff already had reviewed "tens of thousands of documents and conducted hundreds of interviews." But he said the investigation was dragging because "cooperation with our requests for information has been good from some, less good from others."

Mitchell said that if owners don't cooperate, there is a significant chance Congress will step back into the steroid issue.

"I recognize that many clubs are not accustomed to large-scale document discovery, so for them, this is a new and time-consuming process," Mitchell told the owners in remarks released to the media. "And there are serious and credible legal issues which can be and must be resolved.

"I ask you to work with me in an effort to achieve what I hope is our common goal: a thorough, fair, objective and credible report that is published as soon as possible."

Privacy a concern

National concern about the steroid issue rose after the 2006 release of the well-documented book Game of Shadows, which alleged steroid use by several players. Selig then invited and gave free rein to Mitchell to investigate drugs in baseball.

Several owners have balked at Mitchell's request for detailed records from their trainers and team medical personnel, citing privacy rights.

"If there was a reliable way to redact the documents and satisfy the requests, then I'd be happy to do that," one club's representative to the meetings said. "But, so far, we haven't been able to do that."

One other objection, he said, was that Mitchell is intent on naming names in his report, "so what we'll end up with is a few guys getting caught and who knows how many others going unnamed."

The players union has refused to cooperate with Mitchell's efforts, also citing privacy reasons, and urged any member contacted by investigators to consult not one, but two lawyers: a private attorney and one from the union.

In his published remarks, Mitchell said his investigators plan "to begin soon" seeking to "interview active players."

Congress could act

Mitchell did not speak to reporters after his private briefing but warned in his remarks that unless owners are more cooperative, they run the risk of Congress intervening to subpoena witnesses. As a private investigator, Mitchell does not have subpoena power.

"Unlike the Congress, or other federal and state authorities, I cannot compel cooperation," he said. "(But) they can, and if they get involved, they will.

"I believe a report that is not credible and thorough will significantly increase the possibility of action by others, especially if it's the result of a lack of cooperation by the clubs, or by anyone else who is or has been involved with baseball."

A lawyer for the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, which held hearings on steroids and professional sports in 2005 and 2006, told the Associated Press he was almost certain Mitchell had not contacted the panel about possible subpoenas.

But the attorney, Keith Ausbrook, said lawmakers are closely following the investigation.

"If he's not getting anywhere, we'll certainly consider where to re-engage in it," Ausbrook told the wire service in Washington.

The players union refused comment on Mitchell's remarks.

No timeline for report

Selig met with a small group of reporters after the meetings broke up and said he is comfortable with the pace of the investigation.

"Look, some clubs have been more cooperating than others," Selig said, not naming names. "But at this stage, I'm not concerned about that. We will have cooperation."

Asked if he urged teams to cooperate when he spoke after Mitchell's briefing, the commissioner turned uncharacteristically steely-eyed and said, "Urged is not strong enough."

"He was pretty firm," one team representative acknowledged. "I wouldn't call it a dressing down, by any means, but he was certainly firm."

Mitchell told the owners that when he agreed to head the investigation, he "would follow the evidence wherever it leads, and that in writing my report, I will stick to the evidence and let the chips fall where they may. That's what I am going to do."

Neither Mitchell nor the commissioner gave any indication how far off that report might be. But neither gave any indication it would be anytime soon.

"I've always believed it's better to get things done right than to get them done fast," Selig said.

"In this case, there's no timeline because there's no history for this. The senator has a very able group of people working with him and for him. And he'll get it done as fast as he can."

Owners' Aid Sought In Steroids Inquiry (BSUN)

By Jeff Barker, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, January 19, 2007

Mitchell urges 'full cooperation'

Former Sen. George Mitchell urged baseball owners today to cooperate with his investigation into players' steroid use, saying Congress might force witnesses to testify later if they don't do so voluntarily now.

"I believe it will be in your best interests, and the best interests of baseball, if I can report that I have received full cooperation from your organizations, and from others, in conducting this investigation," Mitchell said in prepared remarks he made to owners in Phoenix and that Major League Baseball posted on its Web site.

Congress has what Mitchell lacks -- the power to issue subpoenas if players balk at appearing, as some did when the House Government Reform Committee held a steroids hearing in March 2005.

At that hearing, former slugger Mark McGwire damaged his reputation by declining to answer questions about whether he used steroids or other performance-enhancing drugs during his career. Then-Oriole Rafael Palmeiro, who tested positive for steroids in August 2005, famously shook his finger at the same hearing and denied using the drugs.

In today's remarks, Mitchell suggested that baseball, which unsuccessfully challenged the committee's subpoena power in 2005, would be wise to avoid tangling with Congress again. If a governmental entity gets involved, Mitchell warned, "the burdens, the risks, the time involved and the resources required will be much greater than they are now."

The committee that held the McGwire-Palmeiro hearing appears at least as concerned about baseball issues today as it was in 2005, perhaps more so.

With the recent Democratic takeover of the House, the panel has changed its name to the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform and is chaired by Rep. Henry Waxman, a Californian who initiated the 2005 hearing by writing a letter to then-chairman Tom Davis, a Virginia Republican.

In a statement today, Waxman said: "The use of steroids in professional sports continues to be an issue the committee is interested in, and we're looking forward to learning more about the progress Senator Mitchell has made in his investigation."

Mitchell made his plea to the owners as he prepares to interview active players, a task that could meet with resistance.

The former Maine Democratic senator began his probe nine months ago after commissioner Bud Selig said: "When it comes to the integrity of this game, an impartial, thorough review is called for and baseball must confront its problems head on."

Mitchell said today that baseball "still has a cloud" over its head.

"If nothing else, the results of the Hall of Fame voting last week, and the reaction to it, offer fresh evidence that this issue will not just fade away," Mitchell said, apparently referring to voters shunning McGwire.

The steroids issue is particularly sensitive for baseball because San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds, alleged in a book by two San Francisco Chronicle reporters to have used the drugs, needs just 22 home runs to eclipse Hank Aaron's all-time mark.

Congress May Probe Baseball Steroids, Mitchell Says (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Danielle Sessa

Bloomberg, January 19, 2007

Jan. 18 (Bloomberg) -- Former Senator George Mitchell told Major League Baseball owners that the U.S. Congress might get involved with a steroids investigation if teams don't cooperate with his own probe.

Mitchell, appointed by baseball Commissioner Bud Selig in March to investigate steroid use, said the federal government would use subpoena power he lacks to force them to talk.

``I believe that a report that is not credible and thorough will significantly increase the possibility of action by others, especially if it's the result of a lack of cooperation by the clubs, or by anyone who is or has been involved with baseball," Mitchell said in a statement at the owners' meetings in Arizona.

Selig asked Mitchell to examine past use of performance- enhancing drugs in baseball after a book raised new allegations about Barry Bonds using steroids and other muscle builders, which Bonds has denied. Mitchell said last month his probe would take longer than he expected because of a lack of cooperation from people he didn't identify.

Selig said he asked Mitchell to address the owners at their quarterly meetings today in Phoenix, and encouraged the clubs to work with the Democrat from Maine, a former Senate majority leader.

``Urge is probably not strong enough" of a word to describe what he told the owners, Selig said in a session with reporters after the meeting. ``Some clubs have been more cooperative than others, but at this stage I am not concerned about that. He will have cooperation."

Mitchell said he's conducted hundreds of interviews during his 10-month investigation and soon will try to talk with active players.

Legal Help

Players union spokesman Greg Bouris declined comment. Union chief Don Fehr instructed players in June not to talk to Mitchell without legal representation.

Baseball and its union strengthened the drug policy twice in 2005 under pressure from Congress, which threatened to pass legislation mandating testing and penalties in major professional sports.

Mike Reynard, a spokesman for Senator Jim Bunning, a Kentucky Republican and Hall of Fame pitcher who sponsored the bill, declined to comment on Mitchell's remarks. A spokesman for Representative Henry Waxman, a California Democrat who led a steroids inquiry in 2005, didn't immediately respond to an e- mails seeking comment.

``We have cooperated and hopefully everybody else will," Chicago White Sox owner Jerry Reinsdorf said.

Mitchell pointed to results of the last week's Hall of Fame voting as an indication that the steroid cloud over baseball won't fade away. Mark McGwire, whose 583 career home runs are tainted by steroid suspicions, received 23.5 percent of the vote, less than a third of what's needed for induction.

A lack of cooperation would further extend the length of the investigation, Mitchell said.

``It will be in your best interests, and the best interests of baseball, if I can report that I have received full cooperation from your organizations, and from others, in conducting this investigation," Mitchell said.

Drug Ring Leader Gets Life Sentence (CINE)

By Dan Horn, Dhorn@enquirer.com

The Cincinnati Enquirer, January 19, 2007

Clarence “The General” Remble left Los Angeles for Ohio several years ago to run a drug trafficking network.

He’ll spend the rest of his life in prison instead.

A federal judge imposed the life sentence Thursday after prosecutors described him as the ringleader of a gang that operated in Middletown, Zanesville and other southern Ohio communities. A jury convicted Remble in July of conspiracy to distribute narcotics.

Rather than target Cincinnati or larger cities, prosecutors say, Remble and other gang members tried to build up their drug network in smaller towns.

They recruited a few fellow gang members from California and Louisiana, but most of the 20 people charged in the case were from Ohio.

“We believe what this group was trying to do was establish a stronghold in smaller communities,” said FBI spokesman Michael Brooks. “They were set up to pretty much control narcotics trafficking in those areas.”

The FBI investigated the case with police and sheriff’s departments in Middletown, Butler County, Coshocton, Muskingum County, the Ohio State Highway Patrol and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service.

“The distribution network headed by Clarence Remble has been completely disrupted,” Brooks said.

Nineteen others have been convicted of drug charges and all but two have now been sentenced. Because federal drug laws are tougher than most state laws, many of those sentences were for 10 years or more. Remble is the only one to receive a life sentence.

Brooks said the Dodge City Crips are an offshoot of the Crips street gang.

He said the southern Ohio operation supplied, distributed and manufactured crack cocaine and methamphetamine.

The FBI arrested Remble in July 2005 after tracking a shipment of 44 pounds of cocaine from California to southern Ohio, prosecutors say.

Druglord Sentenced To Life In Prison (MIDJOUR)

By Dave Greber, Staff Writer

Middletown (OH) Journal, January 19, 2007

CINCINNATI — The leader of a street gang charged in a major drug ring that stretched from Middletown to Los Angeles will spend the rest of his life in prison.

Clarence Remble, 37, of Long Beach, Calif., was found guilty on charges of manufacturing and distributing a controlled substance and conspiracy in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati for his leadership role in the Dodge City Crips, who moved drugs from Ohio to California.

Remble is one of 20 people who have been arrested and charged in a major drug bust that was coordinated by the FBI, Middletown Division of Police and several other law enforcement agencies.

The joint federal, state and local investigation in Middletown began in January 2005, spearheaded by the local department.

To date, 18 of the 20 individuals involved in the drug ring have been convicted. Ten local residents were charged with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute methamphetamine, crack cocaine and marijuana and other crimes in connection with the investigation.

WeHo Demonstrators Protest Pot Raids (LAT)

By Tami Abdollah, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

About 100 people demonstrated outside West Hollywood City Hall this morning, protesting a series of federal raids that shut 11 outlets for medical marijuana in the county.

According to William Dolphin, a spokesman for Americans for Safe Access, the demonstration began about 8:30 a.m. and lasted for some 30 minutes.

Federal agents Wednesday raided the 11 medical marijuana outlets in Los Angeles County, seizing several thousand pounds of processed drug, hundreds of marijuana plants, an array of guns and bagfuls of cash.

The simultaneous raids, part of an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, were the largest such operation in the county in recent memory. Five dispensaries in West Hollywood were raided with the other six in Venice, Hollywood, Sherman Oaks and Woodland Hills.

The action by federal agents angered some local officials and was taken despite a state law permitting possession and cultivation of marijuana for qualified medical patients.

Officials said that more than 20 people were detained for questioning but no charges have been filed. Authorities would not release information about any other people possibly detained at the dispensaries.

Sarah Pullen, spokeswoman for the DEA's Los Angeles field division, said agents seized large quantities of marijuana-laced edibles that included "anything from ice cream bars to lollipops to cookies to candies and candy bars."

In West Hollywood, agents in bulletproof vests, sunglasses, gloves and face masks piled out of the stores — four of which were on Santa Monica Boulevard — with boxes and black trash bags full of seized evidence while protesters booed and shouted, "State's rights!" and "DEA go away!" among other slogans.

At the Farmacy, agents loaded three cars with bags as amateur documentary filmmakers and medical marijuana users pushed against police tape. The raid and protest clogged traffic, and motorists honked their horns to show support for the demonstrators.

In all, Pullen said, agents seized more than 100 boxes of evidence and continued their work past 10 p.m.

West Hollywood officials said they were taken by surprise, only learning of the raids as they occurred. West Hollywood has a "long-standing commitment" to the use of medical marijuana for people with such catastrophic illnesses as HIV and AIDS, city spokeswoman Helen Goss said.

"We've been fighting to support the access of medicinal marijuana for many, many years and there's just a great disconnect between the federal government and communities like West Hollywood," Councilman Jeffrey Prang said. "Medicinal marijuana provides comfort and relief to people who are seriously ill and seemingly they view those people as drug addicts who belong in jail as opposed to people who deserve compassion and assistance."

The West Hollywood sheriff's station was notified of the impending raids about 1:30 p.m., one hour before they began, Los Angeles County Sheriff's Lt. David Smith said. Deputies moved in to help control about 50 protesters who gathered in the 7800 block of Santa Monica Boulevard near three of the stores.

California voters approved Proposition 215, the Compassionate Use Act, in 1996, which made marijuana available by prescription for medicinal uses. SB 420, which took effect in 2004, clarified Proposition 215, and taken together legalized possession and cultivation of marijuana for qualified medical patients.

According to Pullen, neighboring businesses and residents had complained about a significant number of the dispensaries, and there had been increased reports of crime in the areas around the outlets.

"Anyone in possession, selling or distributing marijuana is in violation of federal law and subject to prosecution," she said.

"There are hundreds of thousands of patients in California who need safe and reliable access to a medication that their doctors recommend they use and these raids are an example of the federal government going out of its way to interfere with the lives of patients," countered Steph Sherer, founder of Americans for Safe Access, a national advocacy group for medical marijuana use, based in Oakland.

"I think if California has a problem with our law, that our courts and our law enforcement should handle it," she said. "We have no need for the federal government to come and interfere."

The raids came on the heels of separate actions taken Tuesday by the West Hollywood City Council and the Los Angeles Police Commission.

The council Tuesday unanimously approved an ordinance establishing permanent regulations on medicinal marijuana dispensaries, capping the number in the city at four.

The Police Commission, meanwhile, voted to support a moratorium on new marijuana dispensaries in Los Angeles and for tougher regulations of existing enterprises. Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton pledged to work with federal authorities to prosecute businesses found to be violating the law.

Richard Eastman, a pro-medical marijuana activist who said he was diagnosed with AIDS in 1995, said he was horrified by the raids. Some of the pills he takes to fight his illness, Eastman said, "take away my appetite, but the marijuana keeps me eating."

As a result of the raids, Eastman estimated that perhaps 2,000 people who ordinarily would buy marijuana for medical purposes "won't be able to get their medicine tomorrow. And it's not like they can go to Sav-On or Thrifty."

The owner of one of the raided dispensaries said Wednesday that she was saddened that people will not be able to have the freedom of choice to use medical marijuana.

"We abide by state and local ordinances, and state laws, in providing a service to patients because they have the legal right by state Legislature to be able to make the choice of having medical marijuana as their choice of therapy," the dispensary owner said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

DEA Raids 11 Pot Clubs (LADN)

By Rachel Uranga, Staff Writer

Los Angeles Daily News, January 19, 2007

Police chief says dispensaries prey on teenagers

The Drug Enforcement Administration raided 11 medical marijuana dispensaries across Los Angeles on Wednesday, including five in the San Fernando Valley.

The raids came a day after Los Angeles Police Chief William Bratton denounced the storefront medicinal clinics as crime magnets that have begun to prey on teenagers - including passing out fliers at Grant High School in Van Nuys this past summer - and called for a moratorium on the facilities.

"(These) enforcement operations send a message to these drug traffickers," said Sarah Pullen, a DEA special agent. "The DEA will continue to conduct these enforcement operations and keep our community safe by enforcing federal drug laws."

Under a 1996 state ballot measure, the clinics can distribute doctor-prescribed marijuana to relieve anything from anxiety to nausea to acute pain. But federal officials consider all marijuana use illegal.

The number of clinics has exploded from five in 2005 to 143 by the end of last year. Bratton said many of the clinics are lucrative operations aimed at recreational users.

Bratton and Councilman Dennis Zine have backed rules banning dispensaries within 1,000 feet of any school, day-care facility, church or other house of worship.

While several medical marijuana activists support some regulation, they say the federal raids unfairly harm patients.

"It's disgusting in this day and age, when cities and counties are moving to regulate medical marijuana, that the federal government would still be busting people," said Don Duncan, Southern California coordinator for the Americans for Safe Access, a national medical marijuana advocacy group.

This week, the Los Angeles Police Commission released a report that found about half of all the city's marijuana clubs were in the Valley. The report found increased robberies and aggravated assaults around clubs near Van Nuys and more citizen complaints.

Wednesday's Pot Raids Prompt Protest In WeHo (CBS2)

CBS 2, January 19, 2007

(CBS) WEST HOLLYWOOD, Calif. A demonstration outside West Hollywood City Hall Thursday protested federal raids on 11 medical marijuana dispensaries in Los Angeles County.

Federal authorities do not recognize the California law that allows patients with a doctor's prescription to have marijuana, an ordinance approved by voters in 1996 as Proposition 215.

William Dolphin, a spokesman for the Oakland-based pro-medical marijuana group Americans for Safe Access, said the gathering was an "angry and concerned protest."

"Whenever we see these kinds of coordinated and simultaneous raids ... clearly the idea is to intimidate and frighten," Dolphin said.

In West Hollywood, marijuana outlets were raided at 7828, 7825, 7901 and 8464 Santa Monica Blvd., and at 8921 Sunset Blvd. During Wednesday's raids, about 50 protesters shadowed DEA agents, who wore body armor, helmets and face masks as they carted away evidence.

Six other stores were raided, including four in the San Fernando Valley, one in Hollywood and one in Venice, said Sarah Pullen of the DEA.

Pullen said that about 20 people were detained. She did not have immediate numbers regarding possible arrests or how much marijuana was seized.

Los Angeles County has an estimated 200 marijuana outlets.

The Los Angeles Police Commission voted Tuesday to support a moratorium on new marijuana outlets, and police Chief William Bratton pledged to work with federal authorities to close the dispensaries.

Ralph Partridge, who heads the Drug Enforcement Administration office in Los Angeles, said the raids showed that the storefront operations are "nothing more than drug trafficking organizations bringing criminal activities to our neighborhoods and drugs near our children and schools."

The West Hollywood City Council voted Tuesday night to strengthen restrictions on marijuana outlets, but some council members have sympathized with those who contend they need pot as medicine.

"The city of West Hollywood has had a long-standing commitment to the compassionate use of medical marijuana for those persons who are facing catastrophic illnesses," City Manager Paul Arevalo said.

DEA Raids Medical Marijuana Centers (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

Federal agents in California and Washington state have raided several medical marijuana distribution centers, seizing thousands of pounds of the drug, marijuana-laced edibles, weapons and cash. There were no arrests.

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) Special Agent in Charge Ralph W. Partridge, who heads the agency's Los Angeles field office, said his agents served 11 federal search warrants yesterday at marijuana distribution centers located throughout Los Angeles County, including five locations in West Hollywood, four in the San Fernando Valley, as well as locations in Hollywood and Venice.

"Today's enforcement operations show that these establishments are nothing more than drug-trafficking organizations bringing criminal activities to our neighborhoods and drugs near our children and schools," Mr. Partridge said.

He described the investigation as ongoing, adding that "leads are being actively pursued and developed."

In California, according to the DEA, there is no state regulation or standard of the cultivation or distribution of medical marijuana. The state leaves the establishment of any guidelines to local jurisdictions, which can vary widely.

The DEA and its local and state counterparts routinely have said that large-scale drug traffickers hide behind and invoke California's Proposition 215, even when there is no evidence of any medical claim. Prop. 215 created an exemption from criminal penalties for medical use of marijuana. But it does not legalize marijuana; it only changes how medical patients and their "primary caregivers" will be treated by the state's court system.

The DEA said high-level traffickers often pose as caregivers and are able to sell illegal drugs with impunity.

Drug-enforcement agents also raided the Everett, Wash., headquarters of an advocacy group for medical marijuana patients, confiscating what police documents said were more than 1,000 marijuana plants and computers whose owners said contain personal information on 200 people authorized to use the drug for medicinal purposes.

Detective Roy Alloway, assigned to the federally funded West Sound Narcotics Enforcement Team, discounted assertions by spokesmen for the group that the center was designed as a source for medicinal marijuana only. He told the Associated Press the site was a drug-dealing enterprise, adding that it was "absurd" to think that the number of plants there would be covered by a medicinal marijuana medical authorization.

Washington law allows possession of marijuana in doctor-approved cases but makes no provision for obtaining it.

Agents Raid Medical Marijuana Advocacy Office (SEAPI)

By Casey Mcnerthney And Claudia Rowe, P-I REPORTERS

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, January 19, 2007

Plants, computers and cash seized in Everett

Drug enforcement agents raided the Everett headquarters of an advocacy group for medical marijuana patients, confiscating what police documents say was more than 1,000 plants and computers that the owners say contain personal information of about 200 men and women authorized to use the drug for medicinal purposes.

So far, no one has been arrested or charged with a crime.

Fearful of potential repercussions and unsure of the officers' ultimate aim, patients in the CannaCare network of marijuana users have been "laying low," said one, terrified that they may be prosecuted for using a substance authorized by their physicians.

"Who knows what they're doing with our information?" said Steve Newman, who has multiple sclerosis and has been associated with CannaCare for two years. "It makes me concerned -- really, really concerned. But we're pretty helpless. Nobody can say much about it."

A detective assigned to the federally funded West Sound Narcotics Enforcement Team, which launched Friday's raid, scoffed at the notion that CannaCare -- run out of the home of medical marijuana advocate Steve Sarich -- was anything other than a drug-dealing enterprise.

Detective Roy Alloway said it was "absurd" to think that the number of plants Sarich was tending would be covered by his medical authorization.

"It's clear that Sarich is a guy that's selling drugs," said Alloway, who noted that state law allows no more than a 60-day supply of marijuana for medical use.

The amount found in Sarich's home, he said, was "not even close."

Long a thorn in the side of law enforcement for his vocal, thumb-in-the-eye advocacy style, Sarich, 56, insists that the government is merely harassing patients -- himself included -- who have a legitimate right to use the drug for managing pain due to multiple sclerosis, cancer and a host of other illnesses.

Washington voters approved the use of marijuana for certain medical conditions through a citizens initiative in 1998.

"Since they don't like medical marijuana, this is an attack on the people that support it," said Sarich, who insists he's no drug dealer. The nominal sums CannaCare collects go into supporting medical marijuana users, he said.

Only a few ounces of pot were found in the raid, and Sarich said the bulk of the seized crop was unrooted cuttings and starter plants. He also said the $1,020 drug agents seized in the raid was for his $1,103.56 Snohomish County PUD bill.

The raid's ultimate end remains unclear. Alloway said he referred the information to federal authorities because of the pot-growing operation's size.

Jeff Eig, spokesman for the Seattle division of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, declined to comment.

Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times reported on its Web site that the DEA said federal agents had raided 11 medical marijuana outlets in Los Angeles on Wednesday and seized several thousand pounds of marijuana, along with weapons and money.

Washington law allows possession of marijuana in doctor-approved cases but makes no provision for obtaining it, forcing patients who cannot grow enough to buy from others -- sometimes resorting to patronizing street-corner dealers.

Sarich, however, has flouted the statute by announcing that CannaCare will provide pot plants to patients. He and an associate, John Worthington, whose Renton home was also raided last week, said the police action was politically motivated retaliation.

Sarich also believes that because the state has no list of registered medical marijuana patients, CannaCare was targeted because it has contact information for more than 1,200 users.

That incursion into patient privacy worries advocates at the American Civil Liberties Union at least as much as the bust itself.

Alison Chin Holcomb, director of the Washington ACLU's Marijuana Education Project, said Sarich might have forced the government into it.

"He certainly wasn't afraid of getting the attention of law enforcement," she said. "He put himself out there on the radar."

Worthington recently sent documents alleging drug-enforcement excesses by Alloway to the state House and Senate judiciary and health care committees. He sent another letter to the State Patrol, accusing the detective of tampering with evidence.

"They went after me because I'm an activist, and I've been terrorized out of growing," said Worthington, whose home contained six marijuana plants, according to a Kitsap County Sheriff's Office document. "I can't have my kids frisked like they're criminals. That was disgusting. I'm not Al Capone -- I'm a dad."

Alloway, who works for the Bremerton Police Department, denied the allegations of wrongdoing on Wednesday.

Local Drug Unit Raids Medical Marijuana Organization (KS)

Kitsap Sun, January 18, 2007

Drug detectives from the Kitsap-based West Sound Narcotics Enforcement Team seized about 1,500 marijuana plants from an Everett-based medicinal marijuana group Friday, in what will likely become a marquee case for the state's medical marijuana law.

The headquarters of Cannacare, whose mission is to be a "support group" for the state's medical marijuana users, was searched by the drug unit after WestNET detectives received a search warrant signed by a Kitsap County Superior Court Judge.

The seizure has angered Cannacare's members, who believe federal authorities are attempting to undermine the state's medical marijuana law, passed as an initiative by Washington voters in 1998.

"Rather than arresting the Director of CannaCare, Steve Sarich, and prosecuting him under the Washington State Medical Marijuana law as a patient, the Drug Enforcement Agency was called in to prosecute under federal law," said a blog entry under Cannacare's MySpace site.

Carlos Rodriguez, the sergeant in charge of WestNET, said issues concerning federal and state laws are irrelevant because what Sarich and CannaCare are suspected of doing is illegal.

Rodriguez said the Washington state law allows for a "60-day supply" and a maximum of 27 plants, if the plants are in different stages of life.

"But 1,500 plants for one person is ridiculous," Rodriguez said. "And you're not allowed (under the law) to sell it."

The case is being examined by the federal Drug Enforcement Administration. Charges against Sarich, who was not arrested in the raid, and other CannaCare members may be coming.

Computer registries with records of supposed medicinal marijuana patients were also seized, according to the search affidavit.

Agents Raid Medical Marijuana Grower (KING)

By Rob Piercy, KING 5 News

KING-TV, January 19, 2007

EVERETT, Wash. - Investigators raided members of a medical marijuana advocacy group called Canna Care, saying it was the home of a big-time drug dealer.

DOJ_NMG_0118705

But resident Steve Sarich said it's a home of compassion, where cannabis plants are sprouted and given to people who are sick so they can grow their own medical marijuana.

"A lot of them bed ridden or in wheelchairs," Sarich said. "They can't go down to University Avenue and buy a bag off the street."

When he's not tending plants at his "medicinal nursery," Sarich and a friend have also been investigating what they call "unlawful and terrorist raids" conducted by drug task force groups on medical marijuana users.

"If they don't grow, they don't have any medication," he said. "If they do grow, these local drug task forces come in and raid them and terrorize them."

A few days after submitting their investigation to state leaders, agents raided Steve's home Friday. They confiscated hundreds of seedlings, saying it was a major grow-and-sell operation.

Steve said he has a doctor's medical authorization for a 60-day supply.

"A plant this big, that's not in flower, is a zero-day supply of medication," he said. "Whether you have one of them or 5000 of them, it's still a zero day supply of medication."

He says the real reason for the raid was the investigation of task force groups like West Net, the one that raided his house.

"It's a ridiculous claim -- it suggests that I would have a vendetta against someone I don't know," said West Net detective Roy Alloway.

Manhattan: Heroin Ring Arrests (NYT)

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

Three people have been extradited and charged with participating in an international heroin-smuggling operation, federal prosecutors said yesterday. The three, Yaya Yahayai, 50; Henry Sichone, 42; and Andrew Sarpong, 33, are charged with involvement in a smuggling operation that bought heroin in Thailand and moved it through various routes to cities in the United States, including New York, said Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney in Manhattan. Mr. Garcia said the ring recruited couriers who smuggled heroin by swallowing it or using false compartments in suitcases.

For Two Brothers, Colombia's War Is Family Affair (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

BOGOTÁ, Colombia -- Roberto and Guillermo Sáenz were the youngest and middle of seven children born to conservative schoolteachers half a century ago. As a war between the army and Marxist guerrillas gathered force, Roberto recalls being sheltered by Guillermo and his other siblings in a childhood full of "studying, fútbol and fiestas."

Then when Roberto was entering the university and Guillermo was nearing graduation, Guillermo broke some news. " 'Man, I don't see any sense in all of this,' " Roberto recalls his brother saying. " 'I'm going.' " Guillermo fled into the jungle to join the largest leftist guerrilla group, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, eventually rising to the rank of "ideological leader" of the seven-member ruling secretariat. Today, he's one of the most wanted men in the Americas, with a price on his head of $2 million from the Colombian government and $5 million from the U.S.

Roberto pursued a political career, one that brought him to a quite different leadership position: He's the designated peacemaker for the government of this capital city. The municipal agency he heads, the Reconciliation Network, works in Bogotá's barrios promoting nonviolent solutions to social conflicts, holding candlelight vigils and petition drives, encouraging young people to express their opinions peaceably in graffiti art and rap music. "Our mission is showing that creative protest is more effective than picking up a gun," says Roberto, who is 50 years old.

Millions of Colombian families find themselves divided by the country's interminable conflict, but few are at such odds as the Sáenz brothers. While Roberto collects signatures to put a disarmament referendum on the ballot, Guillermo, 58, faces criminal charges from the Colombian government of blowing up pipelines and bombing villages. While Roberto manages a program to aid families of those kidnapped by the FARC, Guillermo is charged with masterminding abductions. While Roberto uses politics, sports and music to try keeping youths out of the orbit of violent drug traffickers, Guillermo faces a U.S. indictment alleging that he helped "set the FARC's cocaine [trafficking] policies" and arranged the murder of hundreds of people who got in his way. The indictment handed up in Washington last March accused 50 senior FARC guerrillas of shipping cocaine valued at more than $25 billion to the U.S. and other countries.

'Wrong Path'

Roberto says he tried -- without success -- to get Guillermo to renounce violence in their last meeting back in 1991, when FARC leaders left the jungle for peace talks with the government held in Caracas, Venezuela. "To my brother, I say, 'I hope you're in good health and don't have problems' " Roberto says. "But to the guerrilla, I say, 'Give up this war because it's the wrong path.' "

Though Roberto says he hasn't tried to contact Guillermo since their meeting 16 years ago, he has found that having a rebel comandante in the family is a hard thing for an antiviolence activist to live down. "Even though in Colombia nobody gets surprised by anything anymore," the newsweekly Semana said last year, Roberto's position "doesn't fail to attract attention." Roberto believes his phones are tapped by intelligence operatives hoping for some clue that could lead them to Guillermo, who is generally referred to by Colombians, including Roberto himself, by his nom de guerre, Alfonso Cano.

In revenge for abductions carried out by Guillermo, another Sáenz brother, José Ricardo, was kidnapped in 1996 by right-wing paramilitaries, which oppose the guerrillas and are involved in drug trafficking and other criminal activities. The kidnappers had intended to seize Roberto, he says, but he had already left Colombia for a diplomatic post in Europe after getting death threats. Hoping to win his brother's release, Guillermo, from hiding, issued a statement saying José Ricardo, a teacher, had no links to the FARC. "My intense fraternal pain is mingled with the pain of many Colombians wearied by similar or worse tragedies," Guillermo wrote. José Ricardo was freed after eight months in captivity.

The family drama doesn't seem to have shaken Guillermo's revolutionary fervor. In position papers and interviews with Colombian journalists over the years, he has maintained that violence is justified because of inequities that are built into Colombia's economic and political systems. "We guerrillas have been obliged to take up arms to find peace," Guillermo once wrote. "It's the great contradiction and a terrible truth."

Peacemaking Tradition

Roberto allows that while violence is one truth in Colombia, the country also has a peacemaking tradition that is often overlooked. He and Bogotá's leftist mayor, Luis Eduardo Garzón, set up the Reconciliation Network in 2005 to train people for making peace even as a military boot camp would train people for making war.

In classes the Reconciliation Network has started offering for community leaders, there are lessons about Colombia's pacifist Páez Indians, who once halted a firefight between guerrillas and rural police by walking into the no man's land carrying only ceremonial palm staffs. In addition, the Network encourages activities such as Golombiao -- a variation of soccer pioneered by other peace-promoting groups -- with a scorekeeping system that weighs teamwork and respect for opponents, as well as the number of goals put in the net. Teams must be coed and, for it to count, the first goal must be scored by a female player.

The Network also helps run a protest and public-information campaign to press conservative President Álvaro Uribe to swap FARC prisoners held by the government for hostages held by the guerrillas. Deyanira Ortiz, whose husband, an ex-legislator, was kidnapped by the FARC five years ago and is still missing, doesn't hold Roberto's brother against him. "Colombia is an odd place," Mrs. Ortiz says. "It's possible for a single family to produce a soldier, a priest and a guerrilla. We all appreciate Mr. Sáenz's support."

The Network's staff of 16 social workers, from philosophy graduates to ex-guerrillas who now renounce violence, work on projects in rough neighborhoods like Ciudad Bolívar. In 2005, paramilitary gangs murdered 150 Bolívar youths who violated their curfews and other directives. "Nice kids go to bed early," read the chilling paramilitary graffiti, "and those that don't, we'll put to bed."

The Network's man in the barrio, Jairo Vargas, worked with youths and community leaders on a campaign of marches, late-night parties held in defiance of curfews and painting sessions in which youths covered paramilitary graffiti with murals. The number of youth killings in Bolívar fell to just 40 last year.

Bolívar young people like 16-year-old Jhon Castro are enlisting in the nonviolent cause. About a year ago, Jhon's best friend was killed by paramilitaries. But rather than seeking vengeance, Jhon says he channeled his anger into a Network protest last September aimed at getting a local university to admit more poor youths, who otherwise might be drawn to armed gangs. The first couple of days no one noticed the demonstration involving scores of students. Then they brought in a rapper and a sound system. "It was still a nonviolent protest -- just much louder," Jhon says. In no time, the university dean came out to cut a deal expanding access to poor students.

Guillermo, however, continues to cast a shadow over Roberto's peacemaking efforts. With President Uribe escalating the offensive against the guerrillas, Roberto has to deal with refugees streaming to Bogotá from war-torn provinces like Tolima -- the very operating area of the Central Bloc of the FARC that Guillermo helps command.

Last month, the army announced that it had killed a guerrilla fighter who had been Guillermo's chief bodyguard and was on the trail of the comandante himself. Roberto says both his parents died resigned to the path Guillermo had taken, and Roberto himself holds out little hope for a late-life conversion. "He'll likely die fighting," says Roberto.

TAX:

Holed-Up Tax Protester, Wife Convicted (FINDLAW/AP)

By Philip Elliott, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 19, 2007

(AP) - CONCORD, N.H.-A man who has holed up with armed supporters in his cement-walled house for most of his tax evasion trial was found guilty Thursday, along with his wife, of failing to pay federal income taxes for a decade.

Ed Brown has said he will defend himself against capture if necessary.

U.S. Marshal Stephen Monier said Thursday that members of his staff continued talking by telephone with Brown and had no plans to confront him.

Ed Brown's wife, Elaine, a dentist who earned most of the couple's income, has been staying with a son in Massachusetts and attended the trial.

The Browns, of Plainfield, contend the law does not require them to pay federal income tax, while the government says the Browns owe more than $625,000. The Browns stopped paying income taxes in 1996 and stopped filing returns in 1998, a prosecutor said. They could each face decades in prison.

A jury decided they employed a scheme to hide their income and avoid taxes in part by using postal money orders in increments just below the reporting threshold to pay for their hilltop compound. Courts have routinely rejected similar attempts by other taxpayers.

Marshals now have to consider how to seize the Browns' assets. The jury was deliberating whether the Browns should lose their home.

"We've established a good line of communication, all of our conversations have been amicable and friendly, and that's how we expect they will continue," Monier said.

Ed Brown stopped attending court midway through the trial, which began Jan. 9. His wife remains out on bail pending the couple's April 24 sentencing; she has said she loves her husband, but that his way of handling the case is not hers.

A man who answered the telephone at the Browns' house Thursday afternoon said Ed Brown could not come to the phone, but had expected a guilty verdict.

"He's here at the house, and he's not leaving of his own free will," said the man, who identified himself only as Bernie.

Ed Brown, a retired exterminator, has said he stayed home to protest a system that had already convicted him.

"Most Americans would cower and cringe and raise their hands and surrender like a good little slave," he told reporters at his home this week.

"I won't. Under no circumstances. I do not tolerate cowardliness, oppression, bulliness, and I certainly don't tolerate a federal agency that has absolutely zero jurisdiction in my state, never mind in my county, in my town."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Focus On Broad Challenges Facing Country (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0118708

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — When President Bush delivers his State of the Union address Tuesday, he'll be facing a new audience on an old issue: a Democratic majority in Congress that is strongly opposed to his new plan for the Iraq war.

Explaining the proposal to boost U.S. troop strength by 21,500 in Iraq is a major goal of Bush's speech, said White House press secretary Tony Snow, even as Democrats and some Republicans push forward a non-binding resolution against it.

"We understand it's going to be a skeptical audience," Snow said.

Unlike Bush's prime-time address on Iraq last week, Snow said, the State of the Union "has a large domestic component" that will be crafted to find common ground with the Democrats who control Congress. The agenda includes immigration, education and energy.

The speech will also focus less on a laundry list of specific proposals and promises, as many of these presidential addresses do, and instead focus on broader challenges facing the country.

"A lot of times these speeches, they just go on and on and you lose people," Snow said. "It's better to spend some time focusing on big issues so that people do get a sense of your engagement with them."

Linda Fowler, a government professor at Dartmouth College, said Bush's challenge won't be in convincing the lawmakers gathered in the House chamber Tuesday — it will be gaining public support for his plans on Iraq so he can move on to domestic issues. She said the "deeply unpopular war" in Iraq has sapped Bush's popularity and made it more difficult for him to maneuver politically.

"It really creates barriers for other activity," she said.

Presidents have delivered State of the Union speeches before in difficult times. President Reagan did in 1987, shortly after the Iran-contra scandal broke, and President Clinton did in 1999, in the middle of his impeachment trial. Reagan, however, used his address to talk about winning the Cold War with the Soviet Union, and Clinton enjoyed Gallup Poll approval ratings in 1999 in the high 60s. Bush's overall approval rating was at 34% in last weekend's USA TODAY/Gallup Poll.

Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a senior scholar at the University of Southern California, said Bush needs to discuss issues beyond the war, if only "to show that Iraq is not all encompassing" and that he wants to work with Democrats.

"He can't pass any kind of agenda without reaching out to the majority," she said. "It's legacy time."

Snow did not elaborate on speech details Thursday, but indicated that among other issues the president would discuss global warming as he talks about alternative energy sources.

Bush is also expected to renew his call for a "comprehensive" immigration bill that includes a program for temporary, foreign "guest workers" and tighter border security. Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., and other Republicans object to guest-worker programs. They say the programs provide amnesty for illegal immigrants.

Extending and expanding the No Child Left Behind education law figures to be on the president's agenda, as well as proposals for health savings accounts that carry tax advantages.

Shorter State Of The Union Will Stress Common Ground (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

President Bush on Tuesday will deliver a stripped-down State of the Union address, leaving out the usual laundry list of policy initiatives, and emphasizing common ground with Democrats in a nod to the new political reality on Capitol Hill, the White House said yesterday.

"Some of the old State of the Union formulas have kind of run their course," spokesman Tony Snow said.

"Part of the calculation here is that a lot of times these speeches, they just go on and on and you lose people," Mr. Snow said. "It's better to spend some time focusing on big issues so that people do get a sense of your engagement with them, and there will be opportunities to pick up other topics in much greater detail later on."

The presentation, which will skip the old, hourlong formula in which "every department and every agency gets a line or a mention," was devised because, as Mr. Snow said with a smile, "we want people to watch."

DOJ_NMG_0118709

Another change will be the president's audience. For the first time, he will address a Democratic majority in the joint chamber. Behind him, right next to Vice President Dick Cheney, will be House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California. This scenario has influenced the speech, which will seek to enunciate issues on which Republicans and Democrats can agree.

"In that sense, maybe it does reflect a little bit of the political reality," Mr. Snow said.

The spokesman said Mr. Bush will focus on a few broad themes, including the war on terrorism, energy, health care, immigration and education.

Mr. Snow said that although Mr. Bush will use some of his prime-time address to lay out the domestic agenda for his final two years in office, he also will devote a portion to defending his new Iraq strategy, which calls for sending more than 21,500 additional troops to the war-torn country.

"We've noted all along that the speech is not a one-time-only engagement with the American public. It's worth talking about," he said.

The president said in a television interview yesterday that he understands there is "skepticism" about his Iraq plan. But he added, "I believe it will work."

As for the Democrats, the White House said they should offer their own plan on Iraq if they oppose the president. Moreover, Mr. Snow said, the new majority should wait until Mr. Bush delivers his address on Tuesday.

"We understand that because of politics -- I mean, people are already prebutting his speech they haven't heard. And they're developing their responses to policies they haven't seen. So we understand how that works," he said.

Still, Mr. Bush plans to offer some olive branches to Democrats, and will seek to reach across party lines in search of consensus.

"The fact is that there are going to be a number of policies here that are going to be good politics because they're good policies. And they're going to offer opportunities for Democrats and Republicans to work together on areas where they do have a vested interest in making this a stronger and better country," Mr. Snow said.

Bush Tailors State Of The Union Speech (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, January 19, 2007

President Bush's State of the Union speech next week will avoid the traditional laundry list of initiatives and focus on a few issues, such as energy and health care, where he might find common ground with the Democratic-controlled Congress.

Bush is considering ways to make health care affordable and seek the power to raise gas mileage standards for passenger cars, according to former administration and industry officials.

The approach to Tuesday night's speech, as outlined Thursday by White House press secretary Tony Snow, reflects the current political landscape: Voters in November ousted Republicans as the party in charge on Capitol Hill and Bush now faces skeptical majority Democrats rather than compliant GOP lawmakers.

The speech comes less than two weeks after Bush announced a big buildup of U.S. troops in Iraq. With Bush's low approval ratings, a narrowly tailored national address might keep the public from tuning out or reaching for the remote, White House officials reason.

"I just think some of the old State of the Union formulas have kind of run their course," Snow said.

The president plans to highlight the war in Iraq and the fight against terrorism as well as immigration and education, Snow said.

On the school front, for example, Bush is expected to urge that Congress renew the No Child Left Behind law, the signature domestic policy of his first term.

In last year's speech, Bush rebuked critics of his stay-the-course strategy in Iraq; at the time, more than 2,240 American troops had died. This year he will defend his plan for a war that now has claimed more than 3,000 U.S. lives.

Democrats have chosen Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia, a vocal critic of the war who has a son serving in Iraq, to give their party's response. Colorado Sen. Ken Salazar, who grew up in a Spanish-speaking household, will deliver the Democrats' first-ever Spanish-language preview address to the president's State of the Union.

The costs of the war and the deficit probably will preclude Bush from announcing expensive new programs.

As he did last year, when he said America was "addicted to oil," Bush is expected to bemoan U.S. reliance on foreign sources of energy and express support for alternative fuels.

The president is expected to challenge Congress to fix Social Security's long-term solvency problem, preserve tax cuts, join him in balancing the budget within five years and work to make the costs of the war more transparent in the federal budget.

According to two auto industry officials, the president may seek the power to raise fuel economy standards for passenger cars. The two officials, who spoke only condition of anonymity because they did not want to pre-empt Bush's address, said it probably would be part of a plan to offer more incentives for increasing alternative fuels and accelerating the number of vehicles running on alternative fuel.

Bush asked Congress for the authority to change fuel economy standards for passenger cars last year; the measure failed in the House. The administration has opposed simply imposing tougher mileage requirements without changing the system because of safety concerns and interest in providing flexibility to struggling domestic automakers.

The administration released new fuel economy rules last year for sport utility vehicles, pickups and vans based on a vehicle's size. Automakers were supportive of the changes, developed after months of study. Environmentalists said it was insufficient because it required only nominal increases in the standards.

On health care, the president is expected to continue promoting health savings accounts, according to Roy Ramthun, a former economic adviser to the president.

Such accounts are available to people who buy insurance policies with high deductibles, meaning consumers are responsible for more of the initial costs when they see a doctor or a dentist. The insurance policies do not cost as much because of the high deductible, yet they do provide protection in the event of a major injury or illness.

Ramthun said Congress agreed with some of the president's request last year to raise the contribution limits for the accounts. Congress also agreed to let employers put more money into the accounts of low-wage workers, he said.

Bush last year urged higher contribution limits and proposed letting employers contribute extra amounts for chronically ill workers. Ramthun said he believes the president will repeat those calls this year.

A Reality-Based State Of The Union (column) (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

Washington Post, January 18, 2007

For those of you who can't wait until Tuesday's big speech, my fellow Americans, here's the real state of the union:

A president who reduces the near-infinite variety of humankind to "with us" or "against us" has mired the nation in a disastrous, unnecessary war. Comparisons to Vietnam are imprecise -- the American casualties in Iraq are lower, the geopolitical stakes are much higher and the damage to our nation's standing in the world has been incalculable.

Some believe that the president sees clearly the futility of his ill-advised war and that at this point he's just stalling so his successor will take the fall for an eventual American withdrawal. Those cynics are wrong; George W. Bush has demonstrated time and again that he values resolve over reason.

The us-or-them president is now assuming an elbows-out posture toward Iran that is disturbingly reminiscent of the run-up to war in Iraq -- denunciations, threats, a military buildup in the Persian Gulf. Haven't we seen this movie before?

Oh, and the president's tic of smiling at inappropriate moments -- such as when he's answering a question from Scott Pelley or Jim Lehrer about the human costs of the war -- has become a little scary.

Congress is effectively powerless to stop the president from escalating his futile war with a "surge" of 21,500 troops. But Republicans are joining the new Democratic majority in opposition to the war, and this growing, bipartisan consensus threatens to pit Capitol Hill against the White House in an increasingly bitter confrontation.

In other news, fellow citizens, scientists reported that 2006 was the warmest year on record for the United States. The first half of January 2007 was so balmy in the Northeast that crocuses bloomed. Only recently has the president begun to pay grudging lip service to global warming, while firmly resisting measures -- such as capping carbon emissions -- that might actually mitigate the pressure humans are putting on the climate system. I've begun to wonder how a row of palm trees would look in my back yard.

More than a year after the president pledged to rebuild New Orleans, the city is still a ghost of its former self. Neighborhoods remain devastated, residents still can't go home, businesses can't function without workers or customers, and now a brutal crime wave has filled the crippled city with fear. Had Bush fulfilled his promise with quick, comprehensive, effective federal assistance in the weeks after Hurricane Katrina -- a Marshall Plan for the Gulf Coast -- the city might be back on its feet. As things stand, it's not a question of when New Orleans will fully recover, but if.

Fellow Americans, you have come to see economic inequality as a major issue, especially those of you who live in parts of the country that have suffered from the effects of globalization. This phenomenon is poorly understood here in Washington, and your government has offered you no solutions. Candidates who find a way to talk about the widening gap between haves and have-nots are likely to do well in 2008.

The debate over the war drowned out one of the most significant events of the week in Washington: a joint news conference Tuesday by the Business Roundtable, AARP and the Service Employees International Union to call for health-care reform. The nation's biggest corporations, its most influential consumer group and its most aggressive labor union came together to demand that an unfair, expensive, inefficient system be fixed. Massachusetts and California have already begun to tackle the problem. Maybe someday the White House and Congress will get into the game.

The immigration issue continues to smolder and surely will flare up again. In education, No Child Left Behind hasn't begun to live up to its promises. Many Americans fear that their children's lives will not be as prosperous as their own.

But the state of the union is not all bad, my fellow Americans. When the president gives his speech, one of those two seats behind him will be occupied by a woman, Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi -- a first, and an undeniable sign of progress. The two leading candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination are a woman and a black man -- more progress. The nation spoke clearly, and loudly, in the midterm elections, and now there's a counterbalance to the out-of-control White House.

Yes, Washington can be thickheaded and slow. You may have to repeat yourselves a few more times, fellow Americans, but eventually the message will get through.

House Dems Close The First '100 Hours' (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, January 19, 2007

The House wrapped up the Democrats' "100 Hours" legislative sprint Thursday with time to spare, voting to recoup billions of dollars in lost royalties from oil and gas companies and roll back industry tax breaks.

The energy bill capped a two-week drumbeat of votes on legislation that, while popular with voters last fall, awaits a sketchy fate in the Senate.

The House bill, approved 264-123, sets a conservation fee on oil and gas from the Gulf of Mexico, attempts to recoup royalties lost because of a government error in drilling leases in the late 1990s, and rolls back several oil industry tax breaks.

"In the November election, the American people signaled their wish for change — a wish for our country to go in a new direction," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. "Democrats promised that we would, and these past two weeks, we have delivered on our promise."

Democrats accomplished their early legislative goals in 87 hours, adopting new ethics rules and passing bills raising the minimum wage, expanding taxpayer financed research into embryonic stem cells, forcing more homeland security measures, directing the federal government to negotiate for cheaper Medicare prescription drugs and lowering interest rates on subsidized student loans.

Democrats pushed the legislation through swiftly, denying Republicans any opportunity to amend bills, and established themselves as the vanguard for the Democratic agenda. But internal friction within both parties, the potential for partisan gridlock in the Senate and confrontation with the White House over the war in Iraq signal less, not more, legislative production in the weeks ahead.

In the Senate, Democrats and Republicans on Thursday struggled to untangle a partisan knot that threatened to sink ethics legislation. The episode illustrated how hampered Senate Democrats are to impose their will with their razor-thin majority.

The past two weeks also took the glow off the cooperative tone both parties set in the opening day of the new Congress. House Republicans complained bitterly about being denied amendments on the legislation, an echo of Democratic complaints during the 12 years of Republican dominance.

"We are short-circuiting democracy here, and I think my colleagues on both sides of the aisle understand it," said House Republican leader John Boehner, R-Ohio. "I'm here today to ask my colleagues on the other side of the aisle to live up to the promises that were made, to live up to the desire to be treated fairly."

Democrats were not sympathetic.

"We are working on an agenda that the minority would not or could not do, and we're fulfilling our promise to the American people," said Rep. Louise Slaughter, D-N.Y., chairman of the House Rules Committee. "And all the whining you can do, all of it you can produce will not deter us from it."

Still some Democrats were eager to move on to a more deliberative pace.

"One of the things that we were savagely critical of is the fact that the Republicans did not follow the regular order," said Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich. "Now it is time for us to get back and take ourselves seriously and proceed under the regular order."

For all its speed, the House legislation now enters the quicksands of the Senate, where Republicans already are displaying their ability to alter or slow down the Democratic agenda.

Senate Republicans, for instance, were trying to use the ethics legislation to extract a promise from Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada that the Senate would get a vote on legislation to give the president authority to challenge individual spending items for elimination.

Republicans also insisted on attaching $8.3 billion in small business tax breaks to a Senate version of minimum wage legislation. The legislation was written jointly by Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus, D-Mont., and the committee's ranking Republican, Charles Grassley. Reid has said he would support the tax breaks to pass the new wage floor. But House Democrats have objected, noting that tax legislation must originate in the House, with the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee.

Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., said Senate Democrats were essentially telling the House that Congress would not raise the minimum wage if it did not contain tax breaks.

"How are you going to explain that?" he asked. "I don't know what Baucus and Reid are talking about."

Senate Republicans also planned to press for different legislation dealing with college tuition. The House bill would cut in half the interest rates paid by college graduates for their need-based, federally subsidized loans. Republicans have argued that students would be better helped by expanding federal tuition grants.

If passed by the Senate, the prescription drug bill and the stem cell research bills also face presidential vetoes. The House vote margins were not sufficient to override a veto.

But the prescription drug bill may not even reach the president in its current form. Baucus and other senators want to scale back the scope of the House bill, by targeting the drugs that the government would be permitted to bargain for prices.

If the partisan friction were not enough, both parties face internal conflicts as well.

Several House and Senate Republicans have objected to President Bush's troop boosting plan for Iraq. Two Republican senators — Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine — have singed on to a nonbinding resolution opposing the insertion of 21,500 new troops into the war.

Democrats are divided themselves, unable to agree on how to express their opposition to Bush. Some prefer a nonbonding resolution, while others in the House and Senate want more muscular legislation specifically limiting Bush's ability to act on his strategy.

In the House, Pelosi and some of her key committee chairmen were on a collision course over how to address global warming legislation. Pelosi wants to create a special committee to recommend legislation, at least duplicating work by committees that have jurisdiction on climate change issues.

After 42 Hours (or So), House Democrats Complete 100-Hour Push (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — House Democrats met the goals of their 100-hour legislative offensive with plenty of time to spare on Thursday, claiming that their successes proved they could govern.

Republicans derided the hurry-up nature of the effort as a bit of one-sided political showmanship that undercut the Democrats' pledge that the new Congress would be more bipartisan.

But the easy approval of the half-dozen measures in the 100-hour agenda — dealing with the minimum wage, embryonic stem cell research, health care, national security, education and energy — was celebrated by the new majority as a validation of the blitz, an idea born on the campaign trail that blossomed into a central House Democratic theme.

"It was a way to say that this Congress will no longer be a place where optimism and good ideas come to die," said Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, who devised the approach as what Democrats deemed a counterpoint to 12 years of Republican control.

Ms. Pelosi also established another benchmark on Thursday, announcing that she had asked Democratic lawmakers who serve as committee chairmen to draw up a series of energy bills "so that by the Fourth of July we can have a package of legislation to truly declare our energy independence."

Some Republicans predicted that only one or two of the 100-hour bills would eventually become law in a form close to that approved by the House. And they heaped criticism on Democrats for not giving them any chance to offer their own proposals.

"We are short-circuiting democracy here, and I think my colleagues on both sides of the aisle understand this," Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the minority leader, said Thursday on the floor as the Democrats pushed through the last bill, rolling back some subsidies for the oil industry.

Republicans and some Democrats said the 100-hour drive had been somewhat overshadowed by the debate over the war in Iraq and President Bush's proposed troop buildup there.

"As long as George Bush is in the White House, putting more troops in Iraq, that is all that matters to voters," said Representative Tom Davis, Republican of Virginia. (Mr. Davis said he was still assessing his position on the president's decision to send more than 20,000 additional troops in an effort to quell sectarian violence.)

The ability of House Democrats to pass their bills within the prescribed time was never in doubt, given the majority's ability to control the schedule and the leadership's decision to be very selective in how it counted the time. When the Democratic clock stopped, only 42 hours 25 minutes of time actually spent on the bills had expired, and Democrats said they could have easily handled the legislation more quickly.

The Associated Press, which counted all the time the House was in session, clocked the 100-hour effort at 87 hours.

While the whole enterprise drew ridicule from Republicans, the Democratic response was essentially "look who's laughing now."

"They can make fun of it," said Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the majority leader. "But they cannot make fun of the fact that for the first time in 10 years, we have raised the minimum wage."

The $2.10-an-hour increase in the minimum wage may be the legislation with the best chance of becoming law. The Senate is expected to consider a similar proposal quickly, though senators of both parties support adding tax breaks for businesses to help them offset any new costs. House Democrats prefer an increase without such an add-on, but may go along in order to get a measure to the president's desk.

The outlook for other 100-hour measures is more problematic. Last year Mr. Bush vetoed legislation that would have expanded federal financing of embryonic stem cell research, and the House still lacks a veto-proof majority for a similar bill it just passed. Another measure, directing the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies over the cost of drugs sold through Medicare, could also draw a veto.

In addition, senators say they have reservations about the costs of enacting recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission that are newly approved by the House, and they have different ideas as well on the remaining bills.

“Many of the 100-hours ‘accomplishments’ can’t make it through the Senate” or survive a veto, said Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri, the Republican whip.

But Democrats said that they had done what they set out to do and that the first flurry of legislation was the start of their work, not the end. “This is just the beginning of making sure the future is a future that’s fair for everybody,” said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus.

Now his party is faced with what to do in the next 100 hours, and the next, particularly after promising a full House workweek. The coming days are likely to be dominated by the war in Iraq and by Mr. Bush’s plan for more troops there.

Ms. Pelosi, who met Thursday with Democratic senators, said afterward that House Democrats would line up behind a version of the new Senate resolution declaring that the troop increase is not in the country’s best interest.

Though that measure is not binding on the president, Ms. Pelosi said Democrats would continue to apply pressure on him to change his approach on both the war and their legislative program.

“All of these bills are being passed in a bipartisan way,” the speaker said. “We hope that he would consider signing them. We will take our campaign on these issues, though, to the public, in hopes that their voices would be heard by him.”

from the January 19, 2007 edition - http://www.csmonitor.com/2007/0119/p02s02-uspo.html Congress is off to a bipartisan start, but tougher tests lie ahead In the first 100 legislative hours, House Democrats drew significant GOP support of their 'Six for '06' agenda.

By Gail Russell Chaddock | Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

WASHINGTON

After a bitterly fought midterm election, Democrats controlling the new Congress pledged to transcend partisanship and tackle the big problems that concern Americans. Then, something happened that neither Washington insiders nor, probably, even the voters expected: Lawmakers began acting as if they meant it.

In the 110th Congress's first 100 legislative hours, which wrapped up Thursday, House Democrats drew a significant number of GOP votes on their "Six for '06" agenda, despite giving minority Republicans little voice in shaping the legislation.

A rule change to overhaul lobbying and ethics reform cleared the House on a nearly unanimous vote. A bill to enact additional antiterror recommendations of the 9/11 commission pulled 68 GOP votes. Eighty-two Republicans helped pass the first increase in the federal minimum wage in nine years; 37 Republicans supported expanding federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research; and 124 members of the GOP caucus joined Democrats to gradually cut interest rates in half on student loans.

At the same time, Democrats in the House and Senate scrambled this week to find partners on the other side of the aisle to challenge the White House over its conduct of the Iraq war. On Wednesday, Sen. Chuck Hagel (R) of Nebraska became the first Republican to formally break with the Bush White House, by supporting a bipartisan resolution opposing the president's plan to send more US troops.

Heeding the voters

The bipartisan, problem-solving mantra is one that lawmakers of both stripes say they took straight from voters in the midterm election. "The message in the last election was a resounding repudiation of the status quo and partisanship that had poisoned the ability of Congress to develop solutions," says Sen. Olympia Snowe (R) of Maine. "People are demanding government and results. People were so disaffected, and that really has been a galvanizing force toward bipartisanship."

Sen. Barack Obama (D) of Illinois sounded a similar note in launching his presidential exploratory committee this week. "I've been struck by how hungry we are for a different kind of politics," he said. "It's not the magnitude of our problems that concerns me most, it's the smallness of our politics."

More strange bedfellows

Interest groups and lobbyists, too, seem to have caught the spirit, at least a little. Some say they are finding an opening for bipartisan cooperation in the 110th Congress that could lead to breakthroughs on issues ranging from climate change to universal healthcare.

Some of these issues are not now at the top of Democrats' agenda. On Tuesday, leaders of the Business Roundtable, the Service Employees International Union (SEIU), and the AARP (a lobby group for seniors), announced they were, for the first time, joining forces to push Congress for universal-healthcare legislation.

"There are a lot of things Congress needs to do that are now doable," says Bill Novelli, AARP's CEO. "What's really powering this is that these problems have gotten so bad." Healthcare costs are breaking employers, who are shifting costs to employees. "It's now the middle class that is affected, and the middle class is very worried," he says. "When you get to that kind of situation, there's a lot of pressure."

Views are converging around a healthcare approach that combines elements of patient cost-sharing and government regulation. "The answer to the healthcare problem is not one of policy but one of politics," said SEIU's Andy Stern.

On another front, 28 evangelical leaders and climate scientists signed a joint "call for action" Wednesday. The partnership taps into a rich vein for bipartisan collaboration in the new Congress. In the run-up to President Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday, which is expected to feature new energy initiatives, lawmakers on both sides of the aisle announced new collaborations on energy policy.

"Congress and the American people cannot afford to wait for the White House to lead on this issue," said Senate majority leader Harry Reid, as he previewed work by six committees on energy independence. In one of the strongest bipartisan collaborations on Capitol Hill, Sens. Joseph Biden (D) of Delaware and Richard Lugar (R) of Indiana, chairman and ranking member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, are sponsoring a resolution calling on the US to return to international negotiations to limit greenhouse-gas emissions.

On the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, Sens. Joseph Lieberman (I) of Connecticut, Norm Coleman (R) of Minnesota, Evan Bayh (D) of Indiana, and Ken Salazar (D) of Colorado introduced this week a bill to cut oil imports by 7 million barrels a day by 2026.

A united front on the Iraq war?

The strongest pull for bipartisan cooperation is shaping up to be the Iraq war. GOP senators seen to be wavering on their support for Mr. Bush's "new way forward" in Iraq were called to the White House Wednesday for consultations.

"I suspect very little mind-changing went on there, but I'm hopeful that some of this gets back to the president," says Senator Coleman, one of a dozen senators who reportedly met with administration officials. He doesn't support "putting American forces into the cross hairs of sectarian violence," but has yet to sign on to a resolution opposing it.

Poll: Dems' '100-hour' Agenda Gets Mixed Reviews (LAT)

By Janet Hook, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON - A bipartisan majority of Americans strongly supports the bills that whisked through the House in the first days of the Democratic-controlled Congress, but many remain uncertain about where the party wants to lead the nation, a new Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll has found.

Approval of Congress has increased since the midterm elections ousted Republicans from their House and Senate majorities and Democrats are viewed in a more positive light after two weeks in power, according to the survey.

But only 25% of those surveyed believed that Democrats have formulated a clear direction for the country; 58% said they had failed to.

Those results amount to a mixed report card on the much-ballyhooed "100-hour" agenda House Democrats set for themselves as they took power.

They made a strong start with House passage of some broadly popular bills, such as an increase in the minimum wage and a cut in student loan rates that passed with significant Republican support - rare displays of bipartisanship after years of the party-line splits that marked GOP control.

But the survey underscores that Democrats still have much to prove to voters as the Senate debates these bills and lawmakers in both chambers turn to more divisive issues, such as the federal budget, global warming and Iraq.

Overall, the poll found 36% approve of how Congress is doing its job - hardly a mandate, but up from 30% in September.

"So far, so good," said Hildegard Wharton, a retiree in Wooster, Ohio, who responded to the poll.

Wharton, a Democrat, added: "I hope they do a better job than the Republicans. If they don't, they are not going to get reelected."

The Times/Bloomberg poll, supervised by Times Poll Director Susan Pinkus, surveyed 1,344 adults by telephone Saturday through Tuesday. It has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

It found that pressure is especially high for Democrats to change course in Iraq; 45% identified the war as the most important issue for the new Congress to address, a far higher figure than for any other issue.

"If they just tackle this war and get these boys home, they will be doing good," said Jerry Alexander, a retired car salesman in Savannah, Tenn., who is an independent. "They better, because that's what they were elected for."

The positive reaction among those polled to the major elements of the initial Democratic agenda ratifies the political strategy behind its design: party leaders deliberately filled the congressional session's opening hours with issues that, for the most part, polls have found enjoyed broad bipartisan support and were likely to pass before President Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday. One aim was to provide a contrast with the gridlock that stalled many bills during the recent years of the Republican-controlled Congress.

The student loan rate cut that passed the House on Wednesday was supported by 79% of those polled. Legislation aimed at lowering prices in Medicare's prescription drug program, which passed the House last week, was backed by 80%.

Repealing tax breaks for big oil companies, which the House approved Thursday, was supported by 61%. An expansion of federal funding for embryonic stem cell research, passed by the chamber last week, was backed by 59%.

The most popular item was the push to increase the federal minimum wage, which under the House bill would rise over two years to $7.25 an hour from $5.15. The increase, which would be the first in a decade, was supported by 81% of those surveyed - including 66% of the self-described conservatives.

"The minimum wage increase was long overdue," said Susan Wilkinson, a homemaker and a Democrat who lives in Trabuko Canyon in Orange County. "It's pretty sad that it had to be even an issue to debate."

Democrats hope their early results will reinforce the judgment by voters in November that it was time for a change of control in Congress.

The new poll indicates a less critical view of congressional Democrats among the public - although their favorable rating is virtually unchanged, 42% now, compared to 40% in September, their unfavorable rating was 32%, down from 41% in the previous poll.

Accompanying that drop was an increase - to 22% from 15% - in those who said they did not know enough about congressional Democrats to judge. That suggests there is a sizable wait-and-see faction among voters.

"I just don't know how much of what they have done is going to bear any fruit," said Jim Bauder, a computer programmer in Fort Jones, Calif.

Bauder, an independent, added: "President Bush has declared he's going to veto many of the things they have passed. Is it going to be a situation where anything gets accomplished?"

Some of the early promises emanating from Washington are being viewed with skepticism.

Almost three-quarters of those surveyed - 72% - supported House-passed ethics reforms to ban gifts from lobbyists and require the disclosure of pork barrel projects. But only 27% said they believed such measures would make a real difference; 60% said they expect business-as-usual in the way Capitol Hill operates.

"My experience is that there have been reforms, but there always seems to be new or expanding loopholes people find," said Bauder.

Helen Anderson, a teacher in Houston, said she was unimpressed with what Democrats have done in the opening weeks.

"I think they are trying to make a big show to make it look like they are taking a new direction," said Anderson, a Republican. "All they can say is they want to do the opposite of what's being done now, but they don't say how they are going to do it."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), in the news spotlight since the November elections as the first woman to lead either congressional chamber, remains little known to many Americans but has made some headway in raising her national profile.

Among those with an opinion, 34% viewed her favorably, 21% unfavorably. Still, 41% of those surveyed said they had not heard enough about her to have an opinion. In December, that figure was 50%; in September, 63%.

By some measures, people seem more optimistic about the economy: 68% said they thought it was doing well, up from 54% in September. Some attributed their upbeat outlook to the drop in gasoline prices.

"As prices go down on gas and energy, other prices will be coming down," said Debra Glover, a substitute teacher in Oak Park, Mich., who is an independent. "It's happening real fast. I'm liking that."

But the poll also found increased anxiety about the impact of free trade: 41% said doing away with restrictions on international commerce hurts the economy.

Pelosi Gains With Public As Democrats Get High Marks For Agenda (BLOOM)

By Heidi Przybyla

Bloomberg, January 19, 2007

Jan. 19 (Bloomberg) -- Americans are warming to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, and they give the Democratic-led Congress high marks for its initial legislative priorities.

A new Bloomberg/Los Angeles Times poll shows positive views of Pelosi, 66, climbed over the past month and are considerably higher than the marks Americans gave one of her highly publicized predecessors, Republican Newt Gingrich, in the first weeks of his tenure as speaker in 1995.

The poll conducted Jan. 13 to 16 showed even more support for the party's early priorities, including repealing subsidies for oil companies, cutting prescription-drug costs for seniors and raising the minimum wage, which were backed by large majorities of respondents.

``There's some honeymoon halo going on here," said David Mayhew, a professor at Yale University in New Haven, Connecticut who has written several books on Congress. ``They made up a platform that they know is anchored well in public opinion."

Still, the survey revealed warning signs that tougher times may lie ahead for the Democrats who won control of the House and Senate in the November elections. Even as almost two-thirds of respondents said they want the country to go in a different direction than President George W. Bush has charted, 58 percent said the Democrats hadn't formulated a clear course for the future.

In addition, only a plurality of respondents, 42 percent, had a favorable impression of Democrats in Congress, largely unchanged from previous recent polls.

Iraq Dominates

Iraq was the dominant issue for poll respondents, 45 percent of whom said the war should be the top priority for the new Congress. Health care, including coverage for the uninsured, came in a distant second, with 20 percent of respondents saying it was their chief concern.

The poll of 1,344 adults has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Positive perceptions of Pelosi, the first woman speaker of the House, have been increasing over the past month as her new prominence garnered her greater public exposure.

Thirty-four percent of respondents gave the 11-term California representative a favorable rating, up from 27 percent who did so in a poll conducted in December. Forty-one percent of those surveyed -- a plurality -- said they still hadn't heard enough about her to form an impression, down from 50 percent who had no opinion in December. Twenty-one percent rated her unfavorably, a number that is unchanged from the December poll.

Gingrich Precedent

By contrast, a Los Angeles Times poll in January 1995 found that Gingrich, who engineered the Republican congressional landslide in 1994, had more unfavorable ratings, at 39 percent, than favorable, at 26 percent. In September 1996, almost two years after he became speaker, Gingrich's negative rating reached 54 percent.

With the spotlight on Pelosi, 61 percent of respondents said they didn't know enough about her counterpart in the Senate, Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, to form an opinion. That's down slightly from 65 percent in December.

Pelosi and her party also enjoy broad support for the seven legislative items they vowed to pass in the first 100 hours of the new Congress, which began Jan. 3. All the measures have already been approved in the House.

Minimum Wage

At least four-fifths of respondents said they back the measures cutting student loan interest rates in half, increasing the federal minimum wage by $7.25 from $5.15 over about two years, lowering prescription-drug prices and screening all cargo on U.S.-bound ships and planes.

Significant majorities also approve of the legislation repealing some tax breaks and subsidies to oil companies, enacting a new ethics package for Congress and increasing federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research.

Forty-seven percent of self-described Republicans said they back the stem-cell proposal, which Bush vetoed last year and continues to oppose.

The narrowest margin of support for any of the Democratic goals -- 51 percent to 26 percent -- goes to a plan to enact a so-called pay-as-you-go rule that requires Congress to offset new spending bills or tax breaks with spending cuts or tax increases.

Overall, disapproval of the job lawmakers are doing has declined, with negative ratings of Congress dropping from 57 percent in a September poll conducted when Republicans were in control, to 44 percent in the latest survey.

Divisions Among Democrats

Some of the initial support for Democrats and their priorities could fade as Congress takes up more divisive issues, including the situation in Iraq. While most Democrats agree that the Bush administration has mismanaged the war, the party remains divided over whether to call for an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces or withhold funding for the conflict.

``It's easy to say you don't want to have troops in Iraq, but what is the game plan?'' said Barry Gershowitz, an independent from Rock Tavern, New York.

Gershowitz, a 64-year-old retired banker, said he has a ``slightly'' more favorable impression of congressional Democrats than of Republicans. ``I'm looking for a breath of fresh air,'' he said. ``Hopefully I'll get it from the Democrats, but it remains to be seen.''

Senators Work To Revive Ethics Bill (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, January 19, 2007

Senate leaders worked to resuscitate an ethics and lobbying measure Thursday, with the new Democratic majority trying to stave off defeat on its first major bill and Republicans wanting to avoid being blamed for obstructing an overhaul.

Aides from both parties said the two sides were trying to resolve the dispute that derailed action on the legislation Wednesday, and were putting together amendments.

Barring further conflicts, a final vote could come as early as Thursday night.

There is strong bipartisan support for the general goals of the legislation: reducing the influence of lobbyists over policymaking; ending the gift and travel perks that have tainted the public's image of Congress; and forcing lawmakers to be more open about the pet projects they slip into legislation.

Action on the bill hit a wall Wednesday. Republicans were angry they could not get a vote on a proposal giving the president, with congressional approval, more power to kill single spending items in larger bills. So GOP senators voted against a resolution needed to move the bill to final passage.

On Thursday morning, both sides accused the other of killing the bill and betraying the trust of voters who had demanded that Congress clean up its act.

"What this maneuver shows is that the Republican leadership hasn't learned the lessons of the 2006 election," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

"The Democrat leadership does not have to kill this legislation," countered Republican leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky. "I believe that we owe it to the voters as well as the institution to come to a fair agreement and pass this legislation."

The dispute was over an attempt by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., to get a vote on a modified version of a line-item veto. It would allow the president to single out spending items for elimination. Under Gregg's proposal, Congress would have to agree to the items expunged.

Democrats insisted that the proposal was not relevant to the ethics bill and too contentious to be dealt with in a short time. Gregg said it fit in the ethics bill because most of the items removed would be the special projects that have been linked to wasteful and inappropriate spending.

The two sides were working on an agreement under which Gregg would be guaranteed consideration of his bill at a later date.

Any deal would have to take in the objections of the Senate's senior member, Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., who is vehemently opposed to any legislation that might cede the legislative branch's power over the purse to the president.

The ethics and lobbying legislation would bar lawmakers from accepting gifts and travel paid for by lobbyists; make it more difficult for former lawmakers to lobby their old colleagues; deny pensions to lawmakers convicted of serious crimes; require more reporting by lobbyists on their activities; and require public disclosure of those home-state projects.

Democrats are determined to show voters they are changing the way Washington works so they made the measure their first order of business after assuming power in the Senate.

The House, on its first day of Democratic control, changed some of the rules concerning gifts, meals and travel from lobbyists. The House is scheduled to take up legislation next month that, like the Senate bill, would change lobbying law and require a House-Senate compromise.

Senate Cracks Impasse On Ethics (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Senate late Thursday passed a bill with ethics rules aimed at changing the way lobbyists and lawmakers do business with each other.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., called it the "most significant legislation in ethics and lobbying reform we've had in the history of this country."

Beyond 100 hours: What the future may hold for key House measures

Earlier, Reid and the Senate's top Republican, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, worked behind the scenes to broker a compromise that would allow lawmakers to move forward on the bill. It is the first measure being pushed by the Democrats who won control of the Senate in November's elections.

The changes, which have bipartisan support, bar senators from taking meals, gifts and sports tickets from lobbyists. They also restrict lobbyist-funded travel and impose new limits on senators' travel on private planes.

Action on the ethics plan stalled Wednesday after New Hampshire Sen. Judd Gregg and other Republicans blocked a vote on the bill. They were demanding the measure include what amounts to line-item veto power for the president.

Thursday's work to break the deadlock came amid finger-pointing by both parties.

A "good ethics train was moving down the tracks until Republicans put the line-item veto in its path," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. The GOP action amounted to a "grand act of ethics hypocrisy," said Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash.

For their part, Gregg and other Republicans argued that a line-item veto — which would allow the president to block specific items in a spending bill, rather than have to approve or reject the whole thing — was a logical part of the ethics package. The measure would require more public disclosure of "earmarks," money for special projects that members of Congress insert into spending bills, often anonymously. Most of the things the president would veto with line-item power would be wasteful projects, said Gregg, the top Republican on the Budget Committee.

Under the deal, Gregg will get a vote on his proposal during debate on a measure to increase the federal minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, from $5.15 currently. The minimum wage bill is the next order of business in the Senate, and could be considered starting Monday.

Gregg said his proposal would give the president power to send specific spending projects back to Congress for reconsideration, giving lawmakers a chance to "take a second look at waste."

Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., chairman of the Appropriations Committee, objected to Gregg's plan on Wednesday. He is well known as a vigorous defender of Congress' power to determine spending.

On Thursday, Byrd said it was "dangerous" for lawmakers to give up any power over spending. "Weaken the power of the purse and one weakens oversight, for example, over the bloody nightmare of the war in Iraq."

Other provisions in the ethics bill would:

•Extend from one to two years the time a former member must wait before he can lobby Congress.

•Deny pensions to lawmakers convicted of serious crimes.

•Require public disclosure of home-state projects added by senators to bills.

The impasse highlighted the difficulty Senate Democrats face in trying to push their agenda in a chamber where they control 51 out of 100 votes. By comparison Thursday, Democrats in the House celebrated swift passage of their first six bills, including measures to raise the minimum wage and expand federal funding for embryonic stem cell research.

Earlier this month, the House approved changes to its own ethics rules that included similar prohibitions on gifts, meals and travel funded by lobbyists.

Reid said legislation takes longer in the Senate but insisted that top Democrats would work aggressively on a range of legislative proposals, including the increase in the minimum wage.

Senate Passes Vast Overhaul In Ethics Rules (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — The Senate on Thursday overwhelmingly passed sweeping changes to ethics and lobbying rules, overcoming bipartisan reluctance to ban many of the favors that lobbyists do for lawmakers and to illuminate the shadowy legislative practice of earmarking money for special projects.

The Senate's action makes the start of the 110th Congress a watershed moment in the history of K Street and Capitol Hill. Interpreting the results of the Nov. 7 election as a reaction to corruption scandals when Congress was under Republican control, the Senate has joined the House in adopting broad new rules that go beyond the proposals Republicans introduced last year, the ones that Democrats campaigned on, or the extensive changes House Democrats recently passed.

The measure passed around 9 p.m. by a vote of 96 to 2. Senators Orrin Hatch of Utah and Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, both Republicans, were the only members to vote against the bill.

On Wednesday, Senate Republicans nearly derailed the bill in a dispute over when the Democrats would agree to vote on a Republican proposal, a version of the line-item veto. Democrats seized on the moment to accuse the Republicans of deliberately scuttling the reforms. At a news conference, a half-dozen Democratic senators competed to belittle the Republicans' line-item veto as "an excuse," "a ploy," "a subterfuge," a "rabbit out of a hat" and "a grand act of ethics hypocrisy."

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the leader of the new Democratic majority, threatened to postpone any action on ethics until the next election and publicly blame the Republicans if they did not allow a vote Thursday.

But by Thursday evening, Mr. Reid and Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, had resolved the impasse. They agreed to hold a vote on the line-item veto as part of a minimum-wage debate next week.

"This legislation has been extremely difficult to deal with," Mr. Reid said Thursday night. "It is difficult because it deals with our lives."

"In the short-term, the reforms in this bill may take some getting used to," he added, "but in the long term, we'll be thankful we took these steps."

Like the new House rules, the Senate bill bars members from accepting gifts, meals or trips from lobbyists or the organizations that employ them. It ends the use by senators of borrowed corporate jets at discount rates. It prohibits departing senators from negotiating with prospective new employers until after their successors have been elected and restricts them from directly or indirectly lobbying the Senate for two years after leaving office.

Also like the House rules, the Senate measure requires disclosure of the sponsors, the purpose and the cost of earmarks, the pet projects that lawmakers have been able to tuck anonymously into complicated spending bills.

Unlike the House, the bill would also explicitly prohibit earmarks that would benefit the immediate family of the senator who sponsored it. All those changes revise internal Senate rules and do not require House or presidential approval.

Senate Democrats also incorporated into the bill a provision that, if signed into law, would require for the first time that lobbyists disclose the most valuable favors they do for lawmakers: holding campaign fund-raisers, soliciting campaign contributions and bundling checks from clients and friends.

Of all the bill's provisions, it was the disclosure requirements for bundled checks that met the stiffest resistance behind the scenes in the Democratic caucus because of the potential to make it harder for incumbent lawmakers to tap K Street lobbyists as surrogate fund-raisers, aides involved in negotiations over the bill said, speaking anonymously because the talks were confidential.

Addressing another loophole in campaign finance laws, the Senate bill would also bar lobbyists or their employers from giving parties to honor lawmakers at party conventions. House Democrats say they plan to take up the subject of lobbying rules on their side of the Capitol in the next several weeks.

The Senate debate showcased the deep ambivalence of many lawmakers about changes that could curb their personal privileges and potentially limit their fund-raising advantages.

The party leaders began by teaming up to introduce a much weaker bipartisan bill, and lawmakers in both parties acknowledged behind-the-scenes resistance to strengthening it. But many found amendments to strengthen the bill politically difficult to oppose.

The bill became a pivotal test for Mr. Reid in his new role trying to manage the Senate. He is a frequent target of Republican accusations of fraternizing with influence-peddlers. Several members of his immediate family have worked as lobbyists, although he says that none have lobbied his office, and he is among the biggest recipients of the discounted use of corporate jets for travel.

Mr. Reid promised vigorous reform as his first act as majority leader. He offered an amendment to bar lawmakers from accepting the discounted use of corporate jets, promising to discontinue the practice himself.

But when a Republican senator offered an amendment to match the House's earmark disclosure rules, Mr. Reid miscounted the votes he had on his side when he tried and failed to table the measure. Mr. Reid first argued against moving too fast to match the House Democrats' new rules and then embraced the same idea with token modifications.

Senate Passes Ethics Package (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Senate Democrats and Republicans broke a difficult stalemate last night and approved 96 to 2 expansive legislation to curtail the influence of lobbyists, tighten congressional ethics rules and prevent the spouses of senators from lobbying senators and their staffs.

The Senate legislation, hailed by proponents as the most significant ethics reform since Watergate, would ban gifts, meals and travel funded by lobbyists, and would force lawmakers to attach their names to special-interest provisions and pet projects that they slip into bills. Lawmakers would have to pay charter rates on corporate jets, not the far-cheaper first-class rates they pay now.

The House earlier this month approved similar language as part of an internal rules change. But other portions of the Senate-passed measure would carry the weight of law and would have impacts far beyond the Capitol. The House would have to pass comparable legislation for those provisions to take effect.

One of those legislative provisions would force lobbyists to publicly disclose the small campaign donations they collect from clients and "bundle" into large donations to politicians. Bundling is a way for lobbyists to contribute far more money to candidates and thus wield more influence than they could by making individual contributions, which are currently limited to $2,100 per candidate for each election cycle. Lavish gatherings thrown by lobbyists and corporate interests at party conventions would be banned.

Former lawmakers would no longer be able to engage in any lobbying activity for two years after they leave office. And, in most cases, the lobbyist spouses of senators would no longer be able to take advantage of their family status to influence the colleagues and staffs of their husbands and wives. The only exception is for spouses who had been lobbying for at least one year before their husband or wife was elected.

"This is the toughest reform bill in the history of this body as relates to ethics and lobbying, so everyone here tonight, when they vote on this, should vote proudly," said Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "This is historic."

James Thurber, a professor of political science at American University, did not go that far, but he said the impact of the Senate bill would be substantial: "It will change lawmakers' behavior and lobbyists' behavior as well, and it will bring more transparency to lobbying."

The measure appeared dead Wednesday night after Republicans refused to allow passage without a vote on an unrelated amendment that would hand the president virtual line-item veto authority. For nearly two days, Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) -- who jealously guards the Senate's prerogatives on spending matters -- single-handedly blocked efforts to come to an accord on that line-item veto vote.

Democrats and government watchdog groups angrily pointed their fingers at the Republicans, charging that their demand for a vote on such an extraneous provision was simply an indirect way to kill popular legislation they dared not vote against.

But Reid found a path around Byrd, offering Republicans a chance next week to add the spending control measure to a bill to raise the minimum wage if they can find the votes. That broke the logjam, and the Senate then began debating several amendments to the bill, with an eye toward completing work late last night.

The bipartisan vote masked furious backroom lobbying on a measure too popular to kill in public. One provision that was stricken from the bill last night would have forced interest groups to disclose funds spent on grass-roots campaigns that implore the public to contact their representatives about legislation.

That provision -- to force the disclosure of pseudo-grass-roots campaigns -- had raised the ire of an odd coalition that included the American Civil Liberties Union, the Traditional Values Coalition, the American Conservative Union and the National Right to Life Committee, which worked hard to strip it out or even block the whole bill.

The Family Research Council met with lawmakers and their staffs, conducted interviews on radio talk shows, extensively e-mailed its members and notified other organizations, asking them to contact their senators to express opposition, according to Tony Perkins, the group's president. In the end, the Senate struck the measure, 55 to 43.

"This is an issue about free speech, not an issue that is either Republican or Democratic," said Marvin Johnson, legislative counsel of the American Civil Liberties Union, during the coalition's telephone news conference yesterday.

In another defeat for watchdog groups, the Senate overwhelmingly defeated a proposal to create an independent ethics counsel to investigate allegations of wrongdoing in the Senate. The 71 to 27 vote was the second time that Congress has rejected the proposal in recent years.

Opposition from so many conservative activists had raised accusations from Democrats that Republicans were doing their bidding by blocking passage, but other opponents were less partisan. Lobbyists for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, or AIPAC, also talked to lawmakers about excluding from the measure's travel ban trips to Israel sponsored by the group's nonprofit foundation affiliate. The legislation, as written, would allow those trips to continue.

In addition, lobbyists' organizations worked against many parts of the Senate bill, arguing that lobbyists would still be able to spend lavishly on lawmakers under its provisions. They would just have to do so in the context of political fundraisers because fundraising activities are not addressed in the bill.

"The bill has gone from bad to worse," said Paul A. Miller, immediate past president of the American League of Lobbyists. "What's being proposed now puts us in danger of making the system even more corrupt than it is now, largely because the bill would move a lot of lobbying contacts into the realm of campaign finance, and that's more corrupting than under the current system."

But government watchdog groups said they saw much to praise in the bill, and they worked hard for its passage. After Republicans temporarily derailed it late Wednesday, the watchdogs responded furiously. Democracy 21 posted what it called a "Hall of Shame," listing the 45 Republicans that voted to filibuster the bill. The League of Women Voters condemned what it called "late night shenanigans."

But, ultimately, it was Byrd that tried to block all of Reid's efforts to accommodate Republican demands on a measure long sought by President Bush that would allow the president to submit to Congress a list of spending items that the White House wants to strike from congressionally passed spending bills. Under the measure, Congress would then vote on whether to sustain or accept those rescissions. Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), its sponsor, called it a modest proposal to help ferret out egregious waste that leaves Congress the final say.

But Byrd decried it as "an assault on the single most important protection the American people have against a president, any president, who wants to run roughshod over [their] liberties." GOP demands for a vote were "little more than political blackmail," he said.

Under the agreement reached last night, Byrd and Gregg will rejoin that battle next week, when the spending-control provision finally comes to a vote.

Senate Passes Ethics Reform By 96-2 Margin (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

The Senate last night overwhelmingly passed an ethics bill after breaking a day-long stalemate over a Republican proposal on earmarks that had threatened to kill the legislation.

The vote was 96-2, with the two "no" votes coming from Republican Sens. Tom Coburn of Oklahoma and Orrin G. Hatch of Utah.

"It's the most significant legislation on ethics and lobbying reform ever passed in the history of the country, and it was hard to get there," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said as he left the Senate chamber after last night's vote. "It was a long day."

The impasse had centered on an amendment by Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican, that would authorize the president to remove earmarks -- provisions in a bill to fund specific projects, often used by members of Congress to pay for pet projects in their home districts or states -- and send the legislation back to Congress for a second look and another vote.

Republicans wanted to vote on their amendment as part of the ethics bill, but Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, had been single-handedly blocking a deal.

"This reform bill is threatened by an effort by our colleagues on the other side of the aisle to give the president line-item veto authority," Mr. Byrd said on the Senate floor yesterday. When Republicans didn't get the amendment vote they wanted, they retaliated Wednesday by voting against a parliamentary procedure needed to pass the overall ethics bill, effectively blocking what had been Mr. Reid's first order of business.

But Mr. Reid, Nevada Democrat, secured the ethics-bill vote last night by conceding to Republican demands for a vote on the Gregg amendment.

"It was a difficult bump," Mr. Reid said. Still, he said he was "proud of this debate. It started bipartisan, and it looks like it will end bipartisan."

DOJ_NMG_0118724

The ethics bill that passed last night would bar gifts and free travel from lobbyists, require lawmakers to pay more for travel on corporate jets and increase the publicizing of earmarks. It also restricts lobbying by the spouses of sitting members, increases the time before a former lawmaker can become a lobbyist, requires more disclosure by lobbyists, and denies pensions to lawmakers convicted in the future of serious crimes.

The Republican measure will be voted on Monday as an amendment to the bill to raise the minimum wage. This power to revise spending bills would differ from a line-item veto in that either chamber of Congress could reject it with a simple majority vote. Congress had passed a straight line-item veto in 1996, but the Supreme Court declared it unconstitutional in 1998.

Mr. Reid said the episode did not produce winners or losers in the Senate.

"The winners are the American people," he said in announcing the deal, which came an hour before the vote. "They have reason to have faith in their government again."

But Mr. Coburn said he voted against the bill because it failed to bring transparency to Congress and said many of the better provisions will be shed before it becomes law. He said as an example of the bill's shortcomings the large number of restrictions on lobbyists.

"Lobbyists aren't the problem," the Oklahoma Republican said. "Members of Congress are the problem. ... We need transparency."

Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, said he appreciated that Democrats "put politics aside to reach an agreement" on Mr. Gregg's proposal.

"Fiscal responsibility is more than a campaign slogan," Mr. McConnell said when the agreement was announced shortly after 8 p.m. "I trust that my colleagues will stand with the voters and support this commonsense reform."

Mr. Gregg also applauded the deal as "a real victory for the American taxpayer" and called his amendment "an excellent tool against unnecessary spending and I am confident that my colleagues on both sides of the aisle will agree."

The two senators who were not present for last night's voting were hospitalized Sen. Tim Johnson, South Dakota Democrat, and 2008 presidential hopeful Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican.

The Senate last night also voted 55-43 to adopt a Republican amendment that deleted a provision of the ethics bill that would have expanded the definition of lobbyist to include grass-roots organizers, possibly including ministers and neighborhood groups.

Under the legislation, grass-roots organizations that attempt to "influence the general public" to contact members of Congress would have to register as lobbyists and file financial reports -- or face a $200,000 fine.

Democrats had fought unsuccessfully to keep the provision in the bill.

The Senate also defeated, on a 71-27 vote, an amendment that would have created an independent Office of Public Integrity to take over some of the ethics committee's investigative powers. Supporters said that the scandals involving Republican Rep. Mark Foley and lobbyist Jack Abramoff have killed public trust that lawmakers can police themselves.

Supporters say the proposal to limit earmarking strikes at the core of congressional ethics.

Mr. Byrd has added $2.95 billion in pork-barrel projects for West Virginia to appropriation bills since 1991, according to Citizens Against Government Waste (CAGW). Last year, he sent home $239 million in earmark spending, which CAGW calculates to be $131.58 for every West Virginia resident, more than four times the national average of $30.55.

More than 30 public-works projects in West Virginia bear the senator's name, including Robert C. Byrd Highway, Robert C. Byrd Industrial Park, Robert C. Byrd Federal Correctional Institution, Robert C. Byrd Federal Courthouse and two Robert C. Byrd Federal Buildings.

A New Day In Washington, Same As The Old Days (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Just two weeks ago Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell stood side by side, pledging a "new day in Washington" full of bipartisan cooperation. Senators, McConnell said, wanted "to tackle the big issues."

Yesterday, Reid and McConnell started tackling -- each other.

DOJ_NMG_0118725

While senators engaged in a bench-clearing brawl over ethics legislation, Reid and fellow Democrats abandoned the Senate floor and went to the television studio to condemn the Republicans. "What they wanted -- and they were afraid to spew it out of their mouths -- they hate this legislation!" Reid sputtered.

McConnell rushed into the studio minutes after Reid left. "Truly astonishing" is how he described the Democrats' argument. "Absurd on its face."

After a day of bitter exchanges, the two sides finally reached a deal behind closed doors and then went to the Senate floor last night in a public act of reconciliation. Reid praised the Republicans he had just berated. McConnell hailed a "successful example of good negotiating, though it took a while, for a favorable result."

It did seem to be a needlessly difficult journey for legislation that in the end was opposed by only two senators. Just last spring, a nearly identical bill sailed through the Senate with little fuss. On Jan. 4, Reid and McConnell agreed to be sponsors of the ethics bill, the first major piece of legislation before the Senate this session. Reid (Nev.) said that gesture "speaks volumes" about the new bipartisan spirit.

Few believed that boast, but neither did anybody expect what happened Wednesday night on the Senate floor. Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) tripped up the legislation by attempting to add an unrelated poison pill, and McConnell (R-Ky.) led a filibuster. The two sides reached a compromise, only for Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) to scuttle it with a procedural objection that wasn't resolved after nightfall Thursday.

Lawmakers were pointing fingers every which way. Was it Gregg, in the back room, with the non-germane amendment? Or was it McConnell, in the minority leader's office, with the filibuster? Maybe the real culprit was Byrd, on the Senate floor, with the unanimous-consent objection.

"Clearly, any excuse will do for them to bring down an ethics reform bill!" Dick Durbin (Ill.), the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate, charged at a noon news conference.

Sen. Patty Murray (Wash.), facing the cameras with her fellow Democrats, agreed that "what we saw was the Senate Republicans, in a grand act of ethics hypocrisy, shatter the new culture of cooperation in an attempt to kill real reform."

"You can't say that the Republican Party and the Republican membership of the Senate is in any way not trying to move this bill forward," responded Gregg. "The stoppage here," he continued, "is occurring because there is an individual senator on their side who is threatening to filibuster this amendment. . . . I believe they do protest too much."

Democrats seemed to be enjoying themselves a bit too much as they held their news conference condemning the Republicans for temporarily derailing the ethics bill with a "line-item veto" amendment. Though they entered the room with grim faces, Sen. Chuck Schumer (N.Y.) could not suppress a grin. By the time the sixth Democratic speaker, Dianne Feinstein (Calif.) got her turn at microphone, Schumer, Russ Feingold (Wis.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) could be seen behind her, enjoying a chuckle.

"They just pulled the line-item veto rabbit out of a hat as an attempt to stop ethics reform," said Schumer, chairman of the Mixed Metaphor Committee. "The good-ethics train was moving swiftly right down the tracks until the Republicans stopped it, putting the line-item veto log in its path."

Gregg, in his dueling news conference, was defensive on this point. "This is not a line-item veto," he maintained. "This is enhanced rescission." The Republican admitted his proposal "doesn't survive the germaneness test," but he pleaded, "It is relevant."

Finally, in the evening, Gregg and Byrd were placated, and the Senate returned to business. But would subsequent bills be any easier? Reid wasn't optimistic. "I mean, they're not wild about anything I've talked about," he told reporters.

As senators struggled over their ethics disagreement, Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), the minority whip, went to the Senate floor late yesterday. "We've been out here marking time all afternoon," he complained. "Helloooo," he called out to the empty chamber. "It's a quarter to 6."

"This is the kind of thing that I think leads to problems and tarnishes our image, and I wish we could find a way to do things in a more normal way," Lott's lament continued. "But maybe the Senate can't do that."

GSA Chief Scrutinized For Deal With Friend (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0118726

By Scott Higham And Robert O'harrow Jr.

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

The chief of the U.S. General Services Administration attempted to give a no-bid contract to a company founded and operated by a longtime friend, sidestepping federal laws and regulations, according to interviews and documents obtained by The Washington Post.

Administrator Lurita Alexis Doan, a former government contractor appointed by President Bush, personally signed the deal to pay a division of her friend's public relations firm $20,000 for a 24-page report promoting the GSA's use of minority- and woman-owned businesses, the documents show.

The contract was terminated last summer after GSA lawyers and other agency officials pointed out possible procurement violations, including the failure to adequately justify the no-bid deal or have it reviewed in advance by trained procurement officers, officials said.

The GSA's Office of Inspector General has launched an investigation into the episode and briefed Justice Department lawyers, according to sources who said they were not authorized to speak publicly about the ongoing investigation. Officials at the inspector general's office and the Justice Department declined to comment.

In an interview Wednesday, Doan said she believed she was following proper procedures to hire the best firm available to quickly produce a report on diversity practices.

"I made a mistake," Doan said. "I thought I was moving this along. I was immediately informed that I wasn't necessarily moving it along in the way that was best for it. So at which point they canceled it, life went on, no money exchanged hands, no contract exchanged hands.

"I'm stunned, absolutely stunned by the amount of legs that this has taken, you know, how this has like kind of jumped up and run away with things."

The friend, public relations executive Edie Fraser, declined to comment.

"I can't," Fraser said. "I just admire her immensely."

Since assuming the helm of the GSA in May, Doan has repeatedly clashed with others within the agency over her intervention in matters that previous administrators delegated to subordinates, in part to avoid the appearance of political influence. The GSA is the largest broker of goods and services for the federal government, managing nearly $56 billion worth of contracts a year.

Last month, a dispute between Doan and her own inspector general's office became public when The Post reported that she had proposed curtailing the office's contract audits and had compared its enforcement efforts to "terrorism." Doan said she was interested in cutting wasteful spending by the agency and denied making the comparison.

Doan, 49, is a rising political star in the Republican Party who hit turbulence soon after she took over the GSA. She grew up in the downtrodden Ninth Ward section of New Orleans and was one of the first African American children to attend the city's private schools. She later went to Vassar College and obtained an advanced degree in Renaissance literature from the University of Tennessee at Knoxville.

Doan often speaks to groups about overcoming the struggles in her past and reminisces about how her great-grandmother fed the family by selling pralines on the docks in New Orleans. The family home was destroyed during Hurricane Katrina.

She was appointed to run the GSA after a 15-year career as owner of New Technology Management Inc. The Reston-based firm, which provides surveillance equipment for border security and other projects, was named in 2004 as one of the nation's fastest-growing small technology businesses.

During her business career, Doan developed close ties to the GOP. Between 1999 and 2006, she and her husband, Douglas, a former military intelligence officer and business liaison official at the Department of Homeland Security, donated nearly $226,000 to Republican campaigns and causes, documents show.

In 2004, Bush introduced Doan at a Commerce Department event for women who own small businesses. Later that year, Doan was invited to speak at the Republican National Convention in New York. In 2005, Doan sold her firm for an undisclosed sum to a group of investors and retired. At the time, New Technology Management had revenue of nearly $20 million and government contracts worth more than $200 million.

Last spring, the Bush administration asked Doan to take over the GSA, which had been shaken by scandal after lobbyist Jack Abramoff tried to obtain properties under GSA control. Abramoff took then-GSA chief of staff David H. Safavian and others on an all-expense-paid golf trip to Scotland, and Safavian provided Abramoff with inside information about the properties. Both men have been convicted.

On April 6, Bush nominated Doan to be the first female administrator in GSA history. She pledged to make the agency operate more like a private business and to "restore GSA's leadership as the premier contracting and service provider."

On July 25, two months after taking office, Doan signed the no-bid contract with Public Affairs Group Inc. and two of its divisions, the Business Women's Network and Diversity Best Practices. The companies were founded and are operated by Fraser, the president and chief executive of Public Affairs Group and the president of Diversity Best Practices. The contract was signed on the letterhead of the two divisions, and Doan said Diversity Best Practices was to have done the work.

An online newsletter posted by Diversity Best Practices and the Business Women's Network in 2003 called Doan a "partner" and described her as "one of the nation's best and brightest women entrepreneurs."

Deneen Vaughn, a former vice president of Public Affairs Group, told The Post in an interview last week that Doan's company often sponsored programs arranged by the Business Women's Network and spoke at the group's events.

"She's been a longtime friend and business partner of Edie Fraser," said Vaughn, who left the organization in May. "She supported the growth and development of the company, and she mentors other members of our organization."

The companies run by Fraser routinely sponsor diversity-oriented events that attract such luminaries as Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) and Fortune 500 executives.

Early in her career, Fraser worked as an Africa desk officer for the Peace Corps. She later started Edie Fraser Associates, a public relations firm that won a measure of notoriety in 1980 when it secured a $9,800 no-bid contract to study the Commerce Department's public relations office.

Then-Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) gave the deal one of his famous "Golden Fleece" awards for the misuse of tax dollars, saying Commerce already had 112 public relations employees.

In the mid-1980s, Fraser turned her attention to helping female and minority entrepreneurs, producing a series of reports about their changing status in the U.S. economy.

Fraser and Doan have appeared on the same panels and lavished praise and awards on each other at conferences. They also served together on the national advisory board of Enterprising Women, a magazine for female business owners. "Lurita Doan is precisely what this nation needs," the magazine quoted Fraser as saying, admiring Doan's business acumen, in 2003.

Last summer, two weeks before Doan signed the contract with the companies run by Fraser, she attended a star-studded gala sponsored by those companies called "Celebrating Diversity -- the Changing Demographics of America."

"It is so important, as women, to extend that helping hand to one another, that we help mentor each other and give us that extra break that we need to move our way to the top," Doan said, according to a copy of her remarks on an event Web page.

The contract Doan signed with the companies directed them to produce a report promoting GSA's "major achievements" in contracting with minority- and women-owned businesses. The contract called for producing a report that would be "approximately 24 pages." It would contain profiles of diversity success stories at the GSA and include "recommendations for how to use the report."

Doan said she did not use the GSA's public affairs division, which has about a dozen employees who develop information about the agency's programs, because she wanted to employ an expert in the diversity field.

"Diversity Best Practices is the industry leader in this area," she said. "They have won countless awards on diversity representation and issues."

The contract should have been competitively bid, according to procurement experts and officials familiar with the arrangement. Under federal regulations, contracts worth more than $2,500 at the time were to have been open to competition, unless there were extenuating circumstances. Those include disasters and instances in which the bidding process could cause "unacceptable delays in fulfilling the agency's requirements," according to the Federal Acquisition Regulation, which governs all federal contracting.

DOJ_NMG_0118728

The general counsel of the GSA at the time, Alan R. Swendiman, advised Doan to terminate the contract. It was then terminated by a GSA contracting officer. Swendiman left the agency a short time later and is now a special assistant to the president and director of the White House Office of Administration. He declined to comment.

Contracting experts said Doan should have steered clear of the contract.

"Only contracting officers can sign federal contracts and obligate federal funds," said D. Kent Goodger, a federal contracting official for 38 years who now teaches federal procurement courses for the Agriculture Department and other agencies. "Anyone who assumes that they have that authority, like the administrator of GSA, is wrong."

Steven L. Schooner, a procurement specialist at George Washington University's law school, called Doan's involvement in the contract "highly irregular."

"One of the things you're trying to avoid is political favoritism," he said. "You don't want the process polluted or corrupted by political influence."

Doan has taken other steps that have raised questions inside the agency, according to internal memos and e-mails obtained by The Post and interviews with GSA officials.

Last September, Doan intervened in an effort to determine whether five major contractors should be suspended from doing business with the federal government after they had been accused of making fraudulent claims. The firms -- KPMG, Ernst & Young, PricewaterhouseCoopers, Booz Allen Hamilton and BearingPoint Inc. -- had paid the Justice Department more than $66 million to settle allegations that they kept travel rebates from airlines and hotels that should have gone to the GSA, according to agency officials.

The GSA's debarment office initiated "suspension actions" against the companies and issued "show-cause" letters, asking the firms to explain why they should not be suspended or debarred, according to a Sept. 7 e-mail obtained by The Post. Companies found to be engaged in fraud can be suspended or banned from doing business with the federal government.

"I would expect that the companies will respond to me by saying that they have acknowledged their sins, paid restitution and have put in place measures to prevent a recurrence of this activity," GSA debarment official George N. Barclay wrote in the e-mail. "Suspension determinations could be avoided upon such a showing."

Three days later, Doan wrote to several senior GSA officials: "I do not recall this issue EVER coming up in a single management meeting or any meeting for that matter." She asked that the show-cause process be "stopped until cooler heads can prevail."

But the show-cause letters had already been sent, and the companies later avoided suspension or debarment by agreeing to return travel rebates in the future.

Goodger, the former government contracting official, said Doan's involvement was unusual and "creates an appearance of impropriety."

Doan acknowledged that her intervention was unusual but said she did not do anything improper.

"As the head of this agency, I have an obligation to weigh in and say, 'What is this matter, do you know what this matter is?' " she said.

"I don't want to be a rubber-stamp kind of figurehead administrator of this agency. I do not want to participate in the old go-along-to-get-along kind of Washington two-step-type activity. This is not what I'm here for. So, yes, I am going to be involved."

Doan also generated consternation within her agency and on Capitol Hill with her proposals to curb the agency's contract audits and to cut the inspector general's budget by $5 million. The audits, which aim to ensure that the government is getting the best prices for goods and services, have saved taxpayers more than $1 billion over the past two years, the inspector general's office reported.

Doan's efforts prompted senators and congressmen from both parties to write to her, requesting that she halt her plans.

"You have not made a coherent case that explains how your proposal would benefit the taxpayer compared to the system now in place," said one letter signed by three members of Congress, including Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), the new chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, which oversees the GSA.

Doan has said publicly that the proposed cuts were part of an effort to reduce wasteful spending across the agency. Privately, she complained that Inspector General Brian D. Miller and his staff were intimidating GSA employees and vendors. She accused Miller's staff members of leaking budget information and asked for an investigation.

Doan also demanded that Miller notify her of all ongoing criminal probes of GSA employees and provide her with a monthly report of his office's activities. Miller said disclosing the cases could jeopardize investigations, and he disregarded Doan's requests for a leak investigation and monthly reports, according to a Jan. 10 memo obtained by The Post.

Doan said she has been misunderstood and is trying to do the best job she can.

"I bring the sensibility of someone whose favorite song is the national anthem. I love this country," Doan said. "I was one of the chosen ones who has had a chance to really live all aspects of the American dream. I feel so blessed to have this opportunity to give back."

Kerry Calls For Probe Of Pentagon Sales (AP)

By Sharon Theimer

AP, January 19, 2007

Sen. John Kerry on Thursday called for an investigation into security weaknesses in the Defense Department's surplus sales that have let buyers for Iran and China acquire aircraft parts and other valuable military gear.

The Massachusetts Democrat sought an inquiry by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee after The Associated Press reported that in several instances middlemen for the countries had exploited security flaws to acquire sensitive surplus.

The surplus sales include parts for F-14 "Tomcat" fighter jets, a plane retired last year by the United States and now flown only by Iran. Iran bought the jets in the 1970s before the U.S. government banned most exports, including defense-related sales, to the Mideast country.

"There is no way that Iran should be getting these sensitive military parts, especially with the situation in the Mideast so turbulent," Kerry said.

Federal investigators say that in at least one instance, gear purchased from Pentagon surplus got to Iran. A Pakistani arms broker bought Chinook helicopter engine parts for Iran from a U.S. company that had bought them in a Pentagon surplus sale, and those parts made it to Iran, according to Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents. They spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Sensitive surplus is supposed to be rendered useless for military purposes or, if sold, then only to buyers who promise to obey U.S. arms embargoes and other laws.

Defense Department official Fred Baillie said the Pentagon did nothing wrong in selling the surplus and that it was not the agency's fault the items wound up in the wrong hands.

The Pentagon has worked to tighten surplus sale security following a scathing report by the Government Accountability Office last year that identified numerous weaknesses. Measures include trying harder to properly identify surplus before it is marked to safe to sell. If there is doubt about what an item is, it now is destroyed, whereas before it might have been sold, said Baillie, the Defense Logistics Agency's executive director of distribution.

Customs and GAO officials worry about security problems with the program, however, and are seeking assurances the Pentagon will not sell surplus parts from the recently retired F-14 fleet.

Thousands of the components already are set for market. Baillie said that more than half of the roughly 76,000 parts for F-14 are general nuts-and-bolts hardware that the Pentagon surplus program can sell to the public with no restrictions.

About 10,000 are Tomcat-specific and will be destroyed, he said. The rest, about 23,000 parts, are valuable for both military and commercial use and are being reviewed to see whether Pentagon surplus can sell them without jeopardizing national security, Baillie said.

House Votes To Rescind Oil Drillers' Tax Breaks (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

New York Times, January 19, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118730

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — House Democrats easily passed legislation on Thursday that would rescind $14 billion in tax breaks and subsidies for oil drillers and reserve the money to develop alternative energy projects and conservation technologies.

The measure passed 264 to 163, with many Republicans joining a bloc of Democrats. Passage came despite opposition from the oil industry and the Bush administration, which said the bill singled out the companies for higher taxes and could increase the country's dependence on foreign oil.

The bill will rescind $7.6 billion in tax breaks for oil drillers that Congress passed in 2004 and 2005 and will add $6.3 billion in royalties from companies that pump oil and gas in publicly owned waters of the Gulf of Mexico and off Alaska.

One provision is intended to correct errors in drilling leases signed by the Interior Department in the late 1990s that allowed oil companies to escape billions of dollars in royalties over the next decade.

The provision, opposed by the White House and the industry, would require companies that refuse to change their leases to pay a "conservation fee" on each barrel they produce. Otherwise, under the bill, the companies would be barred from acquiring additional leases.

"Big Oil is hitting the taxpayer not once, not twice, but three times," Representative Nick J. Rahall II, Democrat of West Virginia and chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee, said. "They are hitting them at the pump. They are hitting them at the Treasury through the tax code. And they are hitting them with royalty holidays."

Many Republicans complained that the bill would lead to higher gasoline prices by penalizing domestic production and create a "slush fund" for alternative energy projects.

"The San Francisco Democrats want to run the cars on the road with wind," said Representative Steve Pearce, Republican of New Mexico.

Representative Phil English, Republican of Pennsylvania, said the bill would increase energy costs for manufacturers and prompt them to move more jobs abroad.

The bill would also rescind a tax credit for "domestic manufacturing" that oil companies received in 2004 and a much smaller tax break for geological expenses.

The oil vote completed a first wave of measures that House Democratic leaders wanted to pass in their first 100 hours of legislative activity after taking control of Congress.

Senate Democrats are moving more cautiously, but they have signaled that they support most of the bill's provisions and plan to pass them in one form or another.

"I support the principle behind the House bill," said Senator Jeff Bingaman, Democrat of New Mexico, adding that he had asked that the House bill be placed directly on the Senate calendar.

The White House said that it "strongly objects" to much of the measure, arguing that it singled out the oil industry and that the royalty provision undermined the sanctity of binding contracts that the companies had signed.

But President Bush has opposed additional tax breaks and subsidies for oil companies and called for more spending on renewable energy and conservation. The White House stopped short of threatening a veto, and few if any lawmakers expect Mr. Bush to invoke one.

At a hearing of the Senate Energy Committee several hours before the House vote, investigators and Democratic lawmakers criticized the Interior Department's response to the bungled offshore leases.

The Government Accountability Office estimated that the mistake has cost the Treasury $1 billion, and could ultimately cost it $10 billion if the leases remain unchanged.

The leases entitled companies drilling in deep water to avoid royalties on much of their initial production, but in 1998 and 1999 officials during the Clinton administration omitted a standard escape clause that eliminated the incentive if oil prices climbed above $34 a barrel.

Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's inspector general, told the committee that midlevel administrators first spotted the mistake in 2000 but that top officials did not disclose the issue until The New York Times reported on it in February 2006.

Mr. Devaney said that senior officials discussed the issue in March 2004 with the director of the Minerals Management Service, Johnnie M. Burton, but they decided they were powerless to change the leases and dropped the matter.

The agency's silence and reluctance to take action, Mr. Devaney said, was "a shockingly cavalier management approach" and a "jaw-dropping example of bureaucratic bungling."

Ms. Burton did not testify Thursday. C. Stephen Allred, the Interior Department's assistant secretary for land and minerals management, defended Ms. Burton as a person with the "highest integrity."

The House vote on Thursday was an opening skirmish in a broader attempt by Democratic leaders to scale back government financial support for oil and gas producers while ramping up support for renewable energy and conservation.

"Today's vote represents the first step toward a future of energy independence," the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, said.

Oil executives denounced the House vote, though none were surprised that it passed by a wide margin.

"This is purely a political bill playing on the campaign rhetoric of the 2006 election," said Barry Russell, president of the Independent Petroleum Association of America. "At a time when we need more American energy, it simply doesn't make sense to harm those companies that can provide it."

House Democrats offered little clue on Thursday about how they would channel the money from oil producers into alternative and renewable energies. The bill specifies that the money will go to a reserve, which is essentially an accounting device to offset the cost of separate legislation aimed at promoting other sources of energy and efficiency.

Many Republicans complained that Democrats were creating a slush fund with the oil money that would be sealed off from public debate. Democrats responded that the money would be allocated through future legislation that would be debated in Congressional committees and on the House floor.

President Bush is expected to weigh in with proposals in his State of the Union address on Tuesday, and White House officials have said that new energy programs will have a prominent place in the speech.

House Repeals Tax Break For Big Oil (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 19, 2007

House Democrats capped their "100 hours" agenda with the passage of an energy bill yesterday, the sixth piece of legislation approved in two weeks, and Democratic leaders said the package marked "a beginning, not an end" to their legislative ambitions.

Though the six measures still face battles in the Senate and possible veto by the White House, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, boasted that "we made promises and we kept our promises."

Though Republicans complained that they were not given enough opportunities to amend the six bills, an average of 62 GOP lawmakers voted in favor of the measures. Thirty-six Republicans voted for the energy bill adopted yesterday in a 264-163 vote.

But the atmosphere of celebration among Democrats was marred by criticism over House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's decision to create a new Select Committee on Energy Independence and Global Warming.

Pelosi said the committee would be designed to "raise the visibility" of energy and climate change issues, and that it would not have legislative jurisdiction. Many lawmakers saw it as a way to diminish the influence of veteran lawmakers, such as Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), who in the past has guarded the interests of the big U.S. automakers from his state by opposing higher fuel efficiency standards.

Pelosi said she was still looking to the committees on energy, environment and technology to come up with legislation and asked them to do that by July 4.

Dingell held a two-hour meeting yesterday with Democrats on his committee to discuss Pelosi's initiative. "It is unclear what this committee will do besides serve as a distraction to the substantive work already being done by the committee of expertise on this issue," Dingell said later.

Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) has told fellow Democrats that Pelosi asked him to chair the new committee, congressional sources said. Markey has been a vociferous critic of the oil and gas industry.

Pelosi needs a majority vote of the House to create the new committee, and congressional sources said there was talk yesterday of unhappy Democrats joining with Republicans to quash her proposal. "I believe the existing committees can deal effectively with global warming," Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform and author of a climate change proposal, said in a statement. "But I can also understand why the Speaker believes it's important to highlight this issue."

The new committee and the July 4 target were responses to critics who said that yesterday's energy measure did not address key energy policy issues and to the groundswell of activity among companies, lawmakers and state governments who want to do something about climate change.

The measure passed yesterday would repeal a tax break oil and gas firms received in 2004 that effectively lowered their corporate tax rates. It would also bar oil companies from bidding on new federal leases unless they pay a fee on or renegotiated improperly drafted leases from 1998 and 1999 that did not require royalty payments on Gulf of Mexico production. And the bill would take the estimated $13 billion to $15 billion in revenues over a five-year period and set the money aside for tax breaks and appropriations that would go to renewable energy sources.

On Wednesday, the Bush administration said it was opposed to raising corporate tax rates on the oil industry when other manufacturing industries had benefited from the same rate reduction. The Office of Management and Budget also said that the administration was opposed to forcing companies to renegotiate contracts through statutes and said it preferred voluntary agreements with firms over the 1998 and 1999 leases. The OMB also said that using the revenues for new energy sources embodied a "tax and spend philosophy."

Other energy experts have taken issue with the idea of "energy independence" that Pelosi built into the name of the new select committee. Even with major efforts to cut consumption and boost alternative sources, the United States would be hard-pressed to eliminate imports that account for 64 percent of the about 21 million barrels a day of oil currently consumed.

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

The House yesterday passed an energy policy aimed at getting back more than $10 billion in federal royalty payments and eliminating tax relief and other subsidies that oil companies have enjoyed for the past decade.

The Clean Energy Act, which passed on a 264-123 vote, would create a fund called the Strategic Energy Efficiency and Renewables Reserve using the recouped oil dollars. The reserve also would be used to fund more investment in renewable ethanol, wind, hydrogen and biofuels technologies, as well as energy conservation programs.

The energy bill represented the fulfillment of Democrats' promise to pass a package of six bills in the first 100 legislative hours of Congress.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said her party wasn't finished and announced that she would create a Select Committee on Energy Independence and Global Warming.

"I have also instructed my committee chairs to hold hearings so that, by July 4, we will have a package of bills that will truly get us to energy independence in 10 years."

Democrats for years have targeted oil companies that bought and signed federal land leases in 1998 and 1999. Because of a congressional oversight, these companies did not have to pay the royalty fee for oil when its price went above $34.73 a barrel or natural gas when its price rose higher than $4.34 for every million thermal units.

The prices for both oil and natural gas have been well above the royalty thresholds for years, with the loss of more than $10 billion in fees. Democrats say their energy bill will recoup those dollars.

"The American people are owed a fair value for the resources they own. Yet when the government gives tax breaks in the form of royalty relief to Big Oil and fails to accurately monitor its oil leasing programs, it is the American people who are footing the bill," said Rep. Nick J. Rahall II, West Virginia Democrat.

The White House was not pleased with oil and gas incentives that Congress enacted as part of the 2005 Energy Policy Act, calling them unnecessary.

It also opposed mandatory royalty relief and prohibitions on drilling-related user fees and tax incentives allowing some oil firms an almost automatic write-off of certain geological and geophysical expenditures.

DOJ_NMG_0118733

The White House, however, is against the provision to renegotiate the 1998 and 1999 leases that Democrats seek.

The House bill limits the executive's discretionary power to modify royalties by stripping that authority from the secretary of the interior.

A report by the Interior Department's inspector general said the department had not been performing the proper oversight to track oil royalty payments to the federal Treasury and had not engaged in due diligence to ensure oil companies were paying them.

"In the compliance reviews, the Interior Department relies on the information given to them by the oil companies," Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney, New York Democrat, said in response to the report. "This is incompetence, cronyism and it could be corrupt."

The Justice Department has begun an investigation into the matter.

Republicans leaders attempted to block the House bill's passage with motions to adjourn, recommitting the legislation with instructions striking most of the provisions and arguing that passing it by a majority instead of two-thirds vote violated House rules.

"This bill will hurt domestic production and increase the price of oil and gas in this country," said House Minority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican. "If you take away the oil industry's incentives to invest in domestic production, you increase our dependence on foreign oil."

Methodists: No Bush Library At SMU (AP)

By Angela K. Brown

AP, January 19, 2007

A group of Methodist ministers from across the nation launched an online petition drive Thursday urging Southern Methodist University to stop trying to land George W. Bush's presidential library.

The petition, on a new Web site, http://www.protectsmu.org, says that "as United Methodists, we believe that the linking of his presidency with a university bearing the Methodist name is utterly inappropriate."

"Methodists have a long history of social conscience, so questions about the conduct of this president are very concerning," said one of the petition's organizers, the Rev. Andrew J. Weaver of New York, who graduated from SMU's Perkins School of Theology.

Brad Cheves, SMU's vice president for external affairs and development, said Thursday that the Methodist church is diverse in its membership and opinions and that those involved with the petition reflect only one view.

"We believe the vast majority of the Methodist membership, university and community support the library and that it will benefit the faculty, students and community for generations to come," Cheves said.

SMU emerged as the apparent winner in the library competition last month when the site selection committee said it was entering into further discussions with just SMU, the 11,000-student, private university, which is first lady Laura Bush's alma mater. The Bushes are Methodists.

President Bush said Thursday that he was "leaning heavily toward SMU" and was close to a decision.

"I understand there are some who have reservations, and my advice to them is understand that a library and institution would enhance education, be a place for interesting discussion and be a place for people to express their views and write and think, and these universities I think understand that and are excited about the prospects, and so am I," he told Belo Corp. television.

Some SMU professors have opposed Bush's foreign policy, mainly the war in Iraq. Some faculty members also have complained that the library complex's think tank dedicated to the philosophy of the Bush administration would hurt the school's reputation.

But at a faculty meeting Wednesday, SMU President R. Gerald Turner said those fears were unfounded. He said among the library's benefits were increasing the school's visibility nationwide and spurring economic development in the city.

The Rev. Mark Craig — an SMU trustee and senior minister of Highland Park United Methodist Church, where the Bushes are members — said that the petition organizers' views do not reflect the opinion of most church members and that the petition would not affect decisions about the library.

"The library is not about politics," Craig said. "The library is about history, having U.S. history from a period of eight years and that conveyed to a great academic institution."

The project will be financed with a private fund drive aimed at raising at least $200 million.

While SMU's president said his university's exclusive talks with the selection committee would resume in a few days, the other finalists are Baylor University in Waco and the University of Dallas. A decision is expected in a few months, when Bush receives a recommendation from the committee.

Ambushing The Bush Legacy (WSJ)

By Naomi Schaefer Riley

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

In an interview Sunday night on "60 Minutes," President Bush told Scott Pelley that he is "not the kind of guy who sits here and says 'Oh gosh, I'm worried about my legacy.' I'm more worried about making the right decisions to protect the United States of America."

It's a noble sentiment, but with less than two years left in his presidency, Mr. Bush and his supporters do have to make some decisions about his legacy, or at least where it will be housed.

In December, the committee charged with selecting a location for W's presidential library announced that it had narrowed down the candidates from three to one, eliminating Baylor University and the University of Dallas in favor of Southern Methodist University, Laura Bush's alma mater. The proposed library will include, in addition to presidential papers and artifacts, a public-policy institute to further "domestic and international goals." Among the goals mentioned by the selection committee are "compassionate conservatism, the spread of freedom and democracy throughout the world and defeating terrorism."

It all sounds quite worthy, but certain members of the SMU faculty did not react well to the news of their campus's selection. In an op-ed article for the college newspaper, two professors from the university's theology school asked: "Do we want SMU to benefit financially from a legacy of massive violence, destruction and death brought about by the Bush presidency in dismissal of broad international opinion?"

A letter sent to SMU's president last week, signed by 68 current and past members of the faculty, echoed this theme. It expressed concern about "certain actions and attitudes of President Bush during his term in office," including (draw a deep breath here): "the erosion of habeas corpus, denial of global warming, disrespect of international treaties, alienation of longtime U.S. allies, environmental predation, disregard for the rights of gay persons, a pre-emptive war based on false premises and other perceived forms of disrespect for the created order and the global community."

Which raises the question: Why would Mr. Bush want to have anything to do with such hostile -- not to mention graceless and cliché-obsessed -- people? Why not look elsewhere for his library's site? Admittedly the professors who signed the letter make up less than 10% of SMU's faculty. But presidential libraries inevitably bring a degree of prominence, even prestige, to the universities that host them. Why should Mr. Bush and his friends give SMU the satisfaction? One can easily imagine Cindy Sheehan parading around the university grounds for years to come with hordes of sociology professors and student activists following her.

Locating presidential libraries at universities has become "de rigueur" only recently, according to Richard Norton Smith, the former director of five presidential libraries. Up through Eisenhower, Mr. Smith notes, such libraries were located at places of "special significance" to the president. And for good reason. "If you want to understand FDR," says Mr. Smith, "you have to understand Hyde Park," where Roosevelt grew up.

Typically, campus sites mean controversy. Herbert Hoover's library started at Stanford, but he moved it to his home state of Iowa out of fear that left-wing faculty would tarnish his legacy. When LBJ's library opened in 1971 at the University of Texas, Austin, thousands of protesters showed up. Duke rejected Nixon's library altogether. And the Reagan library was chased out of Stanford for largely ideological reasons.

Mr. Smith believes that faculty objections are shortsighted. "With rare exceptions, presidential libraries have contributed to the intellectual and cultural life of universities. They expose students to a whole range of history and policy makers. And it's very bipartisan exposure." It is true that such libraries serve, in part, as monuments to particular presidencies. But scholars and students are free to use the library contents as they please, of course. And the library's own exhibits may well change as new sources of information become available. Mr. Smith cites the way in which the newly discovered Johnson tapes -- showing his ambivalence about the Vietnam War -- changed the way that library presented the president's role in the conflict.

For a faculty sick with Bush rage, none of this seems to matter. The negotiations with SMU are moving forward, but what are Mr. Bush's options? One suspects that Baylor, an evangelical school, and the University of Dallas, a conservative Catholic school, would both be more hospitable environments. But why bother with universities at all? The Bush presidency owes very little to them. Compassionate conservatism, spreading democracy and defeating terrorism are hardly at the top of most academic agendas. Why not offer the library to the American Enterprise Institute or the Manhattan Institute? Or why not raise a little more money and just put it on the ranch in Crawford, Texas? Whatever else you can say about President Bush, his administration has rarely been "de rigueur."

NTEU Closer To Representing Customs And Border Workers (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

One of the largest union elections ever conducted inside the government has moved a step closer to resolution.

The Washington regional director of the Federal Labor Relations Authority, in a decision issued late Wednesday, said the National Treasury Employees Union should be certified to represent about 30,000 workers in Customs and Border Protection, a major bureau in the Homeland Security Department.

NTEU defeated the American Federation of Government Employees last June -- 7,349 to 3,426 -- for the right to represent the employees. AFGE filed objections to the election, but a review conducted by Robert P. Hunter, the Washington FLRA regional director, found no merit to the claims.

The election was forced by the merger four years ago that consolidated 22 federal agencies into the Homeland Security Department. Many of those agencies had unionized workforces, including Customs and Border Protection, which absorbed the old U.S. Customs Service, the former Immigration and Naturalization Service and parts of other agencies. In 2004, the department filed a petition requesting the election to clarify union jurisdiction issues, which set up the showdown between AFGE and NTEU.

Bush administration officials have closely followed the election battle because the union that is certified as the winner will gain a larger voice in workplace issues and perhaps even policy debates on Capitol Hill.

As part of the Homeland Security reorganization, Customs and Border Protection recast many of the "legacy" employees into a new occupational grouping, CBP officers. They work at about 300 ports and border crossings and are widely seen as crucial to the fight against terrorism. Most of the CBP officers came from the ranks of customs employees, traditionally represented by NTEU, and immigration employees, represented by AFGE.

After NTEU won the election at Customs and Border Protection, AFGE filed an appeal that alleged agency managers had been biased toward NTEU and had interfered with the AFGE campaign. CBP denied the allegations, and Hunter dismissed the AFGE claims in his decision.

"It has not been shown that any of the matters raised, whether considered separately or cumulatively, are sufficient to set the election aside," Hunter wrote. "In sum, all objections are dismissed and the certification to NTEU should be issued without further delay."

Under the election rules, AFGE can ask the members of the Federal Labor Relations Authority to review the regional director's decision. AFGE leaders were traveling from a conference in Houston yesterday and declined to say whether they would appeal, noting that they had not read the 84-page decision.

Colleen M. Kelley, the NTEU president, said she hopes AFGE will not appeal and that her union can soon begin efforts to bargain over work assignments, overtime and alternative work schedules.Bill to Stop IRS Outsourcing

Sens. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.) and Patty Murray (D-Wash.) introduced legislation yesterday to stop the Internal Revenue Service from using private companies to collect unpaid taxes.

They cited concern that the outsourcing plan might be more costly than projected and could jeopardize taxpayer privacy. They also noted that the taxpayer advocate at the IRS, Nina Olson, had recommended the IRS halt the plan.

White House Usher Reflects On His Bosses (WP)

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Chief White House Usher Gary Walters is retiring at the end of January. He has worked at the mansion since 1970 and for the past two decades has been in charge of the operation of the world's most famous residence. In an interview with C-SPAN's Brian Lamb that will air Sunday evening, Walters offered his reflections on the presidents and first ladies he has served. Some excerpts:

Richard Nixon: Quiet, extremely studious. I mean, he didn't become such a master of Chinese policy by rote.

Jimmy Carter: Tremendously smart, involved in minutia, almost to his detriment. . . . He was the one that liked to . . . walk around the grounds, and he wanted to know every tree, every plant, both the botanical name and the common name.

Bill Clinton: Workaholic. He was constantly working. And a memory that just caused all of us to wonder how in the world anybody could remember all the things he did.

President Bush : The steadfastness of his beliefs in what he's doing. . . . In his mind, this is the road to go down, and he has not wavered.

Laura Bush: Knows what she wants, but is . . . willing . . . to sit and look at something for a while before she makes a decision. She wants to have it right.

Hillary Rodham Clinton: Liked to work. She was a worker.

Nancy Reagan: The easiest person in the world to work for. Most people don't believe that when I tell them that.

Cheney's Enigmatic Influence (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

After six years, it remains one of Washington's enduring mysteries: How does Vice President Cheney shape decisions in the tight inner circle of the Bush administration? There's a sense that Cheney's influence is on the rise again, at least with Iraq policy, but that's after many months in which his allies say his role was diminished.

To outside observers, Cheney has been the political equivalent of a black hole -- exerting a powerful but mostly invisible force on decisions. The office of the vice president has had a gravitational weight that sucked in other personalities and entire branches of the government without emitting light or heat that would explain the decision-making process.

During Bush's first term, the "OVP," as it's known in Washington, functioned as a kind of parallel national security staff. Lewis "Scooter" Libby was a strong chief of staff, and he hired talented foreign policy experts -- Eric Edelman and then Victoria Nuland -- to act, in effect, as Cheney's national security advisers. During Bush's second term, that role was taken on by John Hannah, a former policy researcher at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. But insiders say that since Libby's departure in 2005, the OVP has had less of an impact on foreign policy.

"What has defined the OVP since Scooter left is listlessness," says one Cheney ally. "For 18 months, it was defined by its torpidity. That was deeply distressing" to Cheney's conservative supporters, who feared that Bush had become captive to overly cautious advice from his senior military commanders, Gen. John Abizaid and Gen. George Casey.

This month's change in Iraq policy, in which Bush turned away from the patient strategy his military commanders had advocated, may have marked a return of Cheney's influence. But insiders caution that it's a mistake to see Cheney as some kind of puppet master on Iraq policy and that the key decisions have been made by Bush himself.

The thrust of Cheney's views -- in urging the president to ignore politics and maintain a tough course on Iraq -- surfaced in an interview he gave last weekend to Chris Wallace of Fox News. Wallace noted that Iraq was a big issue in the November elections and that exit polls showed only 17 percent of voters supported sending in more troops. What followed was this remarkable exchange:

Wallace: "By taking the policy you have, haven't you, Mr. Vice President, ignored the express will of the American people in the November election?"

The vice president: "Well, Chris, this president, and I don't think any president worth his salt, can afford to make decisions of this magnitude according to the polls. The polls change day by day."

Wallace: "This was an election, sir."

The vice president: "Polls change day by day, week by week."

Those remarks capture what Cheney's friends say is his crucial contribution to internal decisions -- a conviction that much of the political debate in Washington is just noise and should be ignored in favor of the country's long-term interests.

"Over the years, he got tired of suffering fools," says one longtime Cheney friend. "He thinks it's all BS." This contempt for Washington developed when Cheney was a top White House aide in the Ford administration during the cacophony that followed Watergate, this friend says, and it ripened when he made enough money as chief executive of Halliburton that he didn't have to care what people in Washington thought. The danger is that in encouraging Bush to ignore polls and even elections, Cheney has helped set up a confrontation between Congress and the executive branch that could undermine any hope of achieving a bipartisan approach on Iraq.

While Cheney seems to have prevailed on Iraq, he appeared to suffer a defeat in this week's White House decision to submit the warrantless surveillance program to the oversight of the FISA court. Many administration lawyers urged that course over the past several years, but it was strongly resisted by Cheney's current chief of staff, David Addington, who argued that the president had inherent authority to authorize the program under his war-making powers. "Addington clearly lost this round," says one official who met with him about the National Security Agency program.

The mystery of how Cheney operates may finally be clarified in the coming trial of Libby. The vice president will be called to testify on behalf of his former chief of staff, whom he described to Wallace last week as "one of the finest individuals I've ever known." That was pure Cheney -- the stand-up guy from Wyoming.

Cheney's testimony, in person or by affidavit, about the use of classified information will go to the heart of the Cheney puzzle: How does the most important but elusive presidential adviser in modern history use his power behind the scenes?

Bernanke Warns Budget Could Hurt Economy (AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, January 19, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke warned on Thursday that the economy could be gravely hurt if Social Security and Medicare aren't revamped, and he urged lawmakers to tackle the nation's thorny fiscal issues sooner rather than later.

"If early and meaningful action is not taken, the U.S. economy could be seriously weakened," Bernanke told the Senate Budget Committee. Future generations, he said, will bear much of the cost.

It marked the Fed chief's most forceful warning to date on the potential problems facing the United States with the looming retirement of 78 million baby boomers, the oldest of whom will start retiring next year.

This huge wave of retirees will hit the U.S. budget as well as the economy, Bernanke said.

"The longer we wait, the more severe, the more Draconian, the more difficult the objective — the adjustments are going to be. I think the right time to start is about 10 years ago," he told lawmakers when questioned about the urgency of the situation.

Absent policy changes by Congress and the White House, rising budget deficits are likely in the years ahead to increase the amount of federal debt outstanding to unprecedented levels, Bernanke said.

That could propel interest rates for consumers and businesses upward, which would be a worrisome development, he said.

"Thus a vicious cycle may develop in which large deficits lead to rapid growth in debt and interest payments, which in turn adds to subsequent deficits," he said. Ultimately, a big expansion of the nation's debt "would spark a fiscal crisis, which could be addressed only by very sharp spending cuts or tax increases or both," Bernanke warned.

After a bitter election season, both Democrats and Republicans on the Senate panel have promised to try to deal with the spiraling costs of federal entitlement programs.

Sen. Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, the committee's top-ranking Republican, called Bernanke's warning "right on, and a clarion call that I hope folks will listen to."

Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad, D-N.D., said: "We hope people are listening about the need for us to address these long-term imbalances, to take these challenges on, and the sooner we do so, the better."

The budget deficit last year totaled $248 billion, a four-year low. Bernanke noted the improvement but likened it to a "calm before the storm."

Spending on entitlement programs will begin to climb quickly during the next decade, he said. Federal spending for Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid will total about 15 percent of the gross domestic product by 2030, compared to roughly 8 1/2 percent of GDP in 2006, he said.

Forecasts call for the deficit to worsen for the 2007 budget year. The Congressional Budget Office is projecting $286 billion in red ink, while the White House is predicting an even bigger shortfall of $339 billion.

Bernanke said that economic growth alone is unlikely to solve the nation's impending fiscal problems.

Fixing the problems, he said, will take persistence and a willingness by Congress and the White House to make difficult choices. It will be up to those policymakers to find the right balance between taxes and spending, he said.

The Fed chief steered away from offering specific solutions.

"In the end, the fundamental decision that Congress, the administration and the American people must confront is how large a share of the nation's economic resources to devote to federal government programs, including transfer programs such as Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid," he said.

President Bush wants to work on the looming insolvency of the Social Security program. But his one-time plan to add private accounts to the system withered in 2005 after meeting resistance from Democrats and Republicans alike, and is a nonstarter now that Democrats are in charge.

Bush has tapped Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to gather ideas on how to restructure the program. And the president says he wants to work with Congress on a plan to balance the budget in five years.

Bernanke, who took over the Fed last February, made his case in somewhat starker terms than his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, who had repeatedly sounded the alarm about the dangers to the economy from exploding entitlement costs, some economists said.

"Bernanke didn't mince his words. He wasn't trying to candycoat the situation," said Brian Bethune, economist at Global Insight. "I think Greenspan was a little more diplomatic ... but at this point, a little more frankness is maybe what Congress needs."

Bernanke Warns US Of 'fiscal Crisis' Fear (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Eoin Callan In Washington And Tony Tassell In London

Financial Times, January 19, 2007

Ben Bernanke stepped up the pressure on Congress to address the budgetary impact of soaring spending on entitlement programmes on Thursday, warning that they could one day cause a "fiscal crisis" in the US.

The Federal Reserve chairman told the Senate budget committee that the recent improvement in US public finances was only the "calm before the storm".

He urged immediate action to head off the looming Medicare and Social Security funding gap, saying the right time to start was “ten years ago”. But Mr Bernanke refused to comment on whether this should be done by curbing spending, raising taxes or some combination of the two, saying that was for elected officials to decide.

His uncharacteristically hard-hitting intervention came as data revealed that US inflation rebounded in December, all but ruling out any chance that the Federal Reserve would cut interest rates soon. The Fed chief said that without new policies, entitlement spending would result in mounting fiscal deficits, and the effect on the “vibrancy, efficiency and growth rate of oureconomy” would soon be “palpable”.

His tough talk will make it more difficult for the newly elected Congress to shy away from politically explosive entitlement reform, and may help Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson’s efforts to entice some Democrats into joining a bi-partisan push on Social Security.

Mr Bernanke, though, identified Medicare as the core of the threat, describing it as a “much bigger problem than Social Security”. He called for a root-and-branch overhaul of the US health sector to cut costs and increase efficiency. In other comments, Mr Bernanke expressed mildly more concern about the external deficit than did his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, saying there was “good reason” to consider that it “needs to start coming down slowly”.

Mr Bernanke also reiterated his view that it was better to discipline hedge funds indirectly via counterparty banks than to seek to regulate them directly.

The consumer price index rose 0.5 per cent in the month, driven by a 4.6 per cent jump in energy prices, which had fallen in previous months. The higher-than-expected increase ended a two-month run of softer prices that had raised hopes the Fed would quickly drop its bias towards tightening rates and start preparing the ground for rate cuts in the spring or early summer.

Core CPI – which excludes volatile energy and food costs, and is more closely watched by the Fed – rose 0.2 per cent, after being flat in November.

US government bond markets were little moved in reaction, with the yield on the benchmark 10-year bond edging up 0.2 basis points to 4.787 per cent.

Fed Chairman Warns Congress On National Debt (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Benjamin S. Bernanke delivered a stern warning to members of Congress this morning to address the national debt, which has spiraled due to spending on federal programs, especially Social Security and Medicare, and threatens to harm the national economy.

"The longer we wait, the more severe, the more draconian, the more difficult the objectives are going to be," Bernanke said. "The right time to start was about 10 years ago."

Sen. Kent Conrad, (D-N.D.) chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, which called Bernanke in for advice, described his comments as "a clarion call."

"These long-term imbalances are threatening the long-term stability of the country," Conrad said.

At the end of last fiscal year, the federal debt consumed 37% of gross domestic product, Bernanke said during the two-hour hearing today.

Although the federal budget deficit reached a four-year low last year of $248 billion, Bernanke called it, "the calm before the storm," given the growth in federal spending. The Congressional Budget Office is projecting a $286 billion deficit this year; the White House $339 billion.

"A vicious cycle may develop in which large deficits lead to rapid growth in debt and interest payments, which in turn add to subsequent deficits," Bernanke said.

Federal spending for Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid was 8.5% of GDP last year and is expected to reach 15% by 2030, Bernanke said.

DOJ_NMG_0118740

"In the end, the fundamental decision that Congress, the administration and the American people must confront is how large a share of the nation's economic resources to devote to federal government programs, including transfer programs such as Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid," he said.

Bernanke resisted taking a position on the merits of tax cuts, beyond observing that, "The general view is that tax cuts do not pay for themselves."

During questioning by Sen. Bernie Sanders (D-Vt.), Bernanke defended free trade policies, such as NAFTA and trade normalization with China, saying they are not to blame for causing the national trade deficit. He believes the widening gap is largely due to the historically low national savings rate and tepid investment.

Bernanke offered several suggestions to increase federal revenues and reduce spending, including streamlining the federal tax code to reduce the tax gap between what Americans owe and pay; increasing savings incentive programs; recalculating Social Security benefits and experimenting with new cost-saving Medicare and Medicaid healthcare programs.

Bernanke Raises Prospect Of 'Debt Spiral' (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke warned that rising health-care and Social Security spending could create a "vicious cycle" of rising debt and interest payments and an eventual fiscal crisis.

Watch Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's opening remarks7 to the Senate Budget Committee. (15:20)

Though Mr. Bernanke lacks the stature of his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, his strong language, coupled with what appears to be a growing respect for his views from lawmakers in both parties, could add impetus to efforts to overhaul entitlement programs, principally Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid.

They currently amount to almost half of federal noninterest spending and 9% of gross domestic product, or the value of all goods and services produced in a nation. The Congressional Budget Office, assuming no change in the programs, extension of Mr. Bush's tax cuts and continued moderate growth in health-care spending, projects that will rise to 75% of spending and 19% of GDP by 2050.

What do you think of Fed Chairman Bernanke's dire warnings on the budget deficit?9

Mr. Bernanke's advice, delivered at a hearing of the Senate Budget Committee yesterday, comes days before President Bush's State of the Union address and weeks before his 2008 budget request. In the first six years of his presidency, Mr. Bush expanded Medicare significantly while cutting taxes repeatedly. He is seeking to preserve those tax cuts in the face of a Democratic-controlled Congress, while seeking -- through Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson -- to revive an overhaul of Social Security.

Since taking office last year, Mr. Bernanke has met extensively with members of both parties, and the outreach appears to be paying off. Budget Committee Chairman Sen. Kent Conrad of North Dakota yesterday thanked Mr. Bernanke for insights he provided over lunch a few weeks ago. "You've sent a very clear message and one that I hope people are paying close attention to," Mr. Conrad said. The panel's senior Republican, Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, called Mr. Bernanke's testimony "a clarion call."

The bipartisan praise also reflects the fact that Mr. Bernanke's diagnosis was generally uncontroversial. While that protects the Fed's reputation for political independence, it may limit Mr. Bernanke's impact on the fiscal debate. Mr. Greenspan was influential in part because he made specific recommendations, such as the passage of tax cuts in 2001. Democrats often cited his support for Paygo -- a budget rule meant to keep tax cuts and new entitlement programs from boosting the deficit -- in making it a key plank in their fiscal platform.

Mr. Bernanke steered clear of specifics on entitlement overhaul in his testimony and anything that could be construed as criticism of President Bush, for whom Mr. Bernanke previously served as an adviser. Despite senators' praise, it is unclear whether his advice will have much direct impact.

The Fed chief noted that last year's budget deficit, spending and revenue were, as shares of GDP, close to averages that have prevailed since 1960. That is a point the White House often makes to deflect charges that its tax cuts have led to dangerously large deficits. Mr. Bernanke said this was the "calm before the storm." Spending on Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid are about to ramp up, he said, as the population ages.

While breaking no new ground, Mr. Bernanke's testimony was notable for its emphasis on the consequences of a rising national debt -- the sum of all annual budget deficits -- rather than the annual deficit alone. The debt, he noted, would reach almost 100% of GDP by 2030 according to the Congressional Budget Office, a level previously reached only during World War II. The annual interest on that debt would be 4.6% of GDP, triple the current level. 12

"A vicious cycle may develop in which large deficits lead to rapid growth in debt and interest payments, which in turn adds to subsequent deficits," he said. Similar "debt spirals" have contributed to financial crises in other countries, a subject Mr. Bernanke studied as an academic. "Ultimately, this expansion of debt would spark a fiscal crisis, which could be addressed only by very sharp spending cuts or tax increases, or both," he said.

Mr. Bernanke didn't predict -- as more pessimistic analysts have -- that such a crisis would entail sharply higher interest rates or a sharply weaker dollar. Still, he noted higher debts would divert capital from growth-enhancing investments and funnel more of Americans' income to foreign bondholders. This will "have an effect on the vibrancy, efficiency and growth rate of our economy, which will be palpable," he said.

Mr. Bernanke took office promising to be less outspoken on fiscal policy than Mr. Greenspan. In his initial appearances before Congress, he irritated some legislators by refusing to comment on specific topics. Yesterday's appearance suggests he has refined his approach. Asked a year ago about restoring Paygo, he said the Fed chairman "should not be involved in making specific recommendations about [Congress's] internal decision-making process." Asked the same question yesterday, he said, "I don't really have the expertise to advise on [those] types of rules."

Fed Chief Warns That Entitlement Growth Could Harm Economy (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — Warning against complacency over the federal deficit, Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, said Thursday that recent positive trends on the budget were a “calm before the storm,” masking a long-term danger posed by looming deficits in Social Security and Medicare.

“The longer we wait, the more severe, the more draconian, the more difficult the adjustment is going to be,” Mr. Bernanke said in response to a question at a Senate hearing about when lawmakers should tackle the growth of spending in the twin entitlement programs. “I think the right time to start is about 10 years ago.”

Mr. Bernanke’s comments were consistent with his past warnings, and those of his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, about the unfinanced cost of the postwar generation’s retirement. But his tone was more urgent, and it seemed aimed at the arrival of a new Democratic-led Congress that is just now setting its priorities.

His comments also dovetailed with statements by the Treasury secretary, Henry M. Paulson Jr., favoring efforts to curb the cost of entitlements this year, despite skepticism among some lawmakers that painful steps to deal with the problem cannot be taken two years before a presidential election.

Mr. Paulson has begun discussions with leading Democrats in Congress on Social Security and budget matters, but the administration has not shown its hand with specific proposals. President Bush’s earlier proposal to convert a portion of Social Security benefits for some future retirees into individual investment accounts failed to even reach a vote in Congress.

Mr. Bernanke’s tone of urgency echoed the comments of Senator Kent Conrad, a North Dakota Democrat who has long criticized the Bush administration’s tax cuts and warned of the risk of long-term federal deficits. Only now, Mr. Conrad was leading the hearing and welcoming Mr. Bernanke’s warnings. Before Mr. Bernanke took office, he initially told lawmakers that he would avoid commenting on fiscal policy once he became Fed chairman. But like his predecessors, he has found it hard to stay out of the debate, especially when Congressional leaders demand to hear his views.

Still, Mr. Bernanke was careful not to enter the partisan fray over taxes and spending on Capitol Hill. He said repeatedly it was not his role to dictate how Congress should deal with the problem, despite efforts by Mr. Conrad and other Democrats to get him to oppose extending the Bush administration's tax cuts, which expire in 2010.

Neither did Republican senators succeed in prodding him to praise the Bush tax cuts specifically or tax cuts generally, as they used to be able to do with Mr. Greenspan. The previous Fed chairman said frequently that it would be better to reduce spending than increase taxes, and his support of the Bush tax cuts in 2001 angered Democrats and helped ease their passage.

Instead, Mr. Bernanke, in his first testimony since the election remade the political landscape in Congress, said it was up to lawmakers to decide what levels of spending on social programs are appropriate, and then set taxes at a level necessary to pay for them.

Asked by Republicans to echo their view that taxes lead to increased revenues, Mr. Bernanke said that tax cuts spur economic growth but that they "usually do not pay for themselves" by generating more tax revenue than they drain from the Treasury.

"I'm going to try to avoid making specific recommendations on tax policy," he said in response to a question from Senator Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, the ranking Republican on the Senate Budget Committee. "I don't think there's a magic number. I only say that there is a difficult balance there."

To another Republican senator, Wayne Allard of Colorado, Mr. Bernanke referred to the cost of government programs and said: "Whatever it is, you have to pay for it. That's what I'm saying."

Mr. Gregg also sought to make the point that, under Mr. Bush, the federal deficit had declined in the last two years because of rising tax revenues resulting from economic growth. Mr. Bernanke's entire testimony was intended to say that, while true, this trend was virtually irrelevant to the problem at hand.

The Fed chairman came to a hearing of the Senate Budget Committee citing recent long term projections by the Congressional Budget Office that Social Security and Medicare outlays will rise from 8.5 percent of annual economic output to 10.5 percent in 2015 and 15 percent in 2030.

These costs, in turn, would force the United States to keep borrowing, pushing the ratio of publicly held federal debt from its current level of 37 percent of the economy to about 100 percent in 2030, a level reached in the past only during World War II.

"If government debt and deficits were actually to grow at the pace envisioned by the C.B.O.'s scenario, the effects on the U.S. economy would be severe," Mr. Bernanke told the committee. He said the trends would slow economic growth, drain away funds for private investment and sap confidence of consumers, businesses and investors.

Mr. Paulson's negotiations with Congress have been very preliminary, his aides say. The talks will probably not begin in earnest until after President Bush's State of the Union speech on Jan. 23, when he is expected to outline not only his approach on entitlements but on the overall budget.

Mr. Bush has said that the tax cuts are all but sacrosanct in his view, and Democratic leaders say they do not expect to try this year to rescind even the parts of them that most benefit the rich. Administration officials say they are waiting for the Democrats to lay out their own approach to the budget, taxes and entitlements.

Mr. Bernanke seemed to go out of his way to agree with every questioner, but he flatly disputed the trade views of Senator Bernard Sanders of Vermont, newly elected as an independent but who describes himself as a socialist and votes as a Democrat.

When Mr. Sanders said that recent trade deals with China and with Mexico and Canada had eroded jobs, the Fed chairman said: "I don't agree with that." He said that the nation's $800 billion trade deficit resulted from a low savings and high consumption rate in the United States, not those or other trade deals.

Bernanke Renews Debt Warning (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118743

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke warned Congress yesterday of a "fiscal crisis" if it doesn't curb the projected growth of federal spending on retirement and health-care programs.

Echoing similar warnings by his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, Bernanke told the Senate Budget Committee that "the effects on the U.S. economy would be severe" if the government's debt were allowed to balloon as forecast.

Bernanke noted that the federal deficit has declined in the past two years but said that was "the calm before the storm" of skyrocketing expenses for an aging population. He cited Congressional Budget Office projections that spending on the big entitlement programs -- Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid -- will equal 15 percent of the nation's gross domestic product by 2030, double last year's level.

Bernanke, who was a top White House economic adviser until last year, declined to take a position on whether to extend President Bush's tax cuts, many of which are set to expire by 2010. He said he would be nonpartisan as Fed chairman, offering general economic analysis but no specific recommendations on taxes or spending.

The "difficult choices" of how to balance the government's spending and revenue should be made by Congress, the White House and the public, he said.

The federal deficit fell last year to $248 billion, 1.9 percent of the nation's total economic output, by one commonly cited measure. But the deficit would have been $434 billion, or 3.3 percent of gross domestic product, if the government hadn't borrowed from Social Security, Bernanke said.

He also decried "burdensome" tax rules and said Congress might raise tax receipts by making them simpler.

Inflation At 3-Year Low (WP)

By Nell Henderson And Howard Schneider

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Inflation fell in 2006 to its lowest rate in three years, as tumbling fuel prices and a slowing economy cooled the pace of consumer price increases.

Other figures released yesterday showed unexpected signs of improvement in the housing market, adding to an overall picture of an economy that ended the year in relatively good health.

Low inflation is a critical component of the economy's health, allowing consumers and businesses to make financial decisions without worrying that their wages, savings or profits will be eroded by price increases. Inflation rose to worrisome levels in 2004 and 2005, leading to a series of interest-rate increases that helped send the housing market into a tailspin.

Ebbing inflation means that the Federal Reserve may avoid raising interest rates this year, holding them at levels likely to keep unemployment low and encourage economic growth.

Several analysts said, however, that inflation trends in recent years have mirrored swings in oil prices -- which have fallen lately but could go up again. The analysts also said the unusually warm weather last month might have encouraged more hiring, shopping and home construction, temporarily brightening the economic picture in December.

And though inflation has fallen, Federal Reserve policymakers think it remains too high. They expect the housing downturn to help keep economic growth moderate this year while keeping prices down.

Stock prices fell yesterday as many investors abandoned hope that the Fed might cut interest rates in the first half of the year to boost economic growth. Instead, the central bankers are considered virtually certain not to change rates at their meeting in two weeks, while declaring that they will raise them if inflation proves to be more stubborn than they expect.

The latest inflation numbers are "sufficient to encourage the Fed but not enough to enable the central bank to relax its guard against higher inflation," said Peter Kretzmer, a senior economist at Banc of America Securities.

Consumer prices rose 2.5 percent in 2006, largely reflecting rising costs for health care, food and rental housing, the Labor Department said. That pace was significantly lower than the 3.4 percent inflation of 2005, and was the smallest increase since 2003.

The annual change masked the volatility of fuel prices, which had surged in late 2005 after Hurricane Katrina and other storms. Oil prices rose through much of 2006 as well, peaking at more than $77 a barrel in July but then falling through the end of the year to about $63 a barrel. By December, fuel prices were 2.6 percent higher than a year earlier.

The department's consumer price index, a widely followed measure of inflation, rose 0.5 percent in December because of a sharp rebound in fuel prices that month.

Fuel prices caused inflation to outpace most workers' wage gains again last month. Average weekly earnings fell 0.1 percent in December from the month before, after adjusting for price increases, the Labor Department said in a separate report. But for the year, so-called real wages were up 2.1 percent. Those are the wages paid to non-managerial and manufacturing employees on private payrolls, who make up about 80 percent of the workforce.

Oil prices have fallen this month, which should dampen the January inflation figure. U.S. benchmark crude closed at $50.48 a barrel yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Because oil prices can swing so much, economists and investors seek a sense of underlying inflation by studying so-called core measures that exclude food and fuel. The core consumer price index rose 0.2 percent in December, partly reflecting higher clothing and rental costs.

Core prices were up 2.6 percent for all of 2006 -- the most since 2001, the department said. But they fell to a 1.4 percent annual rate of increase in the last three months of the year.

In a separate report, the Census Bureau said builders broke ground on 4.5 percent more new homes in December than in November. And they obtained 5.5 percent more permits for future construction.

Those were surprising jumps, given that housing has been in the doldrums for months. Many analysts attributed the increases to warm weather in December, discounting the odds of a rebound in housing construction anytime soon. Many builders and investors are still struggling to unload bloated inventories of unsold homes.

Some observers disagreed. "Builders are not going to take on more construction loans, pay off contractors and put up new homes just because the weather has turned warmer," said Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group. "Builders are motivated by one thing: the prospect that home buyers are seriously shopping again."

Economy Seems To Be Holding Its Own, But Inflation Risk Persists (NYT)

By Louis Uchitelle

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

The economy seems to be shaking off a slowdown brought on by the precipitous drop in housing, the latest economic data suggested yesterday.

More new home construction was started in December than in November, the Census Bureau reported, and the Consumer Price Index, the nation's best-known inflation gauge, rose at its fastest pace in eight months — on the surface, at least, an indication of robust demand. Fine print in the reports, however, signaled that the five-year-old recovery is far from being on solid ground.

"The economy is performing significantly better than many economists had expected as recently as a month ago," said Lynn Reaser, chief economist for the Investment Strategies Group at Bank of America. "But the housing downturn and cutbacks in auto production are still likely to hamper growth."

The housing starts came in at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.6 million units, up 4.5 percent from the November rate. The number of building permits issued last month also rose, suggesting that prices may have fallen enough to draw people back into the market.

Nevertheless, the increase in construction starts was entirely in apartment buildings. Builders started fewer single-family homes in December than in November. And compared with a year ago, permits and construction for any type of housing were down about 25 percent.

"Very simply, the benchmark single-family sector is very weak," Joel Naroff, president of Naroff Economic Advisors, wrote to his clients.

The inflation numbers were also ambiguous. The 0.5 percent increase in December came after no increase in November, and sharp drops in September and October.

DOJ_NMG_0118745

Not since the 0.6 percent rise in April, has the Consumer Price Index jumped so sharply in one month — suggesting to Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group, that inflation is far from subdued, as the Federal Reserve would like.

"All this talk about the Fed lowering rates is looking increasingly unlikely," Mr. Baumohl said, "and the possibility is growing that the Fed will have to raise rates in the second half of this year." Like many economists, Mr. Baumohl focuses mainly on the so-called core inflation rate, which measures price changes other than those for food and energy.

The core rate rose 0.2 percent in December, matching the increase in four of the last six months. It appears to be leveling off, he said, at an annual rate of 2.6 percent, which was the year-over-year increase reported yesterday by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

If so, that would be well above the 1 to 2 percent annual rate that Ben S. Bernanke, the Fed's chairman, describes as acceptable.

Patrick Jackman, an economist at the bureau, argued that home rents are playing a big role in the core rate's steady increase to 2.6 percent last year from 2.2 percent in 2004 and 2005. The bureau measures housing costs not by the purchase price of a house, but by rents and by what it describes as the rental equivalent of owning a home.

Indeed, more people are seeking to rent homes, driving up rental prices. Compounding the impact on inflation, no other item counts as heavily as rents in the bureau's monthly calculation of changes in the Consumer Price Index.

Most of the 0.2 percent increase in the core inflation rate last month came from rising rents, the bureau reported. Meanwhile, the cost of many other major items — recreation, for example, education and health care — rose only mildly or not at all. Car prices fell.

The two exceptions were apparel and tobacco prices, the former going up because of an anomaly in the seasonal adjustment formula the bureau uses for the Christmas season, and the latter because wholesalers raised prices last month.

"If I were on the Fed, I would say there is really no inflationary pressure in the broad economy," Mr. Jackman said.

The 0.5 percent increase in the overall inflation rate last month came mainly from a spike in fuel costs. After falling from August until early November, fuel prices rose until late December — and then started to fall again.

Absent the spike in gas prices, the overall price index would have risen by about 1.25 percent last month. Oil prices in 2006 rose much more slowly than in 2005. As a result, the rise of 2.5 percent in the overall price index last year was well below the 3.4 percent increase in 2005.

"Inflation does seem to be subsiding," Ms. Reaser said, "and I think that will continue partly because the Fed's earlier rate increases are still putting a lid on economic growth."

Inflation Down – But Far From Conquered (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, January 19, 2007

from the January 19, 2007 edition - http://www.csmonitor.com/2007/0119/p02s01-usec.html Inflation down – but far from conquered 2006 saw prices rise at their slowest pace since 2003, but economists see a recovering economy.

By Ron Scherer | Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

NEW YORK

Last year, the nation's inflation rate declined to its lowest level since 2003. But now, economists are wondering if the 2.6 percent rate may be about as low as it's going to get for a while.

While this does not mean that inflation will become a dominant issue for the economy, it probably means that the Federal Reserve is going to continue to fret about it. And that may mean that instead of cutting rates this spring, the Fed sits tigh t until at least midyea r.

"It's too early to declare victory on inflation," says Richard DeKaser, chief economist at National City Corporation in Cleveland. "Inflation may be down, but it's not out."

On the surface, the inflation numbers appear to be relatively benign. Thursday, the Labor Department reported that the December Consumer Price Index rose 0.5 percent, reflecting a hike in the price of gasoline. The so-called core rate of inflation, the inflation rate without food and energy, rose just 0.2 percent in December. However, economists are quick to point out that so far in the month of January, the price of energy is down substantially, reflecting the warm winter. "Most people have probably forgotten the rise in December already," says Mr. DeKaser.

What has economists worried are signs that the economy is starting to recover some of its momentum. On Wednesday, for example, the government reported industrial production rose 0.4 percent, the first increase since August.

Even the housing sector is showing some signs of life, again reflecting the warmer winter. Thursday, the Commerce Department reported construction of new homes rose 4.5 percent in December.

"Even though construction was still weak, it was better on a seasonally adjusted basis," says Dan Meckstroth, chief economist at the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI in Arlington, Va.

Mr. Meckstroth thinks the economy is now moving out of its slower pace. He says there are some signs business is getting rid of the high inventories, particularly in the auto sector.

One of the reasons for the improvement in auto sales – aside from the warmer weather that let people get to the showrooms – are lower prices. Last month auto prices fell for the fifth consecutive month. They were down 0.9 percent for the year.

If the economy is starting to firm up, the Federal Reserve's attitude toward inflation could start to change, says Robert Brusca, of Fact and Opinion Economics in New York.

While the economy was soft, the Fed could take a more relaxed posture, he says. But, now with capacity utilization rising, the unemployment rate low, and more tightness in the economy, he expects the Fed will start to change its approach.

"As the economy gets firmer, the Fed gets stricter about what it will let inflation do," says Mr. Brusca. "It's kind of like a teacher with the brighter students – there is a higher expectation."

One of the concerns is the possibility of a wage/price spiral. Economists say there is a six- to 12-month lag between low unemployment rates and rising labor costs. "The unemployment rate started 2006 at 4.7 percent and ended at 4.5 percent and we probably have not seen the full repercussions of that," says DeKaser.

And the rate may still get lower. Thursday, the government reported a large drop in new weekly unemployment claims. This followed a large drop the week before. Now, some economists are wondering if the January unemployment rate could drop to as low as 4.4 percent.

Even though inflation may not be showing up in the numbers, some business people say they can see it at work in more subtle ways. For example, Larry Roshfeld, a senior vice president at CorasWorks Corp. in Reston, Va., says inflation puts more pressure on managers, especially those in information technology, trying to meet profit projections. "Inflation puts pressure on the ability to grow profits," he says, "and one of the first places pressured is the IT department since there is no place to increase revenue."

Jay Whitehead, the publisher of CRO magazine, can attest to the squeeze taking place in the technology sector. His company planned a conference for corporate responsibility officers (CROs) in San Francisco but ended up moving it to Chicago. "Inflation is hitting the budgets in technology more than other sectors and everyone out West is crying the blues," he says. "Budgets were more open in the Midwest."

On an anecdotal basis, Mr. Roshfeld says companies are now more willing to allow employees to work from home in an effort to help cut commuting costs. "It used to be that only senior executives could work at home, but now that's spread to lower level employees."

Despite the slowdown in housing, some builders and developers say cost pressures are still a part of the business. Two years ago, new construction was running at about $100 per square foot, says Adam Cowgill, a real estate agent at Railey Realty in McHenry, Md.

Now, Mr. Cowgill says it's closer to $200 per square foot. And though some commodities, such as copper, have eased in price recently, he says drywall is up 15 percent over last year. "Once the price is up and everyone has become accustomed to it, no one wants to bring the price back down," he says.

Separately, Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke appeared before the Senate Budget Committee Thursday and warned about future implications of the rising costs of Social Security, Medicare, and other entitlement programs.

"If early and meaningful action is not taken, the US economy could be seriously weakened, with future generations bearing much of the cost," said Mr. Bernanke.

In early February, President Bush will present his 2008 budget to Congress. Although it's not clear if he will tackle the rising cost of entitlements, his new Treasury chief Henry Paulson has indicated this will be one of his priorities.

Bernanke's predecessor at the Fed, Alan Greenspan, was often critical of government spending as well. Bernanke will testify about the state of the economy in mid-February.

Stocks Shrug Off Oil Decline And Catch Apple Downdraft (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

An Apple yesterday kept the buyers away.

A 6.2% decline in the consumer-electronics giant's shares led technology shares lower, in a selloff that spread to other areas of the market. Apple Inc.'s earnings announcement late Wednesday included fiscal first-quarter profits that beat analysts' expectations but a lukewarm second-quarter outlook.

The technology-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index, which includes Apple, tumbled 1.5%, or 36.21 points, to 2443.21, up 1.2% on the year. Semiconductor-equipment makers Lam Research Corp., Varian Semiconductor Equipment Associates Inc. and Applied Materials Inc. were among the sector's big decliners.

The blue-chip Dow Jones Industrial Average slipped 9.22 points, or 0.1%, to 12567.93, up 0.8% on the year.

The stock market's losses came despite another big drop in crude-oil prices, which flirted with the first close under $50 a barrel in more than 1½ years. Government data showing a weekly increase in U.S. crude stocks pushed the price of oil futures contracts for February delivery down $1.76, or 3.4%, to $50.48 a barrel, up from an intraday low of $49.90. Crude contracts are off 17% this year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Some analysts said the stock market's reaction to Apple's announcement embodied a broader problem that may resurface as the current earnings season plays out: Investors' expectations for corporate results have been so high for so long, sparking so many early bets, that there may be little room left for stocks to rally on the good aspects of detailed corporate announcements. "At the first sign of a reality check, people will tend to bail out in the current environment," said Chris Johnson, chief executive and chief investment strategist at Johnson Research Group in Cincinnati.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.3%, or 4.25 points, to 1426.37, up 0.6% on the year.

In testimony to the Senate Budget Committee, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke cautioned about the dangers of large government deficits and growing health-care and Social Security costs in the years ahead. He offered few hints about the Fed's near-term plans regarding its key interest-rate targets -- a topic that has consumed investors in recent months.

For now, corporate earnings are garnering far more attention on Wall Street, said portfolio manager Jerome J. Heppelmann, of the asset-management firm Liberty Ridge Capital. "Investors pretty much know the economy is slowing down," he said. "In that sort of situation, they'll tend to seek safer stocks" generating big cash flow and steady profits.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell1, and bond prices rose2. The 10-year note rose 9/32 point, or $2.8125 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.751%.

The dollar was mixed3. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar hit its highest level in nearly four years, to 121.2121 yen from 120.66 yen. The euro rose to $1.2965 from $1.2936.

California Judge Declares A Mistrial In Vioxx Cases (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

LOS ANGELES -- A hung jury forced a mistrial Thursday in lawsuits by two men who blamed their heart attacks on Vioxx, the once-popular painkiller made by pharmaceutical company Merck & Co.

The two cases were tried together before a Superior Court jury that deadlocked when they reached the third question on a lengthy verdict form.

DOJ_NMG_0118748

The jury did answer "yes" to the first two questions, finding that Vioxx did have potential risks or side-effects that were known or knowable and that they presented a substantial danger to users of Vioxx. The third question asked if the plaintiffs' physicians would have recognized the potential risks or side-effects.

The first two answers were rendered moot when Judge Victoria G. Chaney declared a mistrial.

The jury had sent a note to the court saying it was having trouble with the third question and lawyers were allowed to reargue that point. The jury then went back for more talks, but ultimately said there was an impasse.

It wasn't clear when there might be a retrial of the lawsuits brought by Lawrence Appell, of Scottsdale, Ariz., and Rudolph Arrigale, of Westminster, Calif.

Thomas Yoo, a spokesman for Merck's legal team, said, "We're disappointed that the jury was not able to reach a verdict. If either of these plaintiffs wants to come back we'll be ready."

Messrs. Appell and Arrigale claimed that Vioxx was a substantial factor in their heart problems. They also claimed Merck failed to give sufficient warning of potential safety hazards of the drug.

Mr. Arrigale sought to recover more than $177,000 in medical costs as well as additional compensatory and punitive damages. Mr. Appell sought compensatory damages on behalf of himself and his wife, plus punitive damages and more than $105,000 to cover medical expenses.

The trial began Oct. 31. In closing arguments Dec. 19, attorneys for the two plaintiffs argued their clients' heart injuries were caused by Vioxx.

Merck, headquartered in Whitehouse Station, N.J., argued that the two men's heart problems were caused by pre-existing coronary heart disease, not Vioxx.

Merck attorney Stephen D. Raber also told jurors that the pharmaceutical giant had not failed to properly warn doctors of possible complications from using the painkiller.

Merck removed Vioxx from the market two years ago after its research showed the drug doubled the risk of heart attacks and strokes.

California's first Vioxx liability case also went to trial before Ms. Chaney. It ended in August, with jurors finding Merck was not liable for the heart problems of a California man.

As of Nov. 30, the company faced 27,200 lawsuits over Vioxx and another 265 potential class-action suits.

Six lawsuits are set for trial between now and June, with the next scheduled to begin in New Jersey.

Excluding Messrs. Appell and Arrigale's suits, 18 cases have been scheduled for trial over Vioxx to date. Juries have ruled for Merck nine times, although a state judge ultimately set aside one of the verdicts, the company said.

Unfettered Debate Takes Unflattering Turn In Michigan Supreme Court (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

In a recent series of written dissents, Justice Elizabeth A. Weaver of the Michigan Supreme Court has accused four of her colleagues of “bully tactics,” “abuses of power and grossly unprofessional conduct” and trying to censor her.

In response, in a confidential draft opinion, the court’s chief justice has accused Justice Weaver of behaving like “a child engaging in a tantrum.” In the opinion, Chief Justice Clifford W. Taylor suggested that she continue her protests with a hunger strike, as that “seemed to have the potential for everyone to be a winner.”

Students of judicial history in Michigan and elsewhere said they could not remember a similar judicial melee.

“The justices of the Michigan Supreme Court are making spectacles of themselves," said Richard D. Friedman, a law professor at the University of Michigan. “They really should start acting like grown-ups.”

The justices’ exchanges, which continued this week, have been fueled by personal animus. But their disagreements involve serious issues, including First Amendment principles and judicial ethics.

The justices differ about whether they may disclose the details of the court’s internal deliberations, about whether lawyers are free to criticize them personally and about how motions seeking their disqualification should be treated.

On Wednesday in Lansing, the state capital, the justices held a hearing about a rule it adopted by a vote of 4 to 3 last month. The rule forbids justices from making public "correspondence, memoranda and discussions regarding cases or controversies," but does not specify a punishment for violations.

The new rule has not deterred Justice Weaver. On her Web site, www.justiceweaver.com, portions of Chief Justice Taylor's draft opinion attacking her appeared this month, after the rule was adopted.

More than 20 people spoke at the hearing, most of them supporting the rule, a court spokeswoman said.

One of the speakers, Judge Richard F. Suhrheinrich of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, in Cincinnati, said in an interview on Wednesday that the secrecy of judicial deliberations is crucial to ensuring robust, unfettered and un-self-conscious debate.

"Judges on that particular court have decided to make the deliberations public," Judge Suhrheinrich said, "and it has caused a great deal of problems."

Through a spokeswoman, Chief Justice Taylor declined a request for an interview. In an interview with Michigan Public Radio on Wednesday, he lashed out at Justice Weaver, saying "she has been very difficult to deal with" since she was passed over for a second term as chief justice in 2001.

"Believe me," Chief Justice Taylor said, "she doesn't have anything. It's just about time this soap opera stopped."

In a written dissent last month, Justice Weaver called the new rule a gag order. She said it conflicts with a provision in Michigan's Constitution requiring dissenting judges to give their reasons.

Judicial deliberations are almost universally protected from outside scrutiny. There is not much law, however, on the question of whether participants in the deliberations may themselves be forbidden to disclose exchanges in which they participated.

Justice Weaver wrote last month that the immediate purpose of the new rule was to suppress a dissent that she had written in a disciplinary case. She added that her primary obligations were to the public rather than her colleagues.

The new rule, she wrote, cannot constitutionally apply to "repeated personal slurs, name calling and abuses of power, such as threats to exclude a justice from conference discussions, to ban a justice from the Hall of Justice or to hold a dissenting justice in contempt."

The disciplinary case that gave rise to the judicial disagreement involved Geoffrey Fieger, a prominent plaintiffs' lawyer and politician who ran unsuccessfully for governor in 1998. His opponent, Gov. John M. Engler, appointed four of the justices on the current Supreme Court.

Those justices were in the majority in a 4-to-3 decision in July that reprimanded Mr. Fieger for intemperate language about several appeals court judges.

"They held that the First Amendment doesn't apply to lawyers," Mr. Fieger said in an interview.

In her dissent in the matter, Justice Weaver said the four justices should have disqualified themselves from Mr. Fieger's case because they had displayed "bias and prejudice" in public comments made about him.

In the majority opinion, the justices acknowledged that they had tangled politically with Mr. Fieger, but said that having done so did not require their disqualification.

In a related federal case, the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit last month reinstated a suit by Mr. Fieger that challenged Michigan's judicial disqualification rules as a violation of due process. Justices of the Michigan Supreme Court, like judges on most state high courts, decide for themselves whether to grant motions seeking their disqualification.

"The traditions of deciding on recusal are due for a fresh review, because there is a new world swirling around the courts," said Bert Brandenburg, the executive director of Justice at Stake, a judicial reform group. Increasingly expensive and nasty judicial election campaigns and political attacks on judicial independence are part of that new world, Mr. Brandenburg said.

Justice Weaver did not respond to a request for comment, but an aide directed a reporter to materials on her Web site, which includes photographs, opinions, press releases and speeches. It also features her "10 Principles for Living."

Principle No. 6: "Avoid unnecessary disputes and confrontations."

Law Firms Are Urged Not To Force Retirements (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

A special committee of the New York State Bar Association is calling on law firms to end the practice of mandatory retirement for partners.

In a strongly worded report that is to be released today, the committee concluded that "mandatory retirement — requiring a partner to leave the firm upon reaching an arbitrary age — is not an acceptable practice."

Retirement practices at law firms is becoming a hot topic as many of the nation's lawyers enter their 60s and face policies aimed at pushing them out the door. About 57 percent of law firms with more than 100 lawyers reported having a mandatory retirement age, ranging from 65 to 72, according to a 2005 survey conducted by Altman Weil, a law firm management consulting company.

But firms that push lawyers out at an arbitrary age without taking into consideration the individual's productivity and contribution to the firm could be missing out, said Mark H. Alcott, 67, a lawyer with Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison, who is president of the bar association and who formed the special committee.

"One of the things that concerns me is that mandatory retirement ages are getting younger just as people are getting older and living more productive lives," said Mr. Alcott, who said Paul, Weiss had a mandatory retirement age of 70.

Law firms that have adopted more-corporate structures have long argued that older partners needed to be moved out to give more opportunities and a bigger chunk of profits to younger lawyers.

But members of the special committee said that some firms adopted the policies simply to avoid uncomfortable discussions with a senior partner whose skills may be diminishing.

"We're not suggesting that partnerships should be a lifetime guarantee, but we think it is a false premise that utilizing senior lawyers in a way that's consistent with their ability to contribute denies opportunities to younger lawyers," said Mark C. Zauderer, 60, a lawyer with Flemming Zulack Williamson Zauderer, who was chairman of the committee.

Mr. Zauderer, who said that his firm did not have a mandatory retirement policy, noted that law firms were keeping a close eye on legal challenges to their practices.

In federal court in Chicago, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has filed a lawsuit against the law firm Sidley Austin, accusing it of age discrimination in the demotion or forced retirement of 32 older partners in 1999. Sidley has denied the accusations.

The committee did not take a position on the Sidley Austin case, Mr. Zauderer said, but he said such cases may make it hard for large law firms to justify retirement policies on the ground that partners are owners and therefore exempt from protection by age discrimination laws.

Groups Offer Health Plan For Coverage Of Uninsured (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — A broad coalition of business and consumer groups, doctors, hospitals and drug companies laid out a major proposal on Thursday to provide health coverage to more than half of the nation's 47 million uninsured by expanding federal benefit programs and offering new tax credits to individuals and families.

"This is a proposal not for mandates but for incentives," said Dr. Reed V. Tuckson, senior vice president of UnitedHealth Group, one of the nation's largest insurers. "It's a careful balance of public and private solutions."

The proposal, unveiled Thursday after more than two years of work, was endorsed by 16 groups including AARP, the American Hospital Association, the American Medical Association, the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association, Johnson & Johnson, Kaiser Permanente, Pfizer and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

Other coalition members endorsing the proposal were Families USA, a liberal-leaning consumer group, and America's Health Insurance Plans, a trade group for insurers.

The proposal comes at a possible turning point in the debate over national health insurance, which has been an elusive goal for Democrats since the New Deal. In the past few years, businesses of all sizes have said that health costs are cutting their profits and hurting their ability to compete. Politicians of both parties predict that the health care issue will figure prominently in the 2008 presidential campaign.

Without waiting for Congress, states like Massachusetts and California are expanding coverage, but want help from Washington.

As a first step, the 16-member group, known as the Health Coverage Coalition for the Uninsured, urged Congress to put more money into the Children's Health Insurance Program and create tax breaks for the purchase of private insurance covering children. Money for the program is running low, and many children are eligible but not enrolled.

Members of the coalition said their proposal would cost $45 billion in the first five years. They did not estimate the cost of insuring millions of adults in later years, nor did they suggest how to pay the costs. Dr. Tuckson said that "the cost of inaction is higher than the cost of action."

Ronald F. Pollack, the executive director of Families USA, said, "Our agreement transcends political and ideological boundaries."

But tensions bubbled below the surface, showing how difficult it could be to translate the recommendations into law. The A.F.L.-C.I.O., the Service Employees International Union and the National Association of Manufacturers participated in the coalition for more than a year but did not endorse the final report. The deepest divisions came over how to pay for expanded coverage and who should foot the bill.

Andrew L. Stern, president of the service employees' union, supports health insurance for all but has said that the "employer-based system of health coverage is over" and that it "is collapsing, crushed by out-of-control costs." By contrast, members of the coalition said they wanted to preserve and build on that system.

E. Neil Trautwein, former assistant vice president of the National Association of Manufacturers, said the proposal had "little reference to fiscal realities."

JoAnn C. Volk, a policy analyst at the A.F.L.-C.I.O., said she favored expanding government programs. "But tax credits would not guarantee access to comprehensive coverage and could leave consumers with high out-of-pocket costs," Ms. Volk said.

Suzanne DeFrancis, a spokeswoman for the Department of Health and Human Services, said: "We all share the goal of helping people get health insurance. The administration believes this can be done best by helping people buy their own insurance, rather than creating a new government entitlement to health care or raising taxes."

More than eight million children are uninsured. At least two-thirds are eligible for Medicaid or the Children's Health Insurance Program. One way to cover these children would be to enroll them automatically in Medicaid or the children's insurance program if they qualified for food stamps or reduced-price school lunches, the coalition said.

In general, Medicaid is available to children under 19 in families with incomes below the poverty level, about $16,600 for a family of three. The coalition said Congress should provide tax credits to families with incomes from 100 percent to 300 percent of the poverty level, to help them buy coverage for children.

The coalition offered longer-term recommendations, saying that states should have the option to expand Medicaid to cover all adults with incomes below the poverty level.

"Day after day, there is debate and discussion," Dr. Tuckson said. "Day after day, people die. We are sick and tired of the debate. We are focusing on what is achievable."

TEED UP Health-Insurance Gap Surges As Political Issue (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon And David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

Suddenly, the long-festering issue of providing health coverage to the one in six Americans who lack it seems to have leapt to the top of the national to-do list.

On Tuesday, an unlikely coalition of the Business Roundtable, AARP and the Service Employees International Union called for "affordable quality health care for all." 1

On Wednesday, Pennsylvania's governor became the latest to offer a way to cover the uninsured in his state.

Yesterday, another strange-bedfellows coalition, ranging from a health insurers' trade group to a liberal advocacy group, unveiled a plan to subsidize health premiums with a mix of tax credits and federal spending. And Oregon Sen. Ron Wyden dusted off a plan to make people buy insurance, with employers chipping in. On Tuesday, President Bush is expected to talk about his ideas for shrinking the ranks of the uninsured.

Thrusting the long-running issue to the fore are political and economic forces that have been building for years but are given new force by political events. Not only have the Democrats taken over Congress, but state political leaders, including Republicans such as California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, are moving on their own to change the system. And U.S. companies increasingly complain that the current employer-paid insurance system puts some of them at a disadvantage -- either globally or vis-a-vis firms that won't provide insurance. (See related story.2)

A SURGING ISSUE

• The News: Many Americans' lack of health insurance has abruptly become a hotter political issue, with proposed fixes proliferating and states taking action on their own.

• The Cause: Political winds shift and big companies say employer-paid insurance puts them at a global disadvantage.

• Bottom Line: Disagreement over cures may prevent change, but issue will be hot in 2008 presidential race.

All this increases the chances that Washington will try to tackle at least a piece of a health-care problem that has only grown bigger since the Clintons' failure at comprehensive reform back in 1994. But it still doesn't necessarily mean anything big will happen, at least nationally, in the next couple of years. The primary reason: There's nothing approaching a consensus on what to do.

There is, for sure, a growing consensus that the rising number of Americans without health coverage is a problem, not just for them but also for employers and governments that pay the bills. U.S. auto companies "are paying for the emergency-room treatments of people who can't afford it," complains Tom Lasorda, chief executive of DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler unit. "I'm paying for it because the rates go up because I have to cover the cost."

But there is a splintering of approaches to the problem. Some favor bigger government. Others would bolster the decaying system of employer-sponsored insurance. Still others would make health insurance more like car insurance and have people buy their own, aided by various subsidies.

THIS WEEK IN HEALTH CARE

See a list of events and announcements related to health care coming up this week.

Those who are optimistic that the recent talk portends action see a harmonic convergence of interests that suggests the latest round of press conferences and plans offered by coalitions will produce something tangible. Andrew Stern, president of the Service Employees International Union, or SEIU, says that when the Clinton health initiative failed, "business believed that they could somehow manage health costs, and the economy was far less global." The world has changed. "Having had 13 more years of increasing costs...," he says, "people realize that you can't manage this as a company -- we have to manage this as a country."

The problem has long been apparent and is getting worse. The number of Americans without health insurance is growing, and rising premiums have lessened employers' willingness to provide it. Though a majority of Americans still get insurance through the workplace -- a practice tracing to the 1940s, when businesses offered fringe benefits in lieu of higher wages -- the fraction of employees offered coverage at work fell to 77.4% in 2005 from 81.2% in 2001.

At last tally, the Census Bureau said 15.9% of Americans, 46.6 million in all, lacked health insurance. Government programs -- Medicare, Medicaid and the 10-year-old State Children's Health Insurance Program -- pick up the elderly, the disabled and the very poor.

Nearly 70% of the uninsured are in families with at least one full-time worker. In some cases, the employer doesn't provide coverage. In others, the employee can't afford it or doesn't take the coverage that employers offer, according to the Kaiser Commission on Medicaid and the Uninsured, a private foundation-backed effort.

So by no means are the uninsured all poor; more than a fifth live in families with incomes above $40,000. And it would seem they or their employers can afford to pick up a part of the tab -- an important factor in making some of the proposals floating around feasible.

The heightened political focus on the issue reflects pressure from two sources. One is voters' anxieties, both about the cost of care and about the risk of losing insurance for reasons such as changing jobs. "A member of Congress goes home and two issues come up every time you get together with folks: One of them is Iraq, and one of them is health care," says Sen. Wyden, an Oregon Democrat. "A lot of people who have coverage think they're one rate hike away from losing their coverage."

The other is an ever-louder complaint from U.S. businesses that they can't compete in a global economy when companies from other countries don't have to pay for health care. Deere & Co. Chief Executive Robert Lane told Congress last year that failure to act could result in a "limiting of covered services, loss of employer-provided health care...and even a loss of American jobs, both in the manufacturing and service sectors."

The uninsured, of course, make up only one of the U.S. health-care system's issues, alongside quality and, especially, rapid rises in costs. But confronting the uninsured problem is politically appealing and it seems not quite as intractable. "Dealing with cost is really hard. It means leveling with the public. It means telling people you can't have everything you want or your doctor wants," says Paul Ginsburg, president of the Center for Studying Health System Change, a foundation-backed think tank in Washington.

Then there's raw partisan politics. Democrats believe they have the political wind at their backs and that one reason they do is public anxiety about health care. Republicans feel a need to respond, and often look for approaches that rely less on government and more on market forces.

At the same time, some proponents of free trade seek ways to ease workers' anxieties about globalization so they might be less hostile to it. Recent initiatives at the state level reflect the public pressure for some kind of governmental action -- and at the same time increase the pressure for some federal action.

"Legislators and governors are feeling pressure from small businesses," says Katherine Swartz, a professor at the Harvard School of Public Health. She has another idea for dealing with the problem: government-subsidized reinsurance pools that might make it more affordable for employers to offer insurance.

Ms. Swartz says that "nobody believes anything is going to come out of Washington. States are more willing to say let's try something." Flush state budgets help. A survey by the Kaiser Family Foundation found that one-third of states, 17 in all, increased access to health coverage in 2006, often to low-income children. For the first time in four years, no state restricted income eligibility in Medicaid or in the State Children's Health Insurance Program.

Last year, the then-governor of Massachusetts, Republican Mitt Romney, helped by Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy, cut a deal with Democratic leaders of the state's legislature. It required state residents to obtain insurance, created a state-sponsored "connector" where they could go to buy it, and required all but the very smallest employers to provide insurance or pay a penalty.

Vermont and Maine also have enacted universal-coverage plans. Vermont aims to have 96% of state residents insured by 2010 through a mix of subsidies and employer contributions, plus a tobacco tax. Maine's program, aimed at insuring all by 2009, is grappling with inadequate funding, fewer people enrolling than anticipated and lawsuits from business over the financing mechanism.

Several other states are mulling ways to increase coverage for their residents. Some mix expanded government programs with mandates on individuals to purchase insurance -- along with subsidies for low-income people, new insurance pools to share risks, and mandatory employer contributions.

Last week, California Gov. Schwarzenegger outlined a plan that would make uninsured residents purchase insurance, and require businesses with 10 or more employees to either offer insurance or pay 4% of their payroll into a fund for the uninsured. The plan would levy new taxes on doctors and hospitals to help pay for the state's estimated 6.5 million uninsured, a number that includes illegal immigrants.

On Wednesday, Pennsylvania's Democratic governor, Edward Rendell, became the latest recruit, with a plan to cover his state's nearly one million uninsured. He stopped short of a Massachusetts-style mandate, instead proposing to phase in a requirement that those with incomes above 300% of the poverty level ($60,000 a year for a family of four) purchase health insurance, along with full-time college and graduate students. His proposal would also penalize employers that didn't offer insurance and would provide money to help individuals afford it.

On Wednesday, Pennsylvania's Democratic governor, Ed Rendell, became the latest recruit, with a plan to cover his state's nearly one million uninsured. He stopped short of a Massachusetts-style mandate but would penalize employers that didn't offer insurance and would provide money to help individuals afford it.

As things stand, Mr. Rendell said, "It is a tremendous deterrent for businesses that are considering locating in Pennsylvania to know that in addition to paying for their own employees' health coverage, they will be subsidizing the costs of the uninsured" as hospitals charge them more to cover the free care the hospitals must give.

From the perspective of big companies, the mandatory-employer-contribution programs at least level the playing field within the U.S., though they don't do much to ease the problem of competing globally.

In Washington, it's far easier to get agreement on the goal -- "affordable, quality health care for all" is the mantra -- than on the way to get there.

One camp, almost entirely Democrats, sees the current turmoil and dissatisfaction with job-linked insurance as hastening a single-payer national system. It's an idea many Democrats have pushed since the days of Franklin Roosevelt and Harry Truman.

Sen. Kennedy, head of the Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions, is proposing to expand Medicare beyond the elderly and disabled to all Americans, beginning with children and those aged 55 to 64. To many, that still seems politically unrealistic, especially given problems that Canada and Britain have run into with their national systems, including long waits and rising costs. But expanding the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which was created in 1997 to help states provide coverage to more low-income children, strikes some Democrats as a feasible step in this direction.

Another camp, including some Bush administration officials, sees the turmoil and decay of job-linked health insurance as a reason to go in a very different direction. They would let individuals shop for health care much as they do for other things. They would use tax breaks and vouchers to help people afford insurance, preferably high-deductible policies that prod citizens to make wise choices.

The government already is taking steps to make Americans better consumers of health care. To encourage people to be more cautious in using health care, the Bush administration is seeking ways to wean Americans off generous schemes that pay for almost anything. In their place, it favors high-deductible policies that cover the big expenses, plus ways to let people pocket the savings if they avoid unnecessary treatment or shop for lower-priced care. Health Savings Accounts are a way to do this, offering tax breaks to people who take high-deductible policies and allowing them to escape taxes on wages set aside for health care, keeping the money if they don't spend it.

Mr. Bush is expected to continue pushing in this direction. Among possible proposals: ways to make the market for individually purchased insurance more efficient, and encouragement to small businesses to help employees buy bare-bones policies. Administration officials argue that current tax law imprudently encourages employers to provide unlimited amounts of health care to workers who aren't taxed on that as income. One possible change would be to limit that tax break and devote any revenue raised by the change to subsidizing coverage for lower-income Americans.

In a recent op-ed piece in The Wall Street Journal, Mr. Bush listed "affordable health care" among the biggest issues facing the American people.

A third camp, borrowing from what's going on at the state level, essentially would widen existing sources of health insurance -- government, employers and individual policies -- so that they cover everyone. Such plans sometimes require that everyone get insurance; penalize employers that don't offer it; and subsidize coverage for people who can't easily afford it yet don't qualify for programs for the poor.

Although state experimentation is in favor now, one obstacle to state-by-state reform is a federal law, the Employee Retirement Income Security Act, or Erisa, that limits states' maneuvering room. It has thwarted an attempt by Maryland to force Wal-Mart Stores Inc. to offer health insurance to employees. This week, the Fourth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld an earlier decision that Maryland had violated Erisa. Legal experts said the decision could pose problems for states considering health-care changes but suggested that it wouldn't cripple efforts in states like Massachusetts, where the overhaul is broad and not targeted at a single employer.

Some veterans of health-care battles past smile at the enthusiasm for tackling the problem. Recalling high-profile press conferences of years past -- and proposals shredded by partisan politics or budget realities -- they say the most likely federal action is none of the above. There's also likely to be a big debate over health care in the coming presidential campaign.

But Mr. Stern, the union leader, thinks that view underestimates the current ground swell and unusual political opening. "I'm not sure Congress is yet recognizing the tidal wave that is building," he says. "It's the perfect time. You have an evenly divided Congress in Democratic control and a presidency in Republican control. You have everyone lined up on the side of universal coverage."

Doing nothing is costly too, says Henry Simmons, president of the National Coalition on Health Care, a collection of companies and interest groups that has agitated for major health-care change since 1990. "We can afford health-care reform," he says. "What we cannot afford is a continued failure to address the crisis in health care."

Tuesday

Who: Business Roundtable, Service Employees International Union, AARP

What: These unlikely allies launched a group called "Divided We Fail" and proclaimed that health care costs have gotten out of control. They said they plan to force lawmakers to begin confronting the issue of health care reform as we head towards the 2008 election.

Tidbit: The group got off to a rough start with a full-page ad in the Washington Post announcing the group somehow failing to include the word "Divided," leaving the ad to read simply: "We Fail"

Wednesday

Who: A bipartisan group of Senators and members of the House

What: Unveiled the "Health Partnership Act" which is aimed at providing grants to states that are crafting their own health care reform plans. Under the plan, Congress would create a State Health Innovation Commission to review and approve grants

Quote: "There is no single prescription to solving our nation's serious uninsured problem. Extending health care to the millions of Americans who are uninsured will require the innovation of governors and other leaders in all 50 states. Our legislation simply helps each state implement the solution that is right for them," said Sen. Jeff Bingaman, (D-NM), a sponsor of the bill.

Tidbit: The bill doesn't call for a specific amount of money to fund the program.

Wednesday

Who: Pennsylvania Gov. Edward Rendell

What: Became the latest governor to propose a plan to cover the state's uninsured residents

Quote: "We can no longer stand by while health care costs spiral out of control … It is no longer a question of whether we can afford to act – the cost of inaction is far greater; both in terms of individual health consequences and from the increasing burden on taxpayers," Mr. Rendell said.

Tidbit: The plan will phase in a mandate requiring health insurane for those with incomes more than 300% of the federal poverty level ($60,000 for a family of four) and require that full-time four-year college and grad students have coverage.

Thursday

Who: Strange bedfellows including Families USA, the US. Chamber of Commerce and America's Health Insurance Plans

What: Announced a two-step approach to providing coverage to children and adults. The plan would use of mix of tax credits, subsidies and an expansion of existing federal programs aimed at low-income individuals.

Tidbit: Perhaps to signal how grandiose they view their plan, the group unveiled it in the cavernous foyer of Washington, D.C.'s Union Station.

Who: Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Oregon)

DOJ_NMG_0118756

What: Introduced the Healthy Americans Act. The plan is to de-link health care from the employer-sponsored model and move towards a system where individuals purchase coverage and employers help foot the bill

Quote: "Americans really don't have health care at all. They have sick care," said Mr. Wyden. "We are going to change that. We are going to change that by giving seniors incentives to stay healthy, rewarding parents who enroll their youngsters in wellness programs and pushing private insurers to put a new emphasis on prevention and wellness in the plans they offer."

GOP Expects Secret Ballot (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

Republican National Committee members think they will get a secret ballot on today's election of a new general chairman, which would protect members opposed to the White House's push to fill the new slot with an advocate of an amnesty for illegal aliens.

"If we get the secret ballot as promised, then every member will feel free to express his or her view without the fear of coercion or intimidation," said RNC member Curly Haugland of North Dakota.

The move to create a new top office on the committee and fill it with Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida is scheduled to take place today, on the third day of the annual RNC winter meeting here. Mr. Martinez supports President Bush's plans for what conservative critics call amnesty for illegal aliens.

Former Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, a former state party chairman and RNC member who attended the meeting yesterday as an observer, was talked up by some members as an alternative to Mr. Martinez.

Mr. Steele, praised by name in a farewell speech by outgoing Republican National Chairman Ken Mehlman, lost a Senate run in November but remains popular with RNC members.

"The Republican Party is against amnesty for illegals, but if the president wants Mr. Martinez as general chairman, that should be the president's prerogative," Mr. Steele told The Washington Times.

The RNC leadership's desires historically almost always carry the day, especially when a Republican is in the White House, but some members yesterday said they saw hope that things might turn out differently this time.

"If it is a secret ballot, it will make a huge difference," said RNC member Denise McNamara of Texas, who said she intends to vote against the creation of the general-chairman position and, if that move fails, to vote against Mr. Martinez to fill the office, regardless of whether the vote is secret or public.

So far, a minority of members share her willingness to publicly express opposition.

"I will vote against the creation of an office of general chairman, even if it is a voice vote," said RNC member Steve Cloud of Kansas. "But a lot of others on this committee who also oppose the creation of that office -- whether because it violates the rules or because they oppose amnesty for illegal aliens -- they will be afraid to say what they think unless there is a secret ballot."

At issue is whether the RNC's rules permit the creation the "general chairman" position. The rules governing the RNC, adopted at the 2004 Republican National Convention, call only for an elected chairman and co-chairman.

RNC member Robert M. "Mike" Duncan, a Kentucky resident and the current treasurer, is running unopposed for chairman. RNC member Tim Morgan of California is exacted to become the new treasurer.

Mr. Bush has said his friend, Mr. Martinez, will be the RNC's general chairman, even though the office has yet to be created by a vote of the 168-member national committee.

"Some members are opposed for that reason alone," Mr. Cloud said.

Mr. Haugland said he had won agreement, in a private meeting with the RNC leadership, to provide a report from a certified parliamentarian in support of a secret ballot instead of the usual voice vote on such issues.

Mrs. McNamara said fears that if the RNC leadership rules that members must cast public votes on whether to have a secret ballot, "then right away you give away whether you are going to vote against Martinez."

Mr. Mehlman, widely credited with making the Republican Party's 72-hour task force for voter turnout in the 2002 and 2004 elections successful, yesterday told the RNC that the way to "grow" its membership and popularity with voters is not to treat Democrats as "the enemy."

DOJ_NMG_0118757

"Of course, there is still much about the Democrats that we disagree with," Mr. Mehlman said. "But when we do disagree, let us do so remembering that our political opponents are not our enemies."

He said that when Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said he hates Republicans and what they stand for, ordinary people scratched their heads.

"Outside this town, a Republican isn't an enemy to a Democrat -- she's a sister-in-law or another parent they see at the soccer field on Saturday mornings."

He said Republicans are "defined by how we treat others, not our political philosophy."

Mr. Mehlman said the midterm election losses taught the party that it "must hold its officials, candidates and staff to the highest ethical standards" and that "there is too much money and power in Washington, D.C., today."

"Thieves go where the money is, and scoundrels follow the power," he warned.

Two potential Republican presidential candidates held simultaneous dinners last night for RNC members. Some members said they got invitations to the one held by Sen. John McCain of Arizona and to the one held by former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney. Other said they got invitations to one but not the other. Some members said they were going to try to drop in on both dinners.

Also, a stream of members visited Mr. McCain in his Senate offices, some ferried there courtesy of RNC member Chuck Yob of Michigan.

Mr. Martinez held an evening reception for members at a ballroom in the Grand Hyatt Hotel, where the annual meeting has been taking place.

Departing Chief Warns G.O.P. On Outlook For 2008 Races (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — Ken Mehlman, the departing chairman of the Republican National Committee, warned on Thursday that his party would suffer even more devastating losses in 2008 than it did in 2006 if it did not reach out to minorities and address voter concerns about ethics.

In his farewell speech after two years as chairman, Mr. Mehlman said that the 2006 elections, in which Republicans lost control of both houses of Congress, was not a fluke that could be attributed to the calendar, a few scandal-tainted candidates and the tough going in Iraq.

“Each of these factors combined to create an environment that was unfavorable for Republicans,” said Mr. Mehlman, one of the chief architects of President Bush’s two national election victories. “But, folks, these factors cannot be an excuse.”

He said that if Republican officials shrugged off the repudiation of the party in the 2006 elections they would lose the White House in 2008 and remain in the minority in Congress indefinitely. He said the party had to recommit itself to political reform, fiscal restraint and personal ethics.

Mr. Mehlman addressed the roughly 170 members of the Republican National Committee at their annual winter meeting, a rather glum affair at a downtown hotel here. Party members are still nursing the wounds of the mid-term elections and are riven by divisions over Iraq, immigration and other issues. Members are also beginning to take sides in the contest for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008.

On Friday, committee members are expected to ratify Mr. Bush’s selection of Senator Mel Martinez of Florida as the party’s new general chairman. Mr. Martinez, who emigrated from Cuba as a child, will be the public face and voice of the party as it tries to reach out to Hispanics and other minorities who have abandoned the party in large numbers in recent years.

Mr. Martinez is expected to win the job by a large margin, but a handful of dissidents plan to vote against him because of his support for liberalized immigration laws.

One Martinez opponent, Randall Pullen, Republican national committeeman from Arizona, said that illegal immigration was the biggest problem in Arizona “and it’s not getting any better.”

“It’s such a huge issue and his past votes are not to the liking of Arizonans in general and the state party, for sure,” Mr. Pullen said.

But he said he did not think more than a few national party officials would defy the president and vote against Mr. Martinez.

Mr. Martinez, who appeared at the meeting briefly Thursday morning before returning to the Capitol, said he believed that one of his chief jobs as general chairman would be to try to reconnect with Latino voters, whose support for the Republicans dropped to 29 percent in 2006 from 44 percent in 2004, in large part because many Republican candidates ran explicitly anti-immigrant campaigns.

"The president, in naming me to this position, was saying we need to speak with a voice that speaks to all Americans," Mr. Martinez said. "My job is to make clear that our door is open and we're reaching out to all Americans, speaking to their hopes and aspirations and dreams."

Robert M. Duncan, a longtime Republican lawyer and operative, is expected to be elected the party's chairman, responsible for day-to-day business.

Ed Gillespie, a former Republican Party chairman, attended in his capacity as the new Virginia state party chairman. He acknowledged that the last two months had been painful for the party.

"Fortunately," Mr. Gillespie said, "there are 12 months in a year."

Top Republican Calls For Bipartisanship (WP/AP)

By Liz Sidoti

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Republican Chairman Ken Mehlman on Thursday challenged his GOP brethren to work with Democrats and independents to defeat terrorism and solve the country's problems, a call for bipartisanship at a time of intense political polarization.

"Let's work to put aside our differences on other issues and march together to defeat this common enemy, who threatens our common values _ values that aren't red or blue, but red, white and blue," Mehlman told the Republican National Committee's winter meeting.

"This doesn't mean we abandon our philosophy. But on many issues, we can follow the example of Ronald Reagan, and think broadly about how to work better with Democrats and independents to accomplish our mission," he said.

The remarks, in Mehlman's final major speech as party chairman, were a nod to the new reality on Capitol Hill _ Democrats in charge of both the House and Senate while Republicans continue to control the White House, a potential recipe for legislative gridlock.

"Americans want us to try to work in a bipartisan way to solve problems," Mehlman said, adding that challenges facing the country don't just affect one party.

He said Republicans can reach across the aisle to tackle issues such as an immigration overhaul that "maintains America as a nation of laws and also a welcoming nation for immigrants"; eliminating the deficit; curbing entitlement spending; and achieving universal health care coverage while controlling costs.

"Of course, as we work together, there will be much about the Democrats that we disagree with," he said. "But when we do disagree, let us do so remembering that our political opponents are not our enemies."

Mehlman steps down Friday after a two-year stint as chairman and will be succeeded by Sen. Mel Martinez, R-Fla., and Mike Duncan, the RNC's current general counsel. The two will share the chairmanship duties.

The RNC is expected to vote to approve the two _ the White House's preferred successors to Mehlman _ on Friday. But roughly a dozen RNC members plan to vote against Martinez _ a Cuban-American _ because he supports not only stronger border security but also an eventual path to citizenship for some of the millions of immigrants living in the United States illegally.

In addition, the RNC formally approved its 2008 convention city selection of Minneapolis-St. Paul.

The 2008 election was a hot topic. Two of the party's top contenders for the presidential nomination _ Arizona Sen. John McCain and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney _ were holding separate receptions and dinners for about 200 activists at two Washington restaurants.

Romney spent part of the day on Capitol Hill courting Republican lawmakers. Their aides, as well as advisers to other GOP presidential aspirants, including former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, mingled with RNC members throughout the day.

Meanwhile, the RNC adopted a resolution urging Congress to support "common sense reform" of the current campaign finance law, more commonly called McCain-Feingold after its co-sponsors _ McCain and Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis.

The resolution says the 2002 law has "made campaign finance regulations unbearably complex, which has deterred political participation by many average citizens and modest sized citizens groups." It also says the law "reduced the effectiveness of political parties."

Identity Of Edwards Home's Buyers Veiled (WP)

By John Solomon And Lois Romano

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

When former North Carolina senator and Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards finally succeeded last month in selling his imposing Georgetown mansion for $5.2 million after it had languished on the market, the names of the buyers were not publicly disclosed.

At the time, Edwards's spokeswoman told reporters that the house had been sold to an unidentified corporation. In reality, the buyers were Paul and Terry Klaassen, according to several sources and confirmed by Edwards's spokeswoman yesterday.

The wealthy founders of the nation's largest assisted-living housing chain for seniors, the Klaassens are currently cooperating with a government inquiry in connection with accounting practices and stock options exercised by them and other company insiders. They are also the focus of legal complaints by some of the same labor unions whose support Edwards has been assiduously courting for his presidential bid.

The grand 18th-century house had lingered on Washington's slowing real estate market for more than 18 months. The Edwardses paid $3.8 million in 2002 for the six-bedroom Federal-style house once owned by socialite Polly Fritchey, and they did substantial renovations. The final sale price was half a million dollars below the asking price but still $1.4 million more than the Edwardses paid four years earlier.

Edwards closed the deal in late December -- the night before he announced his presidential candidacy. Edwards aide Jennifer Palmieri said he left the details to real estate agent W. Ted Gossett. Gossett declined to reveal the Klaassens' identity but said the buyer decided to purchase the mansion as a "surprise Christmas gift" for his wife.

Edwards was told the Klaassens' name "in passing" around the time the offer came in on Dec. 18, Palmieri said last night, but he did not investigate further and had no knowledge of their business until a reporter's inquiry Wednesday. Palmieri said Edwards had not delved into the Klaassens' background: "They left it to be done at arm's length, real estate agent to real estate agent."

Asked about the allegations lodged against the Klaassens by their union stockholders, she added, "He believes all CEOs should follow the law, should protect their shareholders and should protect their workers, and he expects that will happen in this case as well."

The Klaassens declined to comment on the sale.

The paperwork for the sale was handled in such a way that it kept the Klaassens' names off the public deed documents, which show that the buyer was P Street LLC. That limited-liability corporation was created Dec. 22, public records show. Palmieri said the Klaassens used it to purchase the house. Such corporations are frequently created by large real estate buyers to protect themselves from lawsuits by shielding buyers' other personal assets.

Ellen S. Miller, head of the nonpartisan Sunlight Foundation, which studies public officials' real estate deals, said presidential candidates should go the extra mile by determining who they are doing business with, especially when "a substantial amount of cash is changing hands on the eve of his campaign."

The house sale comes at a time when the Securities and Exchange Commission has opened an inquiry into allegations that the Klaassens, founders of Sunrise Senior Living, and other company insiders cashed $32 million in stock options before Sunrise announced in May an accounting problem that caused its stock to dip.

SEC insider-trading notifications show that the Klaassens withdrew $20 million from their company in the year before they bought the house. Some of that money was taken out the week before the company announced an accounting review in May.

A letter to the board from the Service Employees International Union states that after Sunrise announced the accounting change and filing delay in May the stock value plummeted 34 percent and that the cumulative impact of company restatements will reduce net income for 2003 through 2005 by 26 percent.

The Klaassens sold 600,000 shares, worth about $20 million, in 12 transactions from Dec. 19, 2005, to May 2, 2006 -- the last sales coming one week before the company's accounting troubles came to light and the company's stock plunged, according to public records confirmed by Sunrise sources.

Several stockholders in Sunrise, including two large unions whose support Edwards has courted, have pressed for action.

The 1.8 million-worker SEIU alleges its pension fund lost significant money in its investment in Sunrise, and the union asked for an independent investigator to take over the internal probe of the stock trades and accounting practices. Pension funds for the United Food and Commercial Workers Union filed a class-action lawsuit against Sunrise this week, seeking to recover losses from the stock's fall.

"What went on there is totally inappropriate. It is very clear that very important insiders traded in this stock before it [the accounting problems] became known publicly and before the stock took a hit," said Stephen Abrecht, the SEIU's pension chief. "The pattern of stock-option grants seen here pretty much follows the pattern we've seen in other companies that were hit by corporate-governance issues."

Abrecht said he was unaware of the Edwards home deal and would reserve judgment on it.

Sunrise officials declined to address the house sale, saying the deal was a personal matter of the Klaassens, and said any insider trades were conducted according to securities rules. "We are cooperating fully with the SEC," company spokeswoman Meghan Lublin said yesterday.

Paul Klaassen started Sunrise in the Virginia suburbs in 1981, saying he was inspired by his visits as a child to his grandparents' nursing home in the Netherlands to try to create a more pleasant living opportunity for seniors. Today, Sunrise operates 436 senior communities in more than 37 states as well as Canada, Britain and Germany.

Before public service, Edwards was a successful trial lawyer who in 2003 reported assets between $14 million and $45 million.

Edwards has run into controversy once before on a house sale. In 2002, he reached a deal to sell a Washington house to a U.S. lobbyist for Saudi Arabia and then refused to give back the lobbyist's $100,000 earnest money when the deal collapsed. At the time of the sale, the Saudis were trying to improve their image in Congress after the Sept. 11 attacks, and Edwards was serving on the Senate intelligence committee.

Edwards said he did not know the buyer was a Saudi lobbyist until after the deal had fallen through.

Balanced Priorities (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Ask yourself which politician you trust more.

On the one side, a president who campaigned on a balanced-budget pledge, then dug the country hundreds of billions of dollars deeper into debt with huge tax cuts and an unpaid-for war, and now promises a balanced budget four years after he leaves office.

On the other side, a former senator who says that while he wants to contain the deficit, he has higher priorities than a perfectly balanced budget, specifically universal health insurance coverage and substantial investments in alternative energy.

That is the choice offered by George W. Bush and John Edwards, the North Carolina Democrat whose left-of-center presidential candidacy will have the salutary effect of challenging Barack Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton to respond with specifics of their own.

Edwards's ideas on the budget have the additional virtue of reminding us that the argument over arriving at a balanced budget by 2012 is largely phony. The real issue, given the burgeoning costs of health care and the retirement of the baby boomers, is how to put policies in place now that achieve sustainable fiscal balance -- meaning low if not zero deficits -- over the next 30 years.

What needs to be done? Hint No. 1: Extending President Bush's tax cuts to eternity will make the long-term problem much worse. Hint No. 2: The hardest part will be how -- simultaneously -- to meet the fiscal need to rein in health costs and the social need to get health insurance to everyone. Hint No. 3: Most Democrats don't like to talk about it, but somebody's taxes are going to have to go up.

Edwards, at least, is willing to say which taxes he would raise to keep the deficit from going through the roof. He would start by eliminating Bush's tax cuts for the top 2 percent of income earners, which he defines roughly as those earning more than $180,000 to $200,000 a year.

He wants to increase the capital gains tax for an interesting reason: In an interview this week, he argued that it's wrong to tax income from work at a higher rate than income from capital -- an extension of his long-standing theme that the country should not value "wealth over work." He also favors a windfall-profits tax on oil companies.

But since health coverage and "transforming the energy economy of this country" are first on his to-do list, Edwards says he is prepared to disappoint voters who make a balanced budget their top priority.

Edwards deserves points for honesty and for stating the politically difficult truth that both fiscal and social balance demand a comprehensive health-care fix.

But his argument doesn't do much to help Democrats on Capitol Hill who have to govern with Bush for the next two years and produce budgets right now that don't worsen the deficit or deepen inequalities. They also need to do something about long-festering social problems. These have been aggravated by declines in health coverage and in the number of families receiving federal help for child care. There is also evidence that many poor people aren't getting the nutrition assistance they need.

Worse: Having watched a Republican president and a Republican Congress run deficits year after year, Democrats will now endure the false piety of born-again Republican deficit hawks who will say they care about a balanced budget more than anything -- except, of course, their sacred tax cuts for the wealthy.

"It's a huge mess," Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said of trying to pass a decent budget. "It's one of the worst things we have to do." Schumer, vice chairman of the Senate Democratic Conference, argued that even when Democrats propose increased spending for widely shared goals, such as homeland security, Republicans "are going to say 'you're spending too much,' even though it's . . . a mess they created."

Democrats should first do no harm. That means they should resist the temptation of new tax cuts -- including repeal of the alternative minimum tax. The AMT should be fixed, but only as part of comprehensive tax reform that raises revenue. If, as is likely, Bush's path to a "balanced budget" combines tax cuts with freezes or reductions in programs for the needy, Democrats should risk being accused of "class warfare" by pointing out that the president's recipe will produce not fiscal health but further social decline.

And if they want to trump Edwards's candor, Sens. Obama and Clinton should take the lead in showing how they would begin to clean up the mess they hope to inherit in 2008.

Black Leaders Still Sizing Up Obama (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — As pastor of the Mt. Zion Missionary Baptist Church in Sumter, S.C., the Rev. James Blassingame feels pride at the thought of electing the country's first black president. But Blassingame, one of his state's most prominent black ministers, will not support Sen. Barack Obama's bid to achieve that historic goal.

Instead, the minister will campaign for one of Obama's white rivals for the Democratic nomination, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina. Obama, he said, is a "stranger" with a faraway home and little-known biography, whereas Edwards — "he's a homeboy."

Other black leaders are wary that the relatively untested senator from Illinois might prove weak in the general election.

DOJ_NMG_0118762

"Obama's ambition could bring all of black America down," said state Sen. Robert Ford of South Carolina. "If the Democrats lose control of Congress, we're going to go back and struggle and struggle and struggle."

A supporter of black candidates Shirley Chisholm and the Rev. Jesse Jackson in decades past, Ford said he would choose between Edwards and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) this time around.

Excitement is spreading among Democratic Party activists that Obama might have a shot at winning the White House, but black opinion leaders are still sizing him up — and some are already expressing greater kinship with other candidates.

Half-black and half-white, a U.S. senator for a mere two years, Obama boasts that his life story transcends racial lines. But he is unlikely to win the Democratic nomination without substantial support from black voters. Blacks remain one of the party's most loyal voting blocs. They are expected to make up more than half of the electorate in South Carolina's first-in-the-South primary next year and to play a crucial role in other key states.

Stronger ties

Obama is the only top-tier African American seeking the nomination, but he will have to fight for black votes along with other candidates, some of whom have far stronger ties to black leaders than he does.

Edwards, for example, is expected to have an advantage in his native state of South Carolina, and his pledges to fight poverty and bring troops home from Iraq are popular with black leaders. Clinton, the presumed Democratic front-runner, has decades-old ties with scores of black preachers and civil rights leaders who remain close to her husband, former President Clinton.

A Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg survey in December found that all three were popular among black voters, but that Clinton received the highest marks.

Blassingame speaks fondly of Edwards, who, like the pastor, was born in Seneca, S.C. "I know where he came from, because I came from there," Blassingame said. "I can identify with him, and he can identify with us."

The actor Bill Cosby told the Chicago Defender, a black newspaper, that the country was ready for a black president, but he suggested that Obama might not be the best candidate in the 2008 race.

"I see the African American voter having to study both Hillary Rodham Clinton and Mr. Obama," he wrote in an e-mail that the newspaper quoted Thursday. "It goes without saying that President Clinton and Mrs. Clinton have embraced the African Americans…. By studying both politicians deeply, the African American voter for the first time will not pick a candidate because of any particular idiosyncrasy."

Obama has plenty of room to improve his standing, both with black community leaders and with black voters, who in the end won't necessarily follow the lead of clergy and others. Despite a growing national profile and two best-selling books, recent polls show that he remains unknown to many voters.

Even Blassingame, the South Carolina pastor backing Edwards, said that some of his church members would embrace the possibility that their votes could make history and would support Obama once he campaigned in the state's primary election.

Still, some black leaders just don't think Obama can win a general election, and they want to put their support somewhere else. Others worry about his lack of experience, particularly on foreign policy.

"It's nothing against Obama, but we have to weigh all those factors," said David Mack, a South Carolina state legislator and former chairman of the state's black legislative caucus, who is backing Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.).

Ford, the state senator, said Obama "wouldn't have a snowball's chance in hell of winning one state" in a general election. He pointed to the 2006 Senate campaign in Tennessee, in which a black Democrat lost to a white Republican after a racially tinged campaign ad.

"I'm just being real," Ford said.

Relative rookie

As a rookie on the national stage, Obama does not have an established nationwide network of fundraising and personal connections. And whereas the traditional black leaders in Democratic Party politics are identified by their connections to the old civil rights struggles of the South and of Northern cities, Obama was raised by a white mother in Hawaii and Indonesia. His ties to the black church and to the urban struggles of many blacks were solidified only when he moved to Chicago after college.

DOJ_NMG_0118763

A spokesman for Obama said Thursday that the senator's voter-outreach effort was just beginning. Still, there are signs that he has embarked on a quiet campaign to woo influential black leaders.

He placed a call this week to Rep. James E. Clyburn, the third-ranking Democrat in the House and one of the most powerful black politicians in South Carolina. Obama also addressed a breakfast in Chicago honoring the late civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr., hosted by Jackson. Appearing at a black church in a poor suburb of Chicago, he offered hints that he viewed his political rise as a natural extension of King's dream.

"The torch has been passed to this generation, but we haven't always taken it up," Obama said in an account on the WBBM CBS2 television station. "We haven't pushed the boundaries of what is possible. We have much more work to do."

Obama received standing ovations that day.

Jackson has stopped short of endorsing Obama, but he told CNN on Thursday that he probably would back him. "All of my heart leans toward Barack," he said. But he added that Obama would have to compete for the black vote. "I don't think it will be hostile, or nasty, but it will be a very competitive campaign."

While he is talking to the black voters and leaders, Obama is making sure his public image rests on a broad foundation. A new biographical video, released this week on Obama's website, features several images of him working with blacks as a civil rights lawyer and community activist. But equally prominent images show him speaking intently with white constituents. Two people offer testimonials of their admiration for the senator: a white woman and a man who appears to be Latino.

If nothing else, Clyburn said in an interview, Obama's candidacy would undercut the old "monolithic notion" that blacks will automatically vote for a black presidential candidate, or that whites will never do so.

"I'm surprised at the number of African Americans I talk to who are just very much for Edwards," Clyburn said. "I'm also surprised at the number of well-heeled, wealthy white South Carolinians who tell me they're for Obama."

Obama formed an exploratory committee Tuesday, a step toward formally entering the presidential race, and says that on Feb. 10 he will announce a final decision on whether to run. Few doubt he intends to mount a campaign.

Rice Aims For Talks With Israeli, Palestinian Leaders By Mid-February (AFP)

By Sylvie Lanteaume

AFP, January 19, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she hoped to meet Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas by February 15 in a bid to revive the peace process.

"The next couple of weeks will be pretty intensive on the diplomatic front," Rice told reporters traveling with her to London before meeting with British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Rice held talks with Blair late Thursday, Downing Street said.

But the talks here risked being clouded by an outspoken attack on Washington by one of Blair's cabinet ministers, Northern Ireland Secretary Peter Hain, who blasted Washington's "failed" foreign policy in a newspaper interview.

On February 2 Rice will host talks with her counterparts from Russia and the European Union and UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon to agree steps on how to revive the peace process. The four represent the Middle East quartet.

The following week Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Abul Gheit will travel to the United States with Egyptian intelligence chief Omar Suleiman. Other officials from the region could also travel to Washington, Rice said.

David Welch, the US State Department's top Middle East envoy, and Elliott Abrams, the White House national security adviser on the Middle East, will then travel to the region to prepare for informal trilateral talks.

Rice announced Monday such talks would take place soon, without specifiying a date.

"I plan to try to go back in the first half of February," Rice said.

Rice arrived from Germany after talks with Chancellor Angela Merkel earlier in the day before heading home.

Her spokesman Sean McCormack said here that Rice "intends to brief both (Blair and Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett) on her trip to the Middle East and will also discuss the next diplomatic steps to help move the process forward."

He expected they will also discuss Iran, Afghanistan, and other issues such as Sudan.

DOJ_NMG_0118764

During her stop in Berlin, Rice and Merkel focused their talks on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, seen as crucial for the stability of the whole region.

"There is no doubt that there could be a very important effect on the entire region if we are able to make progress on Middle East peace," said Rice before leaving the German capital.

Germany, as the current EU president, has made revitalizing the quartet one of its priorities. It held its last full meeting in September.

The chief US diplomat came to Berlin after a six-country Middle East tour during which she announced she would hold a summit with Olmert and Abbas within a month.

Rice said it would take "a few weeks" to organize the summit but added Thursday that both the Israelis and Palestinians were ready to work toward a lasting solution.

The London talks risked being clouded by Hain's comments.

"The neo-con mission has failed," Hain told the New Statesman left-of-centre weekly. "It's not only failed to provide a coherent international policy, it's failed wherever it's been tried," he said.

There was no immediate comment by Blair's Downing Street office on his minister's comments.

But they run clearly counter to the British leader's strongly pro-Washington stance.

Hain's comments were widely interpreted in London in the context of the upcoming race to succeed the British prime minister, who is due to stand down before September.

The Northern Ireland secretary is expected to run for Deputy Prime Minister John Prescott's job, and his comments savaging Washington will play well to traditional Labour Party members, frustrated at Blair's cosiness with Bush.

Hain also called openly for Blair's New Labour to realign itself with the US Democrats, following the years of Blair's close ties with Bush's Republicans.

Rice also said on Thursday she was "sorry" that Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki was offended by her comments that his government was "on borrowed time", blaming translation problems.

"I am sorry if he took offense. I did not mean any offense," she told reporters in London.

Rice Says Time Is Ripe For New Mideast Peace Push (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, January 19, 2007

LONDON — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday that she will return to the Middle East early next month to help launch a new Palestinian-Israeli peace process.

She said conditions were better for a deal now than they were six years ago when President Bush first took office.

Rice was in Britain after wrapping up a trip to the Middle East designed to restart the process and to persuade Arab countries to support U.S. policy in Iraq.

VIDEO: Secretary looks for support in Europe

Rice has said a peace agreement between Israelis and Palestinians would help the U.S. position in the region because of the priority America's Arab allies place on creation of a Palestinian state.

The "underlying circumstances are better now" for reaching an agreement, she said. She cited the removal of Saddam Hussein in Iraq and greater Israeli willingness to cede land to the Palestinians.

The Bush administration has said Saddam's ouster removed a threat to Israel and would begin a process that would lead to the spread of democracy and stability in the region.

However, both Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas — with whom Rice plans a three-way discussion next month — are weaker than their predecessors. That makes reaching a peace agreement more difficult.

"Leadership on both sides (of the Palestinian-Israeli dispute) is mediocre and lacking in imagination," said Zbigniew Brzezinski, who was national security adviser to President Carter when Carter mediated peace between Israel and Egypt.

Olmert is facing sharp criticism in his country for how the military performed in last summer's war with Hezbollah in Lebanon. An independent commission is examining the management of the war. A recent poll by the Haaretz newspaper found only 14% of Israelis have confidence in Olmert's leadership.

The Palestinian leadership, meanwhile, is divided. Abbas faces competition from Hamas, which won parliamentary elections a year ago. Hamas, designated a terrorist group by the United States, Israel and European Union, has clashed with Abbas' party, Fatah.

During the Middle East trip, Rice won qualified Arab support for the U.S. strategy of bolstering Iraq's fragile government with 21,500 additional U.S. troops.

Some of those same Arab leaders expressed worries, however, that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, would not crack down on Shiite militias, which have been targeting Sunnis in Iraq. Saud al-Faisal, the Saudi foreign minister, was among those questioning al-Maliki's ability to treat Iraq Sunnis and Shiites fairly.

On Thursday, Al-Maliki said more than 400 fighters from a powerful Shiite militia had been arrested. Al-Maliki has said he will take on militias even if they are among his own political supporters.

The administration has been encouraging al-Maliki to make concessions to Sunnis and take other political action to reduce violence. Rice apologized for a remark she made before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last week in which she said al-Maliki's government was on "borrowed time."

The Iraqi prime minister criticized Rice Wednesday, saying the comment "boosted the morale of terrorists." Rice said that al-Maliki had misinterpreted the remark, perhaps because of a poor translation, and that the two governments "want the same thing" — a crackdown on sectarian violence. "I'm sorry that he took offense," she said.

Rice Has Loose Agenda For Mideast Talks (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 19, 2007

Israel and the Palestinians can pick any agenda they want for a preliminary peacemaking summit with the United States, but it is too early to tackle the toughest issues, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday.

"We're not yet at the point where I think we can determine what we would do about formal negotiations, when and if" they can occur, Rice said at the close of a week's trip to the Middle East and Europe. "It's really a time to try to get the parties into more of a confidence-building phase and we'll see what comes after that."

Rice said her three-way meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas probably would take place in the Middle East in the first half of February.

Speaking to reporters traveling with her, Rice said that session will follow a gathering in Washington of the international sponsors of a dormant, step-by-step peace plan called the "road map" that was to have led to Palestinian statehood by 2005.

She acknowledged that the 2003 plan's requirements had become something of an obstacle in restarting talks between the two sides, but she said it remains the guideline.

"Everybody understands the obligations in it, but we'd gotten to a place that it was stalled," Rice said, "because if they weren't making progress on the first phase of the road map, then you couldn't talk about the end of the road map and what might lead to the establishment of a Palestinian state."

Rice said her talks with both leaders last weekend "broke through that." Olmert and Abbas agreed to the three-way meeting, a symbolic advancement both of their relationship and the involvement of traditional peace broker Washington.

Olmert and Abbas are both politically compromised: Olmert by last summer's disappointing war in Lebanon and allegations of political corruption in his ranks; Abbas by his yearlong internal power struggle with Hamas radicals.

Rice hopes the meeting will be part of a wider effort to support Abbas in that fight.

Both Abbas and Olmert inherited the 2003 plan agreed to by others. U.S. officials say it may be time to fine-tune some requirements in the plan, and that an agreement between Abbas and Olmert about how to do that could be a first step toward larger accords.

"It really should be up to them to put anything on the agenda that they'd like," Rice said, but she made clear that she hopes to discuss more than the outlines or borders of an eventual Palestinian state.

"There's always been a lot of concern about what the borders of the state would be, but there wasn't much attention given to its internal composition — its democratic processes, its institutions," Rice said. She added that Abbas is interested in those subjects.

Assessing he prospects for progress on the Palestinian questions, the chief U.S. diplomat met in Berlin and London with European leaders who are keenly interested in an issue with wide public appeal.

In between, Rice tried to sell skeptical Arab governments on the rationale for President Bush's strategy in Iraq.

Some Arabs saw the tasks as related.

"Every time the Americans are in trouble in Iraq, they remember that Arabs have a cause named Palestine," Saudi columnist Dawoud al-Shriyan wrote in the Saudi-owned Al-Hayat newspaper. "Therefore, they float some statements to create the impression that they continue their efforts in the peace process."

Rice briefed Arab leaders and diplomats about the Bush plan at stops in Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, arguing in part that Western-leaning or secular Arab states have much to lose if Iraq fails. A large part of that appeal involves the growing fears among Sunni Arab states that Shiite Iran is already gaining influence in Iraq and beyond.

In Kuwait, Rice sat down with foreign ministers from eight Arab states, including the three U.S.-allied heavyweights Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia. The grouping encouraged by the United States excludes Iran and fellow U.S. outcast Syria, but Rice has avoided comment on the perception that she is forging an anti-Iranian alliance.

Rice's second in command planned another round of diplomatic calls in the region next week.

Some Arab media depicted Rice's visit as a failure. "The whole jet-setting trip turned out to be yet another stage-managed, futile diplomatic exercise. ... In effect, Rice returns to Washington empty-handed with a lot of false promises rather than optimism," the Doha, Qatar-based Peninsula newspaper wrote in editorial.

Jordanian analyst Labib Kamhawi said that besides their doubts over the plan itself, Arab leaders had a difficult time throwing support behind it "when there has been a total failure in Iraq and the Palestinian territories with no attempt to soften the anger that is seething in the Arab and Muslim countries."

Perhaps Thinking Of Legacy, Bush Has Rice On The Move (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 18 — Two years from the end of his second term, President Bush — perhaps with his legacy in mind — sent his secretary of state to try to restart moribund peace talks between Israelis and Palestinians and to create a foundation of Muslim support for the administration's new strategy in Iraq.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice flies home on Friday, after a quick trip across the Middle East and Europe, with just enough progress to shield herself from criticism that the trip was a bust. The Palestinian president and the Israeli prime minister promised to join her for three-way talks within a month, with a meeting in Washington in advance by the so-called quartet — the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations — that has been trying to promote Middle East peace.

And powerful Arab states gave their blessing, however reserved, to Mr. Bush's initiatives to try to snatch victory from the growing chaos that is Iraq — even though these wealthy nations committed nothing of their own to that effort.

Throughout a week of long flights and long nights of negotiations, Ms. Rice carried the message that the moment was right for progress and that the Bush administration's accelerated efforts could succeed in a region where past American presidents, Democratic and Republican, also sought to burnish their late-term legacies, but usually fell short.

With chaos across the region offering a loud and bloody counterpoint to her argument, Ms. Rice cited an oft-quoted Chinese aphorism that crisis and opportunity are a couple. But it is clear that crisis currently rules.

Ms. Rice's Israeli and Palestinian negotiating partners have been weakened — the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, by the victory a year ago of the militant group Hamas in legislative elections, and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel by perceptions that the war with Hezbollah militants in Lebanon during the summer was bungled.

DOJ_NMG_0118767

So even if Ms. Rice has the vision to peer through the fog of regional conflict and see what she labeled a "political horizon" for Israelis and Palestinians, her Israeli and Palestinian partners may not be around long enough to move in that direction with her.

(Ms. Rice, a scholar of Soviet affairs, is no doubt aware of the Brezhnev-era joke in which a Kremlin party leader intones, "Comrades, global Communism is on the horizon," to which a reply is whispered from the back of the hall, "Doesn't the horizon always move away exactly as fast as you move toward it?")

The White House, of course, is also struggling. Mr. Bush's new plan for Iraq is meeting deep resistance from Democrats in Congress and even from the Iraqi prime minister. In a political sense, though, the opposition could help the administration lay blame for any ultimate failure in Iraq far from the White House.

Administration officials already contend that past errors in setting troop levels were made by generals, not the White House; that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki may have neither the ability nor the will to quash sectarian militias and forge a unity government; and that the Democrats on Capitol Hill are not willing to give their plan a chance.

Ms. Rice spoke at length on this trip about historical determinism, about how great presidents and prime ministers divined the moment when geopolitical stars aligned, and rushed in then to take advantage.

"I tend to place a lot of emphasis on the fact that people see their interests differently now than they did 5 years ago or 10 years ago," she said. "They see their interests less as continuing or having maximalist positions about this conflict and are more concerned about the kind of broad strategic picture."

She said that the Israeli-Hezbollah conflict in Lebanon "was a major contributor to that shift in alignment" and that it made a Middle East peace deal more promising, and that toppling Saddam Hussein, despite the current violence within Iraq, removed what she called an "eastern front" against the Israelis.

Looking more broadly across the region, in particular to the nations bordering Iraq and along the Persian Gulf, Ms. Rice said she was trying to construct a geopolitical framework of moderate Sunni and Shiites into a stronger, and more active, alliance against extremist Sunni and Shiite states — meaning Syria and Iran.

But tensions emerge. America's Muslim allies in the region do not like being called moderate, as they see themselves as fervent in their religious belief, though mainstream, perhaps, in their view of the world. There are also divisions over how and whether to negotiate with Iran.

"There's still a tendency to see these things in Sunni-Shia terms," Ms. Rice said. "But the Middle East is going to have to overcome that." She added that neighboring Sunni-led Arab states should understand that Iraq's Shiite-led government primarily saw itself as Arab and that the only way it would ally itself with Iran, which is Shiite but not Arab, would be "if people deny the Shia-led Iraq a place in the Arab world."

Some critics have said that the Iraq war has sidetracked, or even derailed, the Bush administration's efforts for a Middle East peace deal and that the administration's renewed focus on the region is an effort to change the channel from images of Iraq as the Bush administration enters its final two years.

But Ms. Rice said her efforts had nothing to do with legacy building.

"I don't think about it in terms of my reputation," Ms. Rice said. "I am going to be concerned about what we can get done, when, and how."

Rice Highlights Opportunities After Setbacks On Mideast Trip (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 18 -- As Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice flew to Europe on Wednesday after four days of talks in the Middle East, her Boeing 757 jet passed high over Baghdad. On a cloudless day at 37,000 feet, the city seemed sparkling and calm; the U.S. military presence and the sectarian violence below could only be imagined.

The moment was an apt metaphor for Rice's latest -- and her 12th -- visit to the region in the two years she has been the nation's top diplomat.

Through much of her trip, she seemed to cruise at a very high altitude as she pitched President Bush's new plan for Iraq, tried to revive peace talks between the Israelis and the Palestinians and sought to organize an Arab coalition against "violent extremists" such as Iran. But her results after six stops on the ground in the Middle East did not match her lofty rhetoric.

Rice announced that she had arranged a three-way meeting to discuss the contours of a Palestinian state, sidestepping questions about the political weakness of the Israeli and Palestinian leaders who would make a deal. She found generally tepid support from Arab leaders in the region for Bush's proposed military buildup in Iraq. She shrugged off a request from the emir of Kuwait that the United States engage directly with Iran and Syria to prevent the Iraqi conflict from spilling over its borders.

Even so, Rice told reporters traveling with her that, despite the day-to-day headaches and setbacks, she thinks that conditions are right now for a fundamental reordering of the Middle East.

"You aren't going to be successful as a diplomat if you don't understand the strategic context in which you are actually negotiating," she said Tuesday. "It is not deal-making. It's not. There are a set of underlying relationships, underlying balance of power, leverage on different sides, and you have to recognize when you are in a position to then, on top of that, find a solution given the underlying balance."

Under Rice's formulation, the time is not ripe to deal directly with Iran and Syria, both of which are causing problems in Iraq, because they have not indicated they are ready to change their behavior. While the Shiite-dominated Iraqi government is trying to build ties to Iran, which Rice said she does not oppose, the administration is ratcheting up the pressure, sending a second aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf. The United States has negotiated with seemingly implacable adversaries in the past -- the Soviet Union and Serbia's Slobodan Milosevic among them -- but Rice rejects those historical analogies as irrelevant.

By contrast, Rice said she thinks the opportunities for Middle East peace have suddenly turned brighter, even though Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas has struggled against the Hamas movement, which has day-to-day control of the Palestinian government and which remains committed to Israel's destruction. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert also faces political peril from a financial scandal and lingering controversy over last summer's war between Israel and the Lebanese Shiite group Hezbollah.

"A lot has happened in the Middle East in the last several years, and a lot has clarified in the Middle East," Rice told reporters traveling with her after she arrived here Thursday, on the last stop of her week-long trip, for meetings with British officials.

Rice argues that there is a constellation of forces, such as growing fear of extremist groups by "mainstream" Arabs in the wake of the Lebanon war, that now gives historical antagonists such as Saudi Arabia and Israel common strategic objectives.

"With that shift in alignment, I think you now have a chance to perhaps make progress on this issue in ways that you didn't before," Rice said.

As a result, Rice on this trip shifted six years of Bush administration policy to encourage Olmert and Abbas to begin discussing vexing "endgame" issues, such as the shape of a Palestinian state, the status of Jerusalem and the claim of Palestinian refugees, as well as their descendants, of a right to return to homes in Israel that they fled or were forced to flee in 1948.

The administration of President Bill Clinton had grappled with such topics, but the Bush White House previously argued that they could not be raised until a series of incremental confidence-building measures had been addressed.

The Arab media was highly skeptical of Rice's efforts. The Arab News, a Saudi newspaper, asked the day after she left Riyadh, "To what extent is Rice just another siren, mesmerizing the Middle East with pleasing songs while dragging it onto the rocks of fresh conflict because of her own country's incompetence?"

At one point, Rice said that the difficult circumstances in the Middle East could represent opportunity. "I don't read Chinese but I am told that the Chinese character for crisis is wei-ji, which means both danger and opportunity," she said in Riyadh. "And I think that states it very well. We'll try to maximize the opportunity."

But Victor H. Mair, a professor of Chinese at the University of Pennsylvania, has written on the Web site http://pinyin.info, a guide to the Chinese language, that "a whole industry of pundits and therapists has grown up around this one grossly inaccurate formulation." He said the character "ji" actually means "incipient moment" or a "crucial point." Thus, he said, a wei-ji "is indeed a genuine crisis, a dangerous moment, a time when things start to go awry."

How Rice Uses History Lessons (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

LONDON -- U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice often calls herself "a student of history." And increasingly, she is using history -- or her chosen slice of it -- both to explain and justify the Bush administration's Middle East policy.

When Ms. Rice talks about the challenges the U.S. faces across the Mideast, she points, somewhat surprisingly, to Europe after World War II and to the West's decades-long face-off against the Soviet Union, which happens to be her area of expertise. It is a penchant that has scholars scratching their heads.

Citing the Cold War's denouement as context for today's bloodshed and tumult may seem far-fetched to some. But Ms. Rice uses the analogy both to beg for patience -- the Cold War, after all, consumed decades -- and to try to elucidate a diplomatic strategy that is increasingly assailed for its lack of assertiveness.

While traveling this week through the Middle East and Europe, Ms. Rice engaged in several long historical tutorials with reporters in tow. Her point in referring back to the Cold War, she said, isn't to argue that history repeats itself or that the analogy is exact.

"The reason that I cite some of these other times, like Europe, is that it is so clear in everybody's mind that the United States and its allies came out victorious at the end of the Cold War," she said in Kuwait. "But if you...look at the events that ultimately lead to that, you would have thought that this was failing every single day between 1945-1946 and probably 1987 or 1988."

Her contention is while things may look bad now in Iraq and elsewhere in the region, history is on the administration's side. She pushed a similar argument to reporters last month. The Middle East is "moving toward something that I am quite certain will not have a full resolution and that you will not be able to fully judge for decades," she said.

Critics dismiss Ms. Rice's references to the Cold War as both convenient and a sign of her limited frame of reference. The challenges facing Europe in 1946, they say, bear little similarity to those of the Middle East in the 21st century.

"The administration's reservoir of historical analogies seems limited to the 1914-1991 period. And it's all about Europe," said Adam Garfinkle, a former Rice speechwriter who edits the foreign-policy journal The American Interest. "No one in a senior position in this administration seems to have even the vaguest notion of modern Middle Eastern history."

When asked this week about what moments in Arab history inform her thinking, Ms. Rice said she had read about "the British experience" in Mesopotamia in the 1920s, which led to the founding of modern Iraq and the withdrawal of British forces. "I know a number of things that went right, and I know the things that went wrong," she said.

But Ms. Rice cleaves to her Cold War history to try to drive home a bigger point about the administration's diplomatic approach, which is seen by many as detached and lacking urgency. For six years, the administration has stayed out of direct efforts to push a peace accord between Israel and the Palestinians. Today, despite widespread calls to talk with Iran and Syria, Ms. Rice rejects such action as ill-timed.

She tends to portray events, particularly the clash between what she calls "moderation" and "extremism" in the Middle East, as driven by huge, almost inevitable forces that make diplomacy impractical, or even irrelevant. Critics say such a view has made Washington's top diplomat less flexible in policy making -- and less adept in old-style negotiation and hand-holding, whose results also can be hard to quantify in the short term.

Those who clamor for sitting down with Syria and Iran are out of touch with what Ms. Rice calls "the underlying forces."

"There's a tendency to think about diplomacy as something that is done untethered to the conditions underlying it or the balance underlying it," she said. "In fact, that's not the way that it works. You aren't going to be successful as a diplomat if you don't understand the strategic context in which you are actually negotiating. It is not deal-making."

On this trip, which wrapped up in London, Ms. Rice has portrayed her main mission as firming up what she calls "a new alignment" of moderate states allied with the U.S. to push back against Iran. Ms. Rice also has shown a new interest in trying to promote an Arab peace deal with Israel after years of inactivity.

Four years ago, the administration theorized that the U.S. invasion would spawn a democratic Iraq, on good terms with Israel, that would break the regional mold and compel erstwhile enemies to end hostility toward the Israelis. Now, Ms. Rice says it is the Iranian ascent wrought by the war that makes Arab states more open to negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0118770

To her thinking, there has been a shift in underlying forces -- as opposed to events the U.S. might have influenced. Again, she points to a favorite historical analogy: the reunification of Germany. "If you had tried to negotiate German unification for any period of time until 1990, you would have not been able to do it because the underlying circumstances were not there," she said.

Diplomacy Is Deal-making (LAT)

By Aaron David Miller

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

HAVING WORKED for six secretaries of State on Arab-Israeli negotiations, I nearly fell off my chair the other day when I read Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's comment to reporters that diplomacy wasn't about making deals.

Maybe "making deals" is too glib a phrase for her, but it's precisely what effective American diplomacy in the Middle East is mostly about. Her legacy may well be judged by that standard.

The secretary is absolutely correct in asserting, as she did, that diplomacy is more than deal making. Success or failure depends on a good reading of the circumstances and on a strategic grasp of whether and when to engage as a mediator. There's a big difference between taking the initiative and wanting a U.S. initiative. This is particularly true in the Arab-Israeli arena, where changing regional conditions have preceded every major breakthrough.

Henry Kissinger's successful "disengagement" diplomacy — separating Syrian, Israeli and Egyptian forces in the early 1970s — followed the 1973 war, which had overturned every major assumption of U.S. policy and forced the combatants to consider negotiations. Jimmy Carter's success in brokering Egyptian-Israeli peace flowed from Anwar Sadat's historic trip to Jerusalem; and Jim Baker's success in putting together the 1991 Madrid peace conference grew out of the Persian Gulf War and the collapse of the Soviet Union.

Shifting tectonic plates, however, is a necessary but not sufficient condition for diplomatic achievement. In these cases, what was also required was Washington's willingness and determination to broker a deal.

Kissinger's success, for example, required 18 months of listening to Arab and Israeli grievances, coaxing, reassuring them, and balancing their interests. His 34-day shuttle to consummate the agreement between Israel and Syria is the longest time a secretary of State has spent outside the United States on a diplomatic mission, with the exception of Robert Lansing at the Versailles peace conference.

The issue today, of course, is not what to do when you're faced with an obvious historic opportunity but how to make progress on a smaller scale. President Clinton faced such a situation in 1996. He confronted the challenge of a tough Israeli prime minister and a suspicious PLO chairman who had fundamentally different views on peace and no trust or confidence in the process. In a display of masterful deal making, Clinton spent more than a week pulling and pushing Yasser Arafat and Benjamin Netanyahu into an agreement that was hardly perfect but did save lives and kept the process going. That summit was preceded by nine months of nonstop stage-setting by Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and her team.

Rice faces a tougher situation . Weak Israeli and Palestinian leaders, non-state actors (such as Hamas and Hezbollah) and Iranian troublemaking have produced a volatile mix. She's also constrained by an administration that, in the face of 9/11, the war on terror, the Iranian challenge and the battle between Islamist radicals and moderates, views diplomacy as ineffective.

Yet now is precisely the time to exercise that instrument of American power. The situation between Israelis and Palestinians, as hopeless as it appears, cries out for serious American attention. A solution to their conflict won't fix Iraq or end the threat of radical Islam, but it will enhance our credibility, strengthen our friends and reduce the opportunities for our enemies to mobilize Arabs and Muslims against us.

Rice's decision to make the Israeli-Palestinian conflict a priority is a good beginning. To have any chance of succeeding, the administration will have to change its software, develop a sustained two-year effort and a strategy that — for both sides — is balanced, tough and reassuring. In the end, it will require Rice to accept the obvious fact that diplomacy — and its hundreds of hours of problem solving — is really about making deals after all.

Report: Cheney Rejected Iran Concessions (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0118771

An Iranian offer to help the United States stabilize Iraq and end its military support for Hezbollah and Hamas was rejected by Vice President Dick Cheney in 2003, a former top State Department official told the British Broadcasting Corp.

The U.S. State Department was open to the offer, which came in an unsigned letter sent shortly after the American invasion of Iraq, Lawrence Wilkerson, former Secretary of State Colin Powell's chief of staff, told BBC's Newsnight in a program broadcast Wednesday night. But, Wilkerson said, Cheney vetoed the deal.

"We thought it was a very propitious moment" to strike a deal, Wilkerson said. "But as soon as it got to the White House, and as soon as it got to the vice president's office, the old mantra of 'We don't talk to evil' ... reasserted itself."

A spokesman for the State Department said Thursday he wasn't aware of any letter from the Iranians to the U.S. government in 2003.

"Far as I know, there's never been an offer from the Iranian Government on those kinds of concerns," said Tom Casey, the state department's deputy spokesman.

Wilkerson said that, in return for its cooperation, Tehran asked Washington to lift sanctions and to dismantle the Mujahedeen Khalq, an Iranian opposition group which has bases in Iraq.

Iran also offered to increase the transparency of its nuclear program, according to Wilkerson.

Wilkerson has been a frequent critic of the Bush administration in general and Cheney in particular, holding the vice president responsible for the mistreatment of detainees and the failure of Iraq's postwar planning.

Iran Takes Tough Stand Over Nuclear Row (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, January 19, 2007

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad lashed out at a U.S. military buildup in the Gulf, saying Thursday that Iran is ready for any possibility in the standoff over its nuclear program.

The president made clear he was not backing down in his tough rhetoric toward the United States, despite criticism at home. Conservatives and reformists alike have openly challenged Ahmadinejad's nuclear diplomacy tactics, many saying his fiery anti-Western remarks are doing more harm than good.

Ahmadinejad said their calls for compromise echo "the words of the enemy."

At the same time, Ahmadinejad's top national security official, Ali Larijani, sharply denounced U.S. policy in Iraq, saying Washington is fueling Shiite-Sunni hatred.

Washington has accused Iran of backing militants fueling Iraq's violence, increasing tensions amid the dispute over Iran's nuclear program, which the U.S. says aims to produce nuclear weapons.

The United States sent an aircraft carrier to the Gulf this week — the second to deploy in the region — a buildup that Defense Secretary Robert Gates said was intended to impress on Iran that the four-year war in Iraq has not made America vulnerable.

In an apparent reaction to the deployment, Ahmadinejad vowed Thursday that Iran would not back down over its nuclear program, which Tehran says is being developed only to produce energy.

"Today, with the grace of God, we have gone through the arduous passes and we are ready for anything in this path," state-run television quoted the Iranian leader as saying.

The U.N. Security Council recently imposed limited sanctions to punish Iran for defying a resolution demanding that it suspend uranium enrichment, a process that can produce material to fuel nuclear reactors or, at purer concentrations, the core of nuclear weapons.

Amid growing domestic questioning, two Iranian newspapers have pointedly criticized the president's handling of the nuclear issue.

"Your language is so offensive and contains not very nice words that inculcates that the nuclear issue is being dealt with a sort of stubbornness," the conservative paper Jomhuri-e-Eslami said in a recent editorial.

Last Saturday, the reformist newspaper Aftab-e-Yazb said the nuclear policy was hurting Iran's ability to gain nuclear technology. It added: "Some current leaders act as if any person criticizing (the government) is an agent of the enemy."

DOJ_NMG_0118772

In Paris, the head of the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency, Mohamed ElBaradei, said he was concerned the sanctions could escalate Iran's standoff with Western powers.

"I don't think sanctions will resolve the issue ... Sanctions in my view could lead to escalation on both sides," he warned.

ElBaradei said the pressure has failed to break a consensus in Iran that the oil-rich nation needs to master the complex process of uranium enrichment. Iran this week said it is moving toward large-scale enrichment involving 3,000 centrifuges, which spin uranium gas into enriched material.

A diplomat and a U.N. official in Vienna said Thursday that much, but not all, of the hardware needed for the installation of the centrifuges was now in place at the Natanz facility designated to house Tehran's industrial-scale enrichment program.

The two — who requested anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss confidential information — emphasized that the facility had been ready for some time, and there was no sign that actual work on putting in the centrifuges would begin at any particular date.

ElBaradei called for a resumption of talks with Tehran, including the possibility of a French negotiator. "My worry right now is that each side is sticking to its guns," the International Atomic Energy Agency chief said. "We need someone to reach out."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said this week that now is not the time for the United States to talk to Iran, adding that Tehran does not appear ready to accept a conditional U.S. offer to join European talks over its nuclear program.

ElBaradei warned that only applying pressure could prompt the Islamic republic to follow the path of North Korea, which kicked out U.N. inspectors and pulled out of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty in 2003 and then conducted its first nuclear weapons test last October.

"My priority is to keep Iran inside the system," he said.

An Iranian Foreign Ministry delegation arrived in North Korea on Thursday, the communist nation's media reported. North Korea, like Iran, is facing intense international pressure to give up its nuclear weapons programs.

Larijani, the top national security official, kept up criticism of the United States in an interview with journalists from several Lebanese papers.

Larijani, who was in Lebanon on a tour of Arab nations seeking to build alliances with Iran, accused Washington of "stirring up Sunni-Shiite disputes" and "inciting Arab-Iranian discord."

The papers said Larijani was "encouraged" by his visit to Saudi Arabia — a pro-American, predominantly Sunni Arab kingdom considered a rival of overwhelmingly Shiite Persian Iran.

Ahmadinejad said he had sent a message to Saudi King Abdullah proposing the countries cooperate in trying to ease the violence in Iraq — a message apparently delivered by Larijani. Saudi officials have not commented on the message.

Gates Says U.S. Has Few Options To Halt Iran's Atomic Plans (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

MANAMA, Bahrain, Jan. 18 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates on Thursday played down the possibility of American military action against Iran but said it was not the right time for diplomatic engagement, either.

"Frankly, right at this moment there's really nothing the Iranians want from us, and so in any negotiation right now we would be the supplicant," Mr. Gates told reporters after talks with allies in the Persian Gulf.

His comments were a blunt acknowledgment that the Bush administration, despite its increasingly tough comments toward Iran in recent weeks, has limited options to compel its leaders to halt their nuclear program or to play a more supportive role in Iraq.

Mr. Gates said he told the emir of Qatar, Sheik Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani, over lunch on Thursday "that the Iranians were being very aggressive" because they believed that "they have the United States at some disadvantage because of the situation in Iraq."

He said he had told the emir that the United States did not intend to retreat from its commitments to defend the region's Sunni Arab governments.

In meetings late Wednesday with King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia, Mr. Gates said the United States viewed Iraq, despite the close ties between some in its Shiite-dominated government and Shiite Iran, as a bulwark against Tehran, said a senior Defense Department official.

"Our Arab friends tend to see Iraq in the context of the new challenge from Iran," the official said. "That's clearly the Saudi perspective. So the secretary was able to reassure them that we want an Iraq that is a barrier against Iranian expansionism."

Mr. Gates also met with Bahrain's leader, King Hamad bin Isa al-Khalifa, on Thursday night.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran said Thursday that Iran was prepared for anything in the standoff with the West over its nuclear program, which Iran says is for peaceful energy purposes and the United States contends is aimed at producing nuclear weapons.

"Today, with the grace of God, we have gone through the arduous passes and we are ready for anything in this path," Iran's state-run television quoted Mr. Ahmadinejad as saying, The Associated Press reported.

He was apparently referring to the United Nations decision to impose sanctions on Iran for its nuclear activities and to the American decision to move a second aircraft carrier, the John C. Stennis, to the Persian Gulf and to extend deployments of Patriot antimissile defense systems in Kuwait and Qatar.

Commodore Keith Winstanley of Britain, who is second in command of coalition naval forces in the region, told reporters at a briefing on Thursday that the carrier deployment should not be seen entirely as a move aimed at intimidating Iran, but he added, "I'm sure there's a message there for Iran."

Mr. Gates, who also met with the top American Navy and Air Force commanders in the region, said the deployments were meant to show that, for all its problems in Iraq, the United States could still fulfill its security commitments in the Persian Gulf.

He added: "Nobody wants another conflict in this region. My view is that there are many courses of actions available that do not involve a conflict with Iran. There is no need for that."

He acknowledged that the United States' troubles stabilizing Iraq had given Iran an opportunity to seek to expand its influence in the region but that the Iranians were "overplaying their hand."

Even though Iran is worrying its neighbors, he said, he disagreed with critics, including the Iraq Study Group, who have called for the Bush administration to hold talks with Iran and enlist its support in stabilizing Iraq. Mr. Gates had been a member of the group before resigning to become defense secretary.

Perhaps seeking leverage, the White House late last year approved a stepped up campaign of going after Iranian operatives inside Iraq, who United States officials say have been involved in supplying materials for the homemade bombs that are the largest killer of American troops in Iraq.

Gates: Iranians 'Overplaying Their Hand' (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, January 19, 2007

The Iranians are "overplaying their hand" on the world stage in a belief that setbacks in Iraq have weakened the United States, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Thursday.

He said that now is not the time to negotiate with Iran because the U.S. lacks leverage but that talks probably would make sense at some point.

The U.S. has been applying growing pressure on Iran, blaming Tehran for providing bombs and other help used against American troops by militants in Iraq. President Bush has warned the U.S. will "seek out and destroy" the networks providing that help.

In addition, American raids inside Iraq have netted Iranian prisoners, and the U.S. is sending a second aircraft carrier and missiles to the region.

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended including Iran in regional talks on ending the violence in Iraq, a path the Bush administration has so far declined to take.

DOJ_NMG_0118774

Gates said he had told the leaders of U.S. allies Saudi Arabia and Qatar that the Iranians "believe they have the United States at some disadvantage because of the situation in Iraq."

"To be precise, I told them both that I thought the Iranians were overplaying their hand and that one of the consequences of that is that they have raised real concerns on the part of a number of countries in the region and beyond about their intentions," he told reporters.

Many Gulf nations are worried about a rising Iranian influence — a concern made more acute by the prospect for a further slide toward civil war in Iraq.

With regard to U.S. failure thus far to achieve stability in Iraq, Gates said, "I think that our difficulties have given them (the Iranians) a tactical opportunity in the short term, but the United States is a very powerful country."

Asked about the prospects for military conflict with Iran, whose nuclear program is seen by the Bush administration as a growing threat to U.S. interests, Gates said, "There are many courses of action available that do not involve an open conflict with Iran — there's no need for that."

Gates said that although he had publicly advocated negotiating with Iran as recently as 2004, he now advises against that.

"Right at this moment, there's really nothing the Iranians want from us," he said. "And so, in any negotiation right now we would be the supplicant," asking Iran to stop doing such things as enriching uranium for its nuclear program.

"We need some leverage, it seems to me, before we engage with the Iranians," Gates added. "And I think at some point engagement probably makes sense."

Until the Iranians are persuaded that, despite being bogged down in Iraq, "the United States is in fact a formidable adversary, there's not much advantage for us in engaging with them," he said.

That assessment may explain, at least in part, the decision announced last week to send a second U.S. aircraft carrier into the Persian Gulf region, along with a Patriot missile battalion capable of shooting down shorter-range ballistic missiles of the type Iran has in its arsenal.

In Bahrain, a British Royal Navy officer who is the No. 2 commander for coalition naval forces in the Central Command area of responsibility told reporters that the exact role and missions of the aircraft carrier USS John Stennis, which is due to arrive in the Gulf area next month, have not yet been worked out.

British Commodore Keith Winstanley said the Stennis deployment should not be seen entirely as a move aimed at Iran, but he added, "I'm sure there's a message there for Iran."

He said Iranian naval operations have not changed in any significant way since Bush announced the extra carrier deployment, and Winstanley said at-sea contacts with the Iranian navy have been "extremely cordial."

On his second overseas trip since replacing Donald H. Rumsfeld as Pentagon chief, Gates visited the headquarters of Central Command's naval staff, which is located here with the U.S. Navy's 5th Fleet. Then he flew to Qatar for a meeting with that tiny Gulf state's top leader, Sheikh Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani.

Afterward, he visited an air base from which Central Command's air staff plans, runs and monitors air operations throughout the Middle East and Central Asia. Under ground rules imposed by U.S. officials, reporters traveling with Gates were prohibited from identifying the base or the country in which it is located.

Gates also met with Gen. John Abizaid, the head of Central Command, whose forward headquarters is in Qatar. Abizaid is due to retire in March; Adm. William Fallon has been nominated to replace him.

Gates Sees Tehran As Overly Ambitious (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

MANAMA, Bahrain -- Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates warned yesterday that Iran is "overplaying their hand" in trying to exploit U.S. difficulties in the war in Iraq.

Following private meetings for the past two days with Saudi King Abdullah and Qatar Emir Sheik Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani, Mr. Gates said he found deep concern about Iran's ambitions in Iraq and the wider Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0118775

"I think the Iranians are overplaying their hand. They have raised real concerns in the region and beyond about their intentions," said the Pentagon chief said in a briefing last night with reporters.

But Mr. Gates also said he found no appetite in the region for another conflict and said recent U.S. moves to bolster its military presence in the region and increase troops levels in Iraq were not a prelude to action against Tehran.

"Our difficulties have given them a tactical opportunity in the short term, but the United States remains a very powerful country," Mr. Gates said.

The dispatch of a second naval carrier strike group to the Persian Gulf by President Bush last week was a clear sign "we are going to remain [in the region for a long time]," Mr. Gates said.

The defense chief, who finishes his regional tour with a stop in Iraq today, said he found support from U.S. allies for the strategy behind Mr. Bush's increase in troops and aid to Iraq as a means to control the violence and aid the beleaguered government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

But he said many Arab regimes are still not convinced that Mr. Bush's plan can achieve his goals.

"I would say they expressed hope" that the plan will work, he said.

Although he co-authored a 2004 Council on Foreign Relations study urging engagement with Tehran to solve the region's security problems, Mr. Gates said yesterday Tehran's assertive new stance and its unwillingness to halt its suspect nuclear programs meant direct engagement now would not be wise for the United States.

"Frankly, right at this moment, there's really nothing the Iranians want from us," he said. "In any negotiation, we would be the supplicant."

"We need some leverage, it seems to me, before we engage with the Iranians," Mr. Gates said. "And I think at some point engagement probably makes sense."

Nearly four years ago, Iran offered to cut off aid and support for the Lebanese Shi'ite militia Hezbollah and the Palestinian group Hamas, and promised full transparency on its nuclear program, in a secret letter to the United States soon after the 2003 invasion of Iraq, the British Broadcasting Corp. reported on Wednesday.

According to the BBC, the letter, which it obtained, was unsigned, but the State Department understood that it came with the approval of the highest Iranian authorities.

The Islamic republic also offered to use its influence to support stabilization in Iraq, and in return asked for a halt in U.S. hostility, an abolition of all sanctions, and the pursuit and repatriation of members of the Mujahedeen Khalq (People's Mujahedeen).

The People's Mujahedeen is an exiled Iranian opposition group that fought alongside Saddam Hussein's army in the eight-year war with Iran, and is currently based in Iraq.

Initially, the State Department was receptive to the offer, according to Lawrence Wilkerson, former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell's chief of staff, who spoke to the BBC.

"As soon as it got to the White House, and as soon as it got to the vice president's office, the old mantra of 'we don't talk to evil' ... reasserted itself," Mr. Wilkerson told the broadcast company.

Tough Talk Raises Fears Of Iran Clash (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 19, 2007

Increasingly tough talk on Iran from the Bush administration – with vice-president Dick Cheney warning of the "growing threat" from the Islamic republic – has rattled politicians and diplomats in Washington worried that the war in Iraq is set to widen.

While few lay claim to understanding what George W. Bush has in mind, there is a widespread sense that the likelihood of some kind of military clash or conflict with Iran – directly or through proxies – has risen since the US president accused Tehran last week of "providing material support for attacks on American troops" in Iraq.

"The air is filled with the possibility of action against Iran's nuclear capability," was how a former senator described the atmosphere to Saudi Arabia's departing ambassador, Prince Turki al-Faisal, over dinner on Wednesday night.

The consequences would be "catastrophic", the envoy and former head of Saudi intelligence replied.

However, over a long evening hosted by the New America Foundation think-tank, the ambassador conveyed the impression that the Bush administration's rhetoric and sabre-rattling – including the dispatch of a second aircraft carrier group and Patriot air defence missiles to the Gulf, and a raid on an Iranian office in Iraq – was intended more as a loud demonstration that the US was not retreating from the region.

Prince Turki said there was concern "in the region" that Mr Bush's authority had been eroded by the Republicans' loss of Congress in November's elections. Attempts by the new Democratic-controlled Congress to limit US troop numbers in Iraq would be a serious mistake, he said.

Analysts say the US-Saudi relationship, previously under great strain in the wake of al-Qaeda's attacks on the US in 2001, has become the key to the US strategy of containment and deterrence towards Iran.

Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, who has just completed a tour of Sunni Arab allies and Israel to reassure them of a beefed-up US presence in the Gulf, speaks repeatedly of a "new alignment" in the Middle East – where the "responsible" leaders of the Gulf Arab regimes, plus Jordan and Egypt, are aligned with the US [and Israel] against the "extremist" forces of Iran, Syria, Lebanon's Hizbollah, and the Palestinian group Hamas.

She has singled out Iran's Revolutionary Guards as responsible for helping Shia death squads in Iraq and providing explosives used against US forces.

"It's not new at all; it is back to the 1980s," commented Ray Takeyh, analyst with the Council on Foreign Relations, recalling the Sunni Arab funding and US support for Iraq's Saddam Hussein in his 1980-88 war with Iran.

"You might see a sort of proxy war inside Iraq," he added. But he noted that Iran's response to the US seizure of five of its officials in Arbil had been "judicious".

Although Prince Turki evaded questions about the "new alignment" and criticised the US refusal to speak to Iran, his remarks confirmed the deterioration in relations between Saudi Arabia and Tehran. He spoke of an argument over Iran's alleged interference in Iraq at a meeting between King Abdullah and Ali Larijani, a senior Iranian security official, this week.

He said the king told Mr Larijani in Riyadh that Iran was not playing a constructive role in Iraq. The king said Iraq risked becoming "a danger to its neighbours" – a clear reference to Saudi fears that the growing Sunni-Shia conflict will infect the region and stir up unrest among Saudi Arabia's substantial Shia minority.

Asked about the support Iraq's Sunni insurgents received from inside Saudi Arabia, Prince Turki said they were backed from all over the Sunni world. But he denied the kingdom was interfering in Iraq and said it was trying to stop cross-border infiltration.

Diplomats in Washington anxious about possible US-Iranian hostilities say the Bush administration has concluded that UN Security Council sanctions against Iran will not work because of opposition from Russia and China.

Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, on Thursday expressed similar concerns. "I don't think sanctions will resolve the issue. I think sanctions, in my view, could lead to escalation on both sides."

Rebuke In Iran To Its President On Nuclear Role (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi And Michael Slackman

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

TEHRAN, Jan. 18 — Iran's outspoken president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, appears to be under pressure from the highest authorities in Iran to end his involvement in its nuclear program, a sign that his political capital is declining as his country comes under increasing international pressure.

Just one month after the United Nations Security Council imposed sanctions on Iran to curb its nuclear program, two hard-line newspapers, including one owned by the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, called on the president to stay out of all matters nuclear.

In the hazy world of Iranian politics, such a public rebuke was seen as a sign that the supreme leader — who has final say on all matters of state — might no longer support the president as the public face of defiance to the West.

It is the first sign that Mr. Ahmadinejad has lost any degree of Ayatollah Khamenei's confidence, a potentially damaging development for a president who has rallied his nation and defined his administration by declaring nuclear power Iran's "inalienable right."

It was unclear, however, whether this was merely an effort to improve Iran's public image by lowering Mr. Ahmadinejad's profile or was signaling a change in policy.

The presidency is a relatively weak position with no official authority over foreign policy, the domain of the supreme leader. But Mr. Ahmadinejad has used his post as a bully pulpit to insert himself into the nuclear debate, and as long as he appeared to enjoy Ayatollah Khamenei's support, he could continue.

While Iran remains publicly defiant, insisting that it will move ahead with its nuclear ambitions, it is under increasing strain as political and economic pressures grow. And the message that Iran's most senior officials seem to be sending is that Mr. Ahmadinejad, with his harsh approach and caustic comments, is undermining Iran's cause and its standing.

The Security Council passed a resolution on Dec. 23 with sanctions intended to curb Iran's uranium enrichment program, which Iran says is for peaceful purposes but the United States and some European nations contend is for the purpose of creating nuclear weapons. The measure bars the trade of goods or technology related to Iran's nuclear program. Enriched uranium can be used for making nuclear fuel but also for making nuclear weapons.

The president dismissed the Security Council resolution as "a piece of torn paper."

But the daily Jomhouri-Eslami, which reflects the views of Ayatollah Khamenei, said, "The resolution is certainly harmful for the country," adding that it was "too much to call it 'a piece of torn paper.' "

The newspaper added that the nuclear program required its own diplomacy, "sometimes toughness and sometimes flexibility."

In another sign of pressure on the president to distance himself from the nuclear issue, a second newspaper, run by an aide to the country's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, also pressed Mr. Ahmadinejad to end his involvement in the nuclear program. Mr. Larijani also ran for president and was selected for his post by the supreme leader.

"They want to minimize the consequences of sanctions now that they have been imposed," said Mohammad Atrianfar, an executive at the daily Shargh, which was closed last fall, and a reformist politician. "But they don't have clear strategy, and they are taking one step at a time."

Mr. Ahmadinejad took office more than a year ago as an outsider, the mayor of Tehran who promised to challenge the status quo, to equally distribute Iran's oil wealth and to restore what he saw as the lost values of the Islamic revolution. His was a populist message, centered on a socialist economic model and Islamic values. He found opposition from the right and the left, in Parliament and among so-called pragmatists.

That pressure has continued, and the criticism now seems to have gained more credibility in the face of the sanctions and Iran's troubled economic standing. The United States increased pressure on Iran over its role in Iraq has also raised concerns in Tehran and may be behind efforts to restrain the president, political analysts in Tehran said.

"The resolution has decreased Iran's political credibility in the international community, and so other countries cannot defend Iran," said Ahmad Shirzad, a reformist politician and a former legislator.

Although the Security Council sanctions were limited to Iran's nuclear program, they have started to cause economic disruptions.

About 50 legislators signed a letter this week calling on the president to appear before Parliament to answer questions about the nuclear program. They need at least 22 more signatures.

In another letter, 150 lawmakers criticized the president for his economic policies, which have led to a surge in inflation, and for his failure to submit his annual budget on time.

The Iranian stock market, which was already in a slump, continued to decline — falling more rapidly in the past month — as buyers stayed away from the market. The daily Kargozaran reported last week that the number of traders had decreased by 46 percent since the Security Council resolution was passed.

"The resolution has had a psychological effect on people," said Ali Hagh, an economist in Tehran. "It does not make sense for investors not to consider political events when they want to invest their money."

Kargozaran reported that a group of powerful businessmen, the Islamic Coalition Party, met with Mohammad Nahavandian, a senior official at the Supreme National Security Council, and called for moderation in the country's nuclear policies to prevent further damage to the economy.

In the past year, several major European banks have severed their business ties with Iran. Economists say the banks' actions will also lead to an increase in inflation because importers must turn to complicated ways to finance purchases.

"The nuclear issue has paved the way for other forms of pressures on Iran," Mr. Shirzad said.

Despite Mr. Ahmadinejad's harsh language since the resolution was passed, Ayatollah Khamenei has not referred to it directly and only once said that Iran would not give up its right to pursue its nuclear program.

Mr. Larijani has said that Iran will not quit the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty or bar international inspectors despite earlier threats to do so.

US Lawmakers Demand Bush Ask Congress Before Invading Iran (AFP)

AFP, January 19, 2007

A resolution introduced in the US House of Representatives calls on President George W. Bush to obtain approval from Congress before using military force against Iran.

The bill, introduced by longtime Iraq war critic Walter Jones, a Republican, and five other US lawmakers calls on the president obtain authorization for an attack on Iran, unless the United States or US interests are attacked first.

Supporters said the legislation would prevent the United States from becoming embroiled in another intractable war like the one raging in Iraq.

"Congress will not stand by idly -- it won't be railroaded into another war that will only make America and the world less safe," Democratic Representative Martin Meehan said at a press conference Thursday.

He said recent administration statements and military maneuvers point to an imminent attack on Iran.

"The indications of the initial saber-rattling are everywhere," Meehan said.

"I'm not here to tell you that I trust Iran, but I am here to say that I don't trust the administration," Meehan said.

Bush announced last week he had ordered a second US aircraft carrier battle group to the Gulf and announced the deployment of a Patriot missile defense battalion to the region to protect allies against potential Iranian missile strikes.

And in a speech unveiling his new strategy for Iraq, the US president also vowed to "seek out and destroy" any networks funneling weapons or fighters from Syria or Iran into Iraq.

Those moves have fed speculation that a US attack might be imminent, despite the administration's repeated denials.

"There is a growing concern -- justified or not -- that some US officials are contemplating military action against Iran," Jones said, adding that an invasion of Iran would flout the US Constitution.

"If the President is contemplating committing our blood and treasure in another war, then he and his administration must make the case to Congress and the American people why it would be in the national security interests of the United States to engage militarily in Iran," Jones said.

Germany Proposes Wider Iran Sanctions (FT)

By Fidelius Schmid And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, January 19, 2007

The European Union could expand the range of sanctions against Iran beyond United Nations-mandated measures, according to a document seen by the Financial Times.

A proposal by Germany, holder of the EU's revolving presidency, would ban individuals linked to Iran's nuclear and missile programmes from visiting the EU and reaffirm the EU's opposition to selling arms to Tehran.

Last month the Security Council passed a resolution requiring UN member states to prevent the transfer of nuclear and missile technology to Tehran and to stop all financing for a number of companies linked to the nuclear and missile programmes. The resolution also requires UN states to freeze the assets of 12 people connected with the programmes.

The EU proposals, put forward ahead of a foreign ministers meeting on Monday, would also ban travel to the EU of the individuals on the UN list and take steps to restrict Iranians studying proliferation-sensitive subjects within the EU."

However, at a meeting on Thursday night EU diplomats watered down an earlier initiative to declare a formal arms embargo on Tehran, which would have grouped Iran with pariah states such as Sudan and Zimbabwe.

The proposals will need to be backed by all 27 EU member states, some of which, such as Italy, have close commercial ties with Iran.

Diplomats: Iran May Start Enrichment (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, January 19, 2007

Iran is ready to start assembling thousands of centrifuges to produce enriched uranium — a possible pathway to nuclear arms — after finishing most preliminary work on an underground facility housing such machines, a diplomat and a U.N. official said Thursday.

The two — who requested anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss confidential information — said much, but not all, of the hardware needed for the installation of the centrifuges was now in place at the Natanz facility designated to house Tehran's industrial-scale enrichment program.

Both men emphasized that the facility had been ready for some time, and there was no sign that actual work on putting in the centrifuges would begin at any particular date.

Still, there has been speculation that the hardline leadership might start doing so next month, to celebrate the 28th anniversary of the Islamic Revolution that brought the clerical leadership to power.

The revelations — based on reports by inspectors of the International Atomic Energy Agency visiting Natanz this week — appeared to strengthen claims from Tehran that it is moving toward large-scale enrichment involving 3,000 centrifuges, which spin uranium gas into enriched material.

Low-enriched uranium can be used to generate power, while highly enriched levels serve as the fissile core of nuclear warheads

"We are moving toward the production of nuclear fuel, which requires 3,000 centrifuges and more than this figure," government spokesman Gholamhossein Elham told reporters Monday. "This program is being carried out and moving toward completion."

Iran's leaders have suggested those machines would be in place by March 20, the end of the Iranian year. But the diplomat and official said quick completion of such a large-scale project was unlikely, saying the complicated process takes months.

The United States and some of its allies accuse Iran of trying to produce nuclear weapons. Tehran denies this, saying its program is only for generating electricity.

The IAEA has said it has found no evidence that Iran is trying to build nuclear weapons, but it has criticized the country for concealing certain nuclear activities, conducting experiments that seem to have no peaceful nuclear applications and failing to answer questions about the program.

Iran plans to ultimately expand its enrichment program to 54,000 centrifuges. That would give it the capacity to produce dozens of nuclear warheads a year, if it chose to develop weapons.

North Korea: Nuclear 'Agreement' Reached (AP)

By Burt Herman

AP, January 19, 2007

North Korea said Friday that it had reached an agreement with the U.S. during direct talks with Washington's main nuclear envoy this week in Germany, but the top American envoy said it had yet to be seen whether progress could be made at six-nation disarmament negotiations.

North Korea's Foreign Ministry said the talks between U.S. envoy Christopher Hill and North Korea's main nuclear negotiator Kim Kye Gwan had been held "in a positive and sincere atmosphere and a certain agreement was reached there." No further details were given.

But Hill, who arrived Friday in Seoul, said he wasn't sure what agreement the statement was referring to. He called the talks in Berlin "very useful discussions" and added he was pleased that it appeared the North was also positive about them.

Hill and Kim met for three days and were believed to be discussing when to convene the next session of international talks on the North's nuclear programs, among other issues. The last round in Beijing in December — held after the North conducted its first-ever nuclear test in October — ended without any breakthroughs.

"We paid attention to the direct dialogue held by the (North) and the U.S. in a bid to settle knotty problems in resolving the nuclear issue," the North's ministry said Friday in a statement released by the country's official Korean Central News Agency.

Hill emphasized the focus of denuclearization talks still was the main six-nation talks — which also include China, Japan, Russia and South Korea — and time would tell how this week's meetings with North Korea would help move things forward there.

"What we now have to do is to see how those discussions can be folded into the six-party process, whether those discussions can help lead to some progress in Beijing," he said.

The U.S. diplomat was heading to Tokyo and Beijing after his meetings with South Korean officials Friday.

A news report Friday said the arms talks could resume early next month due to progress made at the Germany meetings.

South Korea's Yonhap news agency, citing an unnamed diplomat in Seoul, reported that the discussions in Berlin "progressed toward a very positive direction."

Another unnamed diplomat said there is a high possibility the nuclear talks would resume in Beijing the week of Feb. 5, Yonhap reported late Thursday.

But Chun Yung-woo, South Korea's main envoy to the six-nation nuclear talks, told The Associated Press that "nothing has been decided yet" on the date of further talks.

At the December talks, the North refused to engage in any discussion of its nuclear program and repeated a demand for the U.S. to lift its blacklisting of a Macau bank for its complicity in the communist country's alleged counterfeiting and money laundering. The U.S. move led the bank to freeze North Korean assets worth about $24 million.

The U.S. is holding separate financial talks with North Korea, but the last session that met alongside the nuclear talks in December made no progress and another meeting is expected this month.

N. Korea Interested In Deal To Halt Nukes (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

LONDON -- North Korea has expressed interest in a U.S.-backed proposal that it suspend its nuclear program and allow U.N. inspectors to verify the suspension as an initial step toward dismantling its nuclear capabilities, diplomats said yesterday.

During three days of talks in Berlin that ended yesterday, North Korea's chief negotiator, Kim Gye-gwan, asked his U.S. counterpart, Christopher R. Hill, what the United States would be willing to do if the North turned off its nuclear reactor. A U.S. response, if any, was not made public.

North Korea's foreign ministry today called the Hill-Kim talks "sincere and positive."

In the upbeat assessment, the communist state said the talks yielded "a certain agreement," but it declined to elaborate on the nature of the dialogue.

The ministry said the talks were held in a "sincere atmosphere." Its comments appeared in a statement released by the country's official Korean Central News Agency.

Mr. Hill flew to South Korea to begin briefing other governments involved in talks with the North. He also plans to visit China and Japan.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the United States had not changed its policy of refusing to negotiate directly with North Korea over nuclear weapons, but was trying to prepare for the next round of talks.

"We are not going outside the six-party framework to bilateralize our discussions with the North Koreans," Miss Rice said.

The plan was first presented during six-nation talks in Beijing last month, which ended in deadlock.

In Berlin this week, the North Koreans offered their own ideas about how it could be implemented, said diplomats who asked not to be named because they were not authorized to speak about the closed-door sessions.

They also declined to share Mr. Hill's response.

However, Mr Hill discussed the process of normalizing relations with the North in a speech on Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0118781

Full normalization of U.S.-North Korean ties was envisioned in a Sept. 19, 2005, joint statement by the six nations, once the North scrapped its nuclear programs.

Other participants in the talks -- Japan, China, South Korea and Russia -- also offered political and economic benefits.

"We look forward really to establishing, consistent with our obligations under the September '05 agreement, a normal relationship with North Korea," Mr. Hill told the American Academy in Berlin.

"Obviously, this is via a bilateral process, which will take some time," he said. "But we are prepared to go on that road and to really offer North Korea a hand as it moves along that road."

After the December talks, South Korean news outlets reported that a proposal had been made by the United States that included an offer of written security guarantees.

U.S. officials said yesterday that most of the ideas came from China, which hosted the negotiations.

"The Chinese really are the ones who put forward ideas in the last round of the six-party talks, and part of what the North Koreans are responding to [in Berlin] is that," Miss Rice told reporters traveling with her to London after a five-day Middle East tour.

When the proposal was first made late last month, Mr. Kim refused to respond because he did not have instructions from Pyongyang. Once he received them, he requested a meeting with Mr. Hill, a U.S. official said.

In Berlin, Mr. Hill and Mr. Kim discussed "certain steps toward dismantling," although the official insisted they would not amount to a "freeze," a term used in a failed 1994 nuclear deal known as the Agreed Framework.

In 2002, the Bush administration accused North Korea of having a secret uranium-enrichment program while its single nuclear reactor, which makes plutonium, was shut down.

Since then, the North has restarted the reactor and it has tested a nuclear weapon, thought to be powered by plutonium from the reactor.

US Denies Rare Meetings With North Koreans Signal Policy Shift (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, January 19, 2007

US officials denied that a rare series of meetings between senior US and North Korean diplomats marked a break with the Bush administration's long-standing refusal to negotiate directly with the Stalinist regime.

"This is not an instance of bilateral negotiations," Tony Snow, President George W. Bush's spokesman, said of the three days of talks on North Korea's nuclear program this week between chief US negotiator Christopher Hill and his North Korean counterpart, Kim Kye-gwan.

Hill and Kim met in Berlin for several hours between Wednesday and Thursday in their first one-on-one sessions held outside of a multi-party format in Beijing since Bush came to office in 2001.

Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asia and the Pacific, described the talks aimed at getting North Korea to give up its nuclear weapons as "substantive" and "useful".

The meetings fueled speculation that Bush, mired in the Iraq crisis and in dire need of a foreign policy success, had loosened the reins on his diplomats so they could deal more directly with formerly taboo regimes.

But Snow and other officials insisted the Berlin contacts broke no new ground and were part of an ongoing set of six-party negotiations launched in 2003 and resurrected in December after a year-long boycott by the North Koreans.

Hill met with Kim in hopes of organizing another round of the broader talks later this month or early next month in the Chinese capital, State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said.

Their talks "certainly don't represent anything particularly new or different from what we've done before," Casey said.

The six-party talks -- involving China, Japan, the two Koreas, Russia and the United States -- are aimed at convincing North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program in exchange for security guarantees, economic aid and a normalization of relations with Washington.

North Korea returned to the talks after being hit with international sanctions in October for having carried out its first nuclear test explosion.

DOJ_NMG_0118782

Five days of negotiations ended in deadlock, with the North Koreans refusing to broach the subject of nuclear weapons unless Washington backed off financial sanctions imposed a year earlier on a Macau bank accused of money-laundering for Pyongyang.

The US has agreed to discuss the sanctions in parallel with the nuclear disarmament talks.

North Korea has long sought direct bilateral dealings with the United States as a way to boost its status internationally and avoid linkages with other issues involving Washington's regional allies.

Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have refused, pointing to failed denuclearization negotiations carried out with Pyongyang by the previous administration of President Bill Clinton as proof that two-way talks with the erratic North Koreans cannot work.

They argue that the combined pressure of the multi-party format, notably including North Korea's primary benefactor, China, is needed to ensure Pyongyang honors any future agreements.

Bush and Rice similarly have refused calls to engage directly with Iran and Syria as part of the administration's latest push to stabilize Iraq and resolve crises in Lebanon and between Israel and the Palestinians.

Their stance has been widely criticized by the opposition Democrats who gained control of Congress in November as well as by leaders of Bush's won Republican party and former officials from both political camps.

The State Department's Casey on Thursday reaffirmed the administration's refusal to deal with Iran unless it complies with UN resolutions demanding it halt uranium enrichment activities many believe are part of a program to develop nuclear weapons.

Rice told Congress last week that she would meet "any time, anywhere" with the Iranians once they meet the UN demands.

"It's pretty clear that if the Iranians want to have a dialogue with the United States, there's an avenue open to them and we'd very much like them to take us up on it," Casey said.

United Nations Dictators Program (WSJ)

By Melanie Kirkpatrick

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

Saddam Hussein managed to pull off the $100 billion Oil for Food scam right under the noses of the United Nations officials charged with administering it. Now another dictator with nuclear ambitions has succeeded in a similar trick, this time manipulating the United Nations Development Program in North Korea.

The story of the UNDP's lack of oversight of its operations in North Korea is revealed in previously undisclosed documents and an exchange of letters between U.S. and U.N. officials. American officials have been pushing for months for more transparency in UNDP operations in North Korea, while the UNDP has resisted.

In a Jan. 16 letter to UNDP Associate Administrator Ad Melkert, Ambassador Mark Wallace of the U.S. Mission to the U.N. lays out what American digging has found so far: The UNDP's program in the Democratic People's Republic "has for years operated in blatant violation of U.N. rules, served as a steady and large source of hard currency and other resources for the DPRK government with minimal or no assurance that UNDP funds and resources are utilized for legitimate development activities." Mr. Wallace declined to speak with me, but Richard Grenell, spokesman for the U.S. Mission, said yesterday: "We have raised serious concerns with UNDP regarding their oversight of the programs in North Korea . . . We want to ensure that U.S. tax dollars are not used to fund illicit activities."

While the precise amount of hard currency supplied through UNDP isn't known, the documents suggest it has run at least to the tens of millions of dollars since 1998 and one source says it could be upward of $100 million. An internal 1999 audit notes a budget of $27.9 million for 29 projects. David Morrison, a UNDP spokesman, says "the overall size of the program" in North Korea has been reduced in recent years. While $22.2 million was budgeted for 2005-2006, the agency spent only $3.2 million last year and $2.1 million in 2005, he says. Programs fall into four areas: humanitarian assistance, public health, environment and agriculture, and the economy.

The stakes are nonetheless very high because, unlike Saddam's Iraq, North Korea has already succeeded in testing its nuclear bomb. The hard currency supplied by the UNDP almost certainly goes into one big pot marked "Dear Leader," which Kim can use for whatever he wants, including his weapons programs. This may not violate the letter of Security Council Resolution 1718, which restricts trade in anything having to do with North Korea's nuclear or missile programs, but it certainly violates its spirit.

Unlike Oil for Food, there's no evidence to date that corrupt UNDP officials are in on the game -- though given the U.N.'s record of late, it would be unwise to rule that out before a full investigation. There is, however, plenty of evidence of willful blindness on the part of the UNDP, which let myriad rules be broken and allowed itself to become a large source of hard currency for the regime. Nor did it bring these irregularities to the attention of its governing body, the 36-member executive board.

Consider staffing. The UNDP's Pyongyang office is dominated by government employees selected by North Korea. According to a redacted version of a 2004 internal audit, "The government provides only one candidate for each post and does not provide detailed qualifications, work experience or personal details to the office." The auditors recommended that the UNDP recruit its own staff. A status update, dated Dec. 15, 2006, dryly notes that "the Government is not yet ready to consider such a shift at present."

In addition to appointing the UNDP's staff, the North Korean government requires that UNDP pay their salaries to the government, which presumably takes its cut. That's the way it works for North Korean workers who labor abroad or who work for South Korean companies in the Kaesong Industrial Complex north of the DMZ. In yet another violation of the rules, UNDP gives local staff a cash "meal stipend" of $120 a month, which is another hard currency contribution.

Speaking of cash, the UNDP also accedes to Pyongyang's demands that it pay cash to local government vendors. That's another violation of U.N. rules, as is placing North Korean staffers in jobs that give them control of financial records, personnel actions, and equipment and supplies. To cite just one example of abuse, the 1999 internal audit found that the UNDP checkbook was not kept in a secure location and no check register was maintained reflecting checks written.

But who needs a checkbook? According to the same audit, cash is the only means of payment that the government accepts. The UNDP does not use purchase orders in North Korea and local purchases -- including those over $1,000 -- are made in cash. That includes local office costs, which are typically provided in kind by the host country. North Korea even charges rent, to the tune of $2 million a year, according to one source who has looked at the program.

Meanwhile, there is little if any oversight of the UNDP's projects in North Korea, which, according to a U.N. document, numbered 30 last year. UNDP regulations require one official, on-site visit a year but since Pyongyang prohibits foreigners from visiting some of the project sites, that's another rule that's out the window. Audits of individual projects are spotty at best and in the case of "nationally executed" or "NEX" projects -- that is, those run by the North Korean government with funds provided by the UNDP -- they are often done by the government itself, giving new meaning to the adage about the fox running the henhouse.

It's anyone's guess as to whether the UNDP work in North Korea is benefiting the people for whom it is intended. According to Mr. Wallace's letter, "In the absence of real audits and site visits it is impossible for UNDP to verify whether or not any of the funds paid to the DPRK for supposed use in UNDP programs have actually been used for bona fide development purposes or if the DPRK has converted such funds for its own illicit purposes."

The U.S. sits on the agency's executive board, and in 2005 contributed $105 million, 11.4% of UNDP's core budget (plus an additional $142 million for specified projects). Yet American officials have had to fight for even the most basic information on the UNDP's activities in North Korea. When the U.S. Mission asked for copies of the internal audits of the North Korean operations, it was rebuffed. "Internal audit reports are important management tools for Executive Heads and, therefore, confidential," wrote Kemal Dervis, UNDP's head, on Jan. 5. After protests, American officials were finally permitted to review three internal audits -- 1999, 2001, 2004 -- but were not allowed to retain copies.

Meanwhile, as the U.S. was pressing for answers about North Korean shenanigans involving the UNDP, three North Korean officials were traveling to New York, courtesy of the U.N., for, among other things, next week's meeting of the UNDP executive board. The U.N. picked up their business-class, trans-Pacific tickets at $11,959 each. When U.S. officials objected, the UNDP, in a rare flash of insight, changed its policy.

"Starting immediately after the forthcoming Board meeting, UNDP will not reimburse government officials' travel or other costs for attending Board meetings," writes Mr. Melkert, the associate administrator, in a Jan. 12 letter to Mr. Wallace. It apparently occurred to Mr. Melkert and his boss, Mr. Dervis, that it might not be appropriate for the U.N. to pay for officials of a country that is abusing the U.N. to come to U.N. headquarters to lobby for re-funding its operations.

Also under U.S. pressure, the UNDP now says it will stop transferring hard currency to the Kim Jong Il regime. "We have instructed the DPRK Country Office that all payments in hard currency to government, national partners, local staff and local vendors should end at the latest by 1 March 2007," writes Mr. Melkert, in the Jan. 12 letter.

UNDP spokesman Mr. Morrison says his agency's operations in North Korea "fully comply" with the decisions of the executive board and with the board-approved financial regulations. UNDP is taking "all necessary measures to avoid misperceptions or unintended consequences," he says, and will institute "any additional measures the board may deem necessary." Since Mr. Wallace's letter presents a very different assessment of UNDP actions in North Korea, that should make for an animated board meeting next week.

At that meeting, the U.S., along with Canada, Japan, Belgium and Serbia, plan to request a "deferral" of the agency's programs in North Korea until a full accounting of its operations can be made. An independent, outside audit is an essential first step. A full-scale investigation along the lines of the Volcker Commission's Oil for Food probe would be even better. And don't stop at the UNDP. The North Korean operations of other U.N. agencies -- Unicef, the World Food Program, the Population Fund -- also deserve scrutiny. It's crucial to determine whether, like Saddam Hussein's manipulation of the Oil for Food program, Kim Jong Il has been busy using the resources of the United Nations for his own illicit purposes.

U.N. Cash For Kim (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

The U.N.'s Oil for Food disgrace rolls on, with this week's indictment by a federal prosecutor in New York of the program's former administrator Benon Sevan. But now a new dollars-for-dictators scandal is breaking into the open, this one involving the U.N. Development Program (UNDP) and North Korea's Kim Jong Il.

Our Melanie Kirkpatrick lays out many of the gory details nearby, based on documents reluctantly produced by the U.N. after prodding by American officials. The tale is similar to Oil for Food in that money for programs designed to benefit North Korea's poor appears to have been used instead to sustain the government. While the total amount of cash spent by the UNDP in North Korea isn't clear thanks to the opacity of U.N. record-keeping, any hard currency is manna from Turtle Bay for the isolated Kim regime. If dollar amounts into the tens of millions over nine years are accurate, that's money that would have helped Kim stay in power and continue his nuclear weapons program.

The documents we've seen follow the program back to 1998 and the era of detente between Kim and the Clinton Administration. But what's especially alarming is that the UNDP's programs have persisted in North Korea even as Kim has banished U.N. weapons inspectors, raised the volume on his threats, tested long-range missiles and even tested a nuclear weapon -- all in defiance of the U.N.'s own stated positions and Security Council sanctions.

A defense that the UNDP merely does humanitarian work -- for the people of North Korea and not the government -- isn't credible given the details exposed by Ms. Kirkpatrick. U.N. officials can't even say with confidence that all of the "development" projects exist because they haven't been allowed to visit their sites. Pyongyang officials insist on payments in cash that become fungible hard currency for the regime. Every U.N. dollar is one more that Kim doesn't have to raise from other (and often illegal) sources to pay off his generals or to buy a nuclear centrifuge.

The desire in some circles, including parts of the U.S. State Department, will be to dismiss all of this as no big deal because the bigger game is getting Kim to end his nuclear program. So why let a little more U.N. corruption, or incompetence, interfere with serious diplomacy?

Well, one reason is because we still don't know how wide or deep this scandal is, especially if it extends to other U.N. programs operating in North Korea. Another is that any cash to Kim contradicts U.N. and U.S. policy and helps ease pressure on the dictator to give up his nukes. And then there is the matter of the U.N.'s own credibility and failure to reform. In the wake of Oil for Food especially, why would U.N. officials allow this program to continue?

The generous explanation is incompetence, or perhaps the kind of feckless idealism that really believes such a program helps poor Koreans apart from Kim's regime. But given the U.N.'s recent track record of indictments for corruption, more venal motives need to be investigated. And it is also worth asking whether outright hostility to the U.S. policy of trying to isolate Kim has also played a role.

Whatever the motive, the Cash for Kim scandal is one more blot on the record of former Secretary General Kofi Annan. It also raises questions about the role played in North Korea by Maurice Strong, the Canadian who was Mr. Annan's envoy to Pyongyang.

We'd feel a lot better if the U.N. had quickly responded to U.S. queries and tried to get to the bottom of the mess at UNDP. But the exchange of letters between U.S. Ambassador Mark Wallace and UNDP officials described by Ms. Kirkpatrick is certainly reminiscent of the early U.N. stonewalling on Oil for Food.

Mr. Wallace and his colleagues from other nations on the UNDP executive board are right to demand a stop to the program and an independent investigation. The U.N.'s new Secretary General, Ban Ki-Moon, could make his own early mark by calling for a probe as part of a new era of U.N. transparency. Democrats in Congress could also be constructive by insisting on accountability, especially given how much stock they put in a competent U.N. to promote American security. * * *

One lesson of Oil for Food, and its failure to lead to any serious reform, is that to some foreign policy elites there can be no such thing as a U.N. "scandal." That's because for them the U.N. is all about good intentions, and the hopes and dreams for peace, rather than about actual results. But it is precisely that forbearance that has allowed too many dictators to exploit the U.N. for their own purposes, and has brought Turtle Bay to its current low ebb. Getting to the bottom of Cash for Kim is one more chance to make the U.N. shape up, and to stop financing a global menace in the bargain.

U.S. Criticizes China Over Missile Test (AP)

AP, January 19, 2007

The United States criticized China on Thursday for conducting an anti-satellite weapons test in which an old Chinese weather satellite was destroyed by a ballistic missile.

"The United States believes China's development and testing of such weapons is inconsistent with the spirit of cooperation that both countries aspire to in the civil space area," National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said. "We and other countries have expressed our concern to the Chinese."

U.S. intelligence agencies believe China conducted the test on Jan. 11.

Flexing Muscle, China Destroys Satellite In Test (NYT)

By William J. Broad And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

China successfully carried out its first test of an antisatellite weapon last week, signaling its resolve to play a major role in military space activities and bringing expressions of concern from Washington and other capitals, the Bush administration said yesterday.

Only two nations — the Soviet Union and the United States — have previously destroyed spacecraft in antisatellite tests, most recently the United States in the mid-1980s.

Arms control experts called the test, in which the weapon destroyed an aging Chinese weather satellite, a troubling development that could foreshadow an antisatellite arms race. Alternatively, however, some experts speculated that it could precede a diplomatic effort by China to prod the Bush administration into negotiations on a weapons ban.

“This is the first real escalation in the weaponization of space that we’ve seen in 20 years,” said Jonathan McDowell, a Harvard astronomer who tracks rocket launchings and space activity. “It ends a long period of restraint.”

White House officials said the United States and other nations, which they did not identify, had “expressed our concern regarding this action to the Chinese.” Despite its protest, the Bush administration has long resisted a global treaty banning such tests because it says it needs freedom of action in space.

Jianhua Li, a spokesman at the Chinese Embassy in Washington, said that he had heard about the antisatellite story but that he had no statement or information.

At a time when China is modernizing its nuclear weapons, expanding the reach of its navy and sending astronauts into orbit for the first time, the test appears to mark a new sphere of technical and military competition. American officials complained yesterday that China had made no public or private announcements about its test, despite repeated requests by American officials for more openness about its actions.

The weather satellite hit by the weapon had circled the globe at an altitude of roughly 500 miles. In theory, the test means that China can now hit American spy satellites, which orbit closer to Earth. The satellites presumably in range of the Chinese missile include most of the imagery satellites used for basic military reconnaissance, which are essentially the eyes of the American intelligence community for military movements, potential nuclear tests and even some counterterrorism, and commercial satellites.

Experts said the weather satellite's speeding remnants could pose a threat to other satellites for years or even decades.

In late August, President Bush authorized a new national space policy that ignored calls for a global prohibition on such tests. The policy said the United States would "preserve its rights, capabilities, and freedom of action in space" and "dissuade or deter others from either impeding those rights or developing capabilities intended to do so." It declared the United States would "deny, if necessary, adversaries the use of space capabilities hostile to U.S. national interests."

The Chinese test "could be a shot across the bow," said Theresa Hitchens, director of the Center for Defense Information, a private group in Washington that tracks military programs. "For several years, the Russians and Chinese have been trying to push a treaty to ban space weapons. The concept of exhibiting a hard-power capability to bring somebody to the negotiating table is a classic cold war technique."

Gary Samore, the director of studies at the Council on Foreign Relations, said in an interview: "I think it makes perfect sense for the Chinese to do this both for deterrence and to hedge their bets. It puts pressure on the U.S. to negotiate agreements not to weaponize space."

Ms. Hitchens and other critics have accused the administration of conducting secret research on advanced antisatellite weapons using lasers, which are considered a far speedier and more powerful way of destroying satellites than the weapons of two decades ago.

The White House statement, issued by the National Security Council, said China's "development and testing of such weapons is inconsistent with the spirit of cooperation that both countries aspire to in the civil space area."

An administration official who had reviewed the intelligence about China's test said the launching was detected by the United States in the early evening of Jan. 11, which would have been early morning on Jan. 12 in China. American satellites tracked the launching of the medium-range ballistic missile, and later space radars saw the debris.

The antisatellite test was first reported late Wednesday on the Web site of Aviation Week and Space Technology, an industry magazine. It said intelligence agencies had yet to "complete confirmation of the test."

The test, the magazine said, appeared to employ a ground-based interceptor that used the sheer force of impact rather than an exploding warhead to shatter the satellite.

Dr. McDowell of Harvard said the satellite was known as Feng Yun, or "wind and cloud." Launched in 1999, it was the third in a series. He said that it was a cube measuring 4.6 feet on each side, and that its solar panels extended about 28 feet. He added that it was due for retirement but that it still appeared to be electronically alive, making it an ideal target.

"If it stops working," he said, "you know you have a successful hit."

David C. Wright, a senior scientist at the Union of Concerned Scientists, a private group in Cambridge, Mass., said he calculated that the Chinese satellite had shattered into 800 fragments four inches wide or larger, and millions of smaller pieces.

The Soviet Union conducted roughly a dozen antisatellite tests from 1968 to 1982, Dr. McDowell said, adding that the Reagan administration carried out its experiments in 1985 and 1986.

The Bush administration has conducted research that critics say could produce a powerful ground-based laser weapon that would be used against enemy satellites.

The largely secret project, parts of which were made public through Air Force budget documents submitted to Congress last year, appears to be part of a wide-ranging administration effort to develop space weapons, both defensive and offensive.

The administration's laser research is far more ambitious than a previous effort by the Clinton administration to develop an antisatellite laser, though the administration denies that it is an attempt to build a laser weapon.

The current research takes advantage of an optical technique that uses sensors, computers and flexible mirrors to counteract the atmospheric turbulence that seems to make stars twinkle. The weapon would essentially reverse that process, shooting focused beams of light upward with great clarity and force.

Michael Krepon, co-founder of the Henry L. Stimson Center, a group that studies national security, called the Chinese test very un-Chinese.

"There's nothing subtle about this," he said. "They've created a huge debris cloud that will last a quarter century or more. It's at a higher elevation than the test we did in 1985, and for that one the last trackable debris took 17 years to clear out."

Mr. Krepon added that the administration had long argued that the world needed no space-weapons treaty because no such arms existed and because the last tests were two decades ago. "It seems," he said, "that argument is no longer operative."

China Criticized For Anti-Satellite Missile Test (WP)

By Marc Kaufman And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

The Chinese military used a ground-based missile to hit and destroy one of its aging satellites orbiting more than 500 miles in space last week -- a high-stakes test demonstrating China's ability to target regions of space that are home to U.S. spy satellites and space-based missile defense systems.

The test of anti-satellite technology is believed to be the first of its kind in two decades by any nation and raised concerns about the vulnerability of U.S. satellites and a possible arms race in space.

China's action drew sharp protests from other nations with satellite programs -- a predictable response that experts said dramatically illustrates Chinese willingness to face broad international criticism when it comes to space, which Beijing considers a key part of the push to modernize its military and increase its ability to compete in high-tech warfare.

"The U.S. believes China's development and testing of such weapons is inconsistent with the spirit of cooperation that both countries aspire to in the civil space area," National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said yesterday. "We and other countries have expressed our concern regarding this action to the Chinese."

A spokesman at the Chinese Embassy said that he had no information about the anti-satellite test. The Chinese military did not mention the test either. But a Chinese newspaper that concentrates on foreign affairs, Global Times, relayed the reports from Washington in today's editions. The newspaper quoted Maj. Gen. Peng Guangquin as saying that the U.S. government was making too much of the test.

In addition to introducing a renewed military dimension to space, the destruction of the Chinese satellite created a large "debris cloud" that can seriously damage other satellites in nearby orbit, and possibly even spacecraft on their way to the moon or beyond. Analysts said that based on computer models, as many as 300,000 pieces of debris may have been created. While many would be very small, they said, hundreds would be large enough to create potentially serious problems.

The United States and the Soviet Union tested anti-satellite technology in the 1980s, and the United States shot down one of its orbiting satellites in 1985. Partially as a result of the debris problem, both sides stopped the programs.

The Chinese test, first reported online by the magazine Aviation Week and Space Technology, comes at a time of heightened tensions between the United States and China over space. China is leading an effort in the United Nations to set up an international conference to address what many consider to be an imminent space arms race. The United States has opposed the idea, arguing that it is not needed because there is no arms race in space. The Bush administration nevertheless released an updated national space policy last fall that strongly asserted an American right to defend itself in space against any actions it considers hostile.

The U.S. military is especially dependent on satellites for navigation, communications and missile guidance, while the American economy could also be broadly damaged by disruptions of communications, weather and other satellites. Some in the administration believe that this has left the nation especially vulnerable to attack and have proposed efforts to develop ways to defend its assets in space.

The day the test was conducted, the chiefs of major U.S. intelligence agencies presented their annual threat assessments to Congress. Neither China's anti-satellite program nor its general push toward space weapons was mentioned during the public hearing or anywhere in the written testimonies of the director of national intelligence, the director of the Pentagon's intelligence agency or the CIA director.

The United States retains the ability to destroy low-orbit satellites and has been conducting research on more advanced systems for years.

Officials who have been briefed on the test said that the Chinese ballistic missile reached as high as some U.S. spy satellites are positioned. Other satellites positioned at the same altitude are part of the missile defense network that the U.S. military is assembling. Sources said a hit-to-destroy ballistic missile could knock out any satellites at that low orbit. Many sensitive communications satellites are much higher, at about 22,000 miles above Earth, and officials said yesterday that the recent test does not prove that China has the capability to disrupt those systems. Still, U.S. intelligence officers and administration officials fretted.

"It's unfortunate that China is going down this path," said one administration official. "No one has done this in over 20 years, and in that time, international cooperation in space has come so far. It is a bustling commercial, scientific and research arena. This sort of thing is such a throwback to the Cold War."

The issue of possible hostilities in space became more real in August when National Reconnaissance Office Director Donald M. Kerr told reporters that a U.S. satellite had recently been "painted," or illuminated, by a ground-based laser in China. The United States did not make any formal protest then, but it did yesterday.

Johndroe of the NSC said that Australia and Canada have lodged protests, and Britain, South Korea and Japan are expected to follow suit.

He said the Chinese satellite was shot down using a ground-based medium-range ballistic missile, which slammed into its target 537 miles above earth on Jan. 11.

"In my view, the Chinese are sending a strong signal here," said Jeffrey Kueter, president of the George C. Marshall Institute, a nonprofit space and defense think tank in Washington. "They're saying they can hold our space-based, war-fighting capability at risk, and are putting into doubt our ability to challenge them. They're a rising space competitor."

Kueter said the test makes it essential for the United States to get more serious about developing technology to defend its satellites.

Michael Krepon, president emeritus of the Henry L. Stimson Center, another nonprofit involved with security issues in Washington, called the Chinese test a predictable -- and unfortunate -- response to U.S. space policies.

"The Chinese are telling the Pentagon that they don't own space," he said. "We can play this game, too, and we can play it dirtier than you."

Krepon said the Chinese test "blows a whole through the Bush administration reasoning behind not talking to anybody about space arms control -- that there is no space arms race. It looks like there is one at this point."

Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) said the Chinese action makes it essential that the administration begin negotiations to stop any possible space arms race. "The Chinese anti-satellite test is terrible news for international stability and security, and could presage the dawn of a new arms race -- this time in space," Markey said. "American satellites are the soft underbelly of our national security, and it is urgent that President Bush move to guarantee their protection by initiating an international agreement to ban the development, testing, and deployment of space weapons and anti-satellite systems."

Chinese Missile Strikes Satellite (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

The Chinese military shot down one of its own aging satellites with a ground-based ballistic missile last week, demonstrating a new technological capability at a time of growing Bush administration concern over Beijing's military modernization and its intentions in space.

The shoot-down, which U.S. officials said occurred on the evening of Jan. 11, prompted a formal protest from Washington that was joined by allies including Canada and Australia, U.S. officials said Thursday. Japan has demanded an explanation, and Britain and South Korea are also expected to file formal objections.

DOJ_NMG_0118789

"The United States believes China's development and testing of such weapons is inconsistent with the spirit of cooperation that both countries aspire to in the civil space area," said Gordon D. Johndroe, spokesman for the National Security Council. "We and other countries have expressed our concern to the Chinese."

A spokesman for China's Foreign Ministry said today that he could not comment on the anti-satellite test.

The U.S. and the Soviet Union each conducted similar tests of anti-satellite weapons in the 1980s, but abandoned the practice when the strikes led to widespread debris fields in space that threatened other satellites. The last U.S. test was in 1985.

According to U.S. officials, Beijing used a medium-range missile to shoot at its weather satellite, which was 537 miles above Earth when it was hit. The altitude is considered to be a low Earth orbit, but represents the band where most satellites and manned space missions travel.

The successful exercise was expected to send tremors through the U.S. satellite industry, which is part of a $90-billion global business involving hundreds of orbiting craft that are essential to routine daily communications and commerce. Many ATM and pay-at-the-pump transactions rely on satellites, as do television and digital radio signal distribution.

The shoot-down has rattled U.S. defense officials, who are concerned both about the commercial crafts and government spy and military satellites that operate at that height.

Larger telecommunications satellites and certain military satellites that provide early warning of missile launches travel in much higher orbits — up to 23,000 miles above Earth.

The Chinese strike on the satellite launched in 1999 was first reported by the aerospace trade magazine Aviation Week & Space Technology.

Concerns about rising threats to U.S. satellites led the Bush administration to issue a new national space policy in August, which held that the U.S. viewed freedom of action in space as important as air or sea power.

The administration was widely criticized for its aggressive attitude toward defense activities in space. But a White House official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Thursday that satellites and access to space were considered vital to U.S. national and economic security and that any event "that can hinder passage through space" was of concern.

News of the Chinese achievement came as John D. Negroponte, the head of U.S. intelligence agencies, testified before the House Intelligence Committee on a range of international threats, including what he said were the potential dangers of China's military buildup.

"The Chinese are developing more capable long-range conventional strike systems, and short and medium-range ballistic missiles with terminally guided maneuverable warheads able to attack U.S. carriers and air bases," Negroponte said in his testimony.

China has stepped up both its civilian and military space program in recent years. In October 2003, it became only the third nation, after Russia and the U.S., to launch its own manned space mission.

U.S. intelligence and military officials have become increasingly vocal over Chinese ambitions in space and over Beijing's military modernization program, begun in 1999. Senior Pentagon officials have urged the Chinese to explain the motives behind their buildup, saying the lack of clarity has fueled concerns that their new weapons might be used against the U.S.

Officials also have voiced concerns that, because the U.S. is so dependent on satellites, militarily and commercially, an inability to protect its space assets would represent a vulnerability that adversaries could exploit.

"We must be very concerned about the emerging threats to our space assets and about the possibility that others will take advantage of our dependence on and vulnerability in space to seek asymmetrical advantages over us," Robert G. Joseph, the State Department's top arms control official, said in a speech last week.

China's leaders are intent on modernizing their military capabilities, and the development of more sophisticated weaponry, including anti-satellite missile capabilities, is part of that effort, said Shi Yinhong, a professor of international relations at People's University in Beijing.

But he said China was still at least a decade behind several other countries.

"Generally speaking, China's military capability in these advanced areas, whether it's space weaponry or naval capabilities, is still far behind the United States and Japan," he said. "What you are seeing is new momentum to try and catch up, but the distance is still quite wide."

Shi said he understood why leaders in the U.S. and elsewhere might view China's anti-satellite test with alarm, but that the move represented a natural development and was not intended to provoke an arms race in space.

The new American space policy holds that the U.S. retains the right to take any action necessary to protect its space assets and to prevent adversaries from using "space capabilities hostile to U.S. national interests."

China's space modernization effort is part of a campaign to defend itself against the U.S. government's missile defense program, which officials in Beijing view as a militarization of outer space, said Wenran Jiang, head of the China studies program at Canada's University of Alberta.

He said Chinese military leaders were paying particular attention to Washington's information warfare efforts, including the development of sophisticated weaponry to "destabilize the enemy's communications and control systems."

Pentagon officials rebutted allegations that the new policy attempted to militarize space, saying that the ability of U.S. adversaries to cripple military and commercial satellites posed a serious threat for which the military was not yet prepared.

"I'm not talking about weapons of mass destruction" in space, said a senior Pentagon official, who spoke on condition of anonymity when discussing internal debates over military space policy. "I'm talking about what's the next step if somebody whacks a satellite? Do we just go out with a bullhorn and express our outrage?"

Despite objections to putting weapons in space, American military officials are concerned that they will be blamed for inaction if they fail to prevent an attack on U.S. satellites.

"We need to be able to know who's messing with our satellites — not just our military ones, but our commercial ones," said another senior Pentagon official. "If something's affected, they're going to call [and ask], 'What are you going to do about it?' "

China provoked widespread concern in September after it used a ground-based laser to illuminate at least one U.S. satellite. The action was confirmed by the U.S. National Reconnaissance Office, the intelligence agency that oversees spy satellites. The Pentagon has warned of intelligence that shows China is developing a laser system to blind or damage imaging satellites.

Among U.S. satellite operators, word of China's latest anti-satellite test was greeted warily.

"We're concerned, but we haven't gotten a lot of calls from our customers so far," said Arnold Friedman, senior vice president for Space Systems Loral of Palo Alto, which operates 53 satellites in orbit. "We're always concerned whenever anything of that sort happens."

Most of Loral's satellites would be out of reach to the type of missile used by the Chinese because they orbit about 23,000 miles above the Earth.

Other satellite executives declined to comment or referred questions to the Pentagon.

Somalia Seeks U.S. Aid To Revive Nation (AP)

By George Gedda

AP, January 19, 2007

Somalia is asking the U.S. government for help in building efficient police, military and intelligence organizations as it attempts to overcome years of strife and impoverishment.

The requests were contained in a three-page memo submitted to the State Department by Dahir Mirreh Jibreel, a U.S. representative of the Transition Federal Government in Somalia that took power recently after the ouster of radical Islamists by Ethiopian troops.

The government was established in 2004 with U.N. backing but had been too weak until the turn of the year to establish a presence in Mogadishu, the capital.

Heading the list of Somali requests was the appointment of a U.S. ambassador to Somalia. The United States has not had a functioning embassy in Somalia for years. There was no immediate comment Thursday from the State Department on the request but security issues for any U.S. personnel sent there are believed to be a major concern.

Large-scale assistance seems unlikely until Somali authorities are able to create a stable environment in the country.

The requests also call for congressional approval of Somalia stabilization and reconstruction legislation as well as encouragement of private U.S. investment in Somalia.

DOJ_NMG_0118791

The country has not had a government able to control the national territory since 1991. The transitional government lacks funds to pay civil servants and the list submitted to the State Department includes a request to fill that need until the country is able to generate its own revenue.

Shortly after the transitional government was installed in Mogadishu, United States made an initial down payment of $40 million in revitalization assistance for Somalia. About $16 million was earmarked for humanitarian assistance, $14 million to fund a multinational force whose deployment is still pending and $10 million in development aid.

Jibreel distributed copies of the requests during a meeting Thursday with a small group of reporters that was hosted by the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative public policy research group.

Amid Chaos, Young Somalis Struggle To Get By (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 18 — A week ago, Yoonis Issay Alin was riding around in the back of a pickup, part of a squad of tough-looking guys with big trucks and big guns.

Now he is drooling on a metal cot, shot in the head over a parking spot.

All around him at Medina Hospital in Mogadishu, Somalia's capital, young men writhe in steamy beds, their arms and legs trapped in traction ropes, their gunshot wounds the latest proof of a society out of control. It is hard to imagine there is enough gauze in this broken-down country to keep up.

Somalia may be at a turning point, with a potentially viable government for the first time since 1991. But senseless violence is still the norm, as ubiquitous as qat, the plant people here chew and chew as a drug until the ugliness of life fades away, even if just for a moment.

Mr. Alin, 22, was one of the thousands of young militiamen who prowl this city. Now his family is on a death watch, with his sisters squeezed around his hospital bed, peering into his open, unregistering eyes, and his creased-faced mother leaning over him, shooing away flies.

"In this country," said his mother, Halima, "nobody cares if you live or die."

His skull is encased in a helmet of white medical tape. He has been drifting in and out of consciousness, and doctors say they have no way to gauge the amount of brain damage.

"There are no neurosurgeons here, no M.R.I.'s, no CAT scans, no psychiatrists," said Sheikhdon Salad Elmi, director of Medina Hospital. "Can you imagine that? In a city where everyone needs therapy, not a single psychiatrist?"

Mr. Alin's journey from a tin shack where he slept on a dirt floor with four brothers and five sisters to the employ of a warlord was typical of so many young Somali men. It was not planned; it just happened, like the bullet that was fired at someone else last Friday but tumbled instead through Mr. Alin's brain.

His father, Issay, an off-again-on-again brick mason, was killed in a robbery in 1993 — two years after Somalia's central government collapsed and the country spun into anarchy — leaving behind no money, just a crusty trowel that none of his sons knew how to use.

His mother supported the family by selling qat in a neighborhood called the Black Sea, bringing in the equivalent of a few dollars a day. It was enough to buy two jerry cans of water from the donkey carts that jangled by every morning and the occasional meal of spaghetti and camel meat, Mr. Alin's favorite.

But it was not enough for school. So Mr. Alin and his brothers spent their days combing the city's bullet-scarred streets for odd jobs, like pushing a wheelbarrow or hauling fish. In the afternoons they worked out in their yard, curling a 25-pound tank shell found nearby, which by a quick, delicate inspection looked as though it could go off at any time.

"I think it's safe," said Didi, his 17-year-old brother.

Last summer things changed. A grass-roots Islamist movement took over Mogadishu after running the city's warlords out of town. The young Islamist soldiers wore green skullcaps, eschewed qat and cigarettes and vowed to unite Somalia's warring clans under the banner of Islam. Many people, including Mr. Alin, were impressed.

DOJ_NMG_0118792

His friends said he was religious, never missing prayer. A green flag hangs over his sleeping spot — there are no beds in his shack — with the message "There is no god but God, and Muhammad is his Prophet."

But when Mr. Alin tried to join the Islamists he was rejected. They took one look at his teeth, stained brown from qat, and told him to go away. So he went to Baidoa, a city 150 miles away, to find Botan Issay, the warlord of his subclan, the Duduble.

Somalia's warlord issue is complicated. Some people call them thugs, and Mr. Alin's militia buddies readily admitted that their income came from stickups.

"We make what we make from the barrel of the gun," said Ahmed Muhammad Siad, 25. "That's how it is. Yoonis usually told us to go easy on people. He was always too nice."

But in a world with no police and no security, the clan warlord was sometimes the only protection.

"When it comes down to it," said Ali Mahdi Muhammad, a clan leader, "you can only count on your clan."

Fearful of the dangers of militia work, Mr. Alin's family tried to keep him from going to Baidoa. But Baidoa had an irresistible pull. It was the seat of the internationally recognized transitional government of Somalia and the one big town in south central Somalia that the Islamists did not control. For Mr. Alin, that meant all the qat he could chew.

"Yoonis was chasing the green grass," said Muhammad, Mr. Alin's 25-year-old brother, with a sad shake of the head.

But in late December, Somalia was turned upside down again. The Islamists attacked Baidoa, provoking Ethiopia, which labeled the Islamists a regional threat. Within a week Ethiopian-led troops crushed the Islamist army, and American forces helped hunt down its leaders. Mogadishu's graying warlords rushed back to town, with their militias and their firepower.

The clan militias instantly returned to their old ways, setting up checkpoints and shaking down residents. The transitional government pleaded with them to disarm. They refused. On Friday, a disarmament meeting was called at the presidential palace for all of Mogadishu's top warlords. While Mr. Issay, the Duduble warlord, went inside, Mr. Alin and other Duduble militiamen waited by the palace gates.

All of a sudden, witnesses said, soldiers for another warlord, Muhammad Qanyare Afrah, started arguing with palace guards about where to park their armed pickup truck. Someone pulled out a gun. The palace guards opened fire. Several of the Duduble militiamen standing nearby were hit. Eight men were killed and five seriously wounded.

Somalia is definitely the wrong place to get a bullet in the brain. It took a half-hour to organize a car to take Mr. Alin to Medina Hospital, and when he arrived the two operating rooms were occupied.

Osman Abdullahi, a burly man with a stained smock who performed the surgery on Mr. Alin hours later, called himself "an assistant doctor."

He unwrapped a crumple of white butcher-like paper smeared with blood and showed the bone fragments that he had tweezed from Mr. Alin's frontal lobe.

Mr. Alin is now in the intensive care unit, which looks like every other room in the hospital, with tiles peeling and mosquitoes swarming, except that most of the ceiling fans there still spin.

Mr. Abdullahi said that Mr. Alin would probably live but that it was not clear if he would be able to talk.

On Thursday, his family got a positive sign. Mr. Alin briefly sat up in bed, looked around and giggled.

European Court Finds Two Chechens Were Tortured (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 18 -- The European Court of Human Rights ruled Thursday that two Chechen brothers were tortured in their strife-torn Russian republic and that authorities there failed to investigate their allegations of abuse. It was the first decision on torture in Chechnya issued by the court, based in Strasbourg, France.

"The applicants were indisputably kept in a permanent state of physical pain and anxiety owing to their uncertainty about their fate and to the level of violence to which they were subjected throughout the period of their detention," according to a panel of seven judges, who reached a unanimous decision.

"The Court considers that such treatment was intentionally inflicted on the applicants by agents of the State acting in the course of their duties," the judgment stated, "with the aim of extracting from them a confession or information about the offences of which they were suspected."

Human rights groups have long contended that torture is widespread in Chechnya, where Russian troops have fought separatists off and on since 1994. Thursday's ruling follows a series of judgments against Russia concerning disappearances and the indiscriminate use of force by the Russian military and its proxies in the southern republic.

The court receives more complaints from Russia than from any other country. Some Russian politicians, weary of a seemingly endless string of negative judgments, have become highly critical of the court, charging that it is anti-Russian and politicized.

In December, the State Duma, Russia's lower house of parliament, refused to ratify a court reform designed to speed up decision-making in Strasbourg. Of the 46 member states of the Council of Europe, the body responsible for the human rights convention that the court enforces, only Russia has refused to agree to the change.

"It's not acceptable that this organization is used for attacks on the Russian Federation," Sergei Baburin, a member of parliament, said at the time of the vote.

The government supported ratification, but some supporters of the measure said that was a charade.

President Vladimir Putin "can now say that he wanted the document ratified -- but we have democracy in Russia and parliament saw fit to turn it down," Vladimir Ryzhkov, an independent legislator, told Russian reporters. "However, the whole world knows that our parliament is like a dog at its master's feet -- it would never bark without an order from the Kremlin."

On April 12, 2000, Adam and Arbi Chitayev were detained at their family home in Chechnya by the Russian military. They were later transferred to the Chernokozovo detention center, a facility that human rights groups charge has a notorious history of abuse.

The two men said in court filings that, among other forms of abuse, they were subject to electric shock; suffocated with adhesive tape, a cellophane bag and a gas mask; had dogs set on them; and had parts of their skin torn away with pliers.

"Unfortunately, torture is not a thing of the past in Chechnya," said Jan ter Laak, chairman of the board of the Russian Justice Initiative, a legal aid group based in the Netherlands, which brought the case before the court. "The Russian and Chechen authorities must now take this problem and this judgment seriously and bring an end to this terrible practice."

The two brothers were released on Oct. 5, 2000, six months after their arrest. The case against them was dropped.

"I am satisfied with the judgment," said Arbi Chitayev, who currently lives in Germany, according to a statement released by the Russian Justice Initiative. "At the same time I am worried that what happened to me could happen to my relatives who still live in Russia."

Venezuela Wants Trade Group To Embrace Anti-Imperialism (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

RIO DE JANEIRO, Jan. 18 — South American leaders began gathering here on Thursday for discussions focused on a single, contentious issue: should the Mercosur trade group continue to emphasize economic integration, as Brazil and Argentina prefer, or transform itself into a political alliance with an “anti-imperialist” tint, the path President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela favors?

The conference’s Brazilian hosts tried to minimize the prospect of tensions, with Foreign Minister Celso Amorim talking of a “reinforced Mercosur” that he said “belongs to everybody.” But Mr. Chávez declined to play along with diplomatic niceties, bluntly staking out his position the instant he got off the plane on Thursday morning.

“The press says that Chávez is coming to ideologize Mercosur, to poison and contaminate it,” he said. In reality, he continued, his goal is “to contribute with something we consider to be absolutely necessary: the reformatting of Mercosur” and “decontaminating the contamination of neoliberalism.”

With memories of a murderous outburst of gang violence here still fresh and heads of state or foreign ministers from at least 10 countries expected to attend, security for the event was unusually heavy.

Mercosur, sometimes called the South American Common Market, was founded in 1991 with Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay and Uruguay as original members with full voting rights. Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador and Peru are associate members. Venezuela's application to become a full member was hurriedly accepted last year, even though the details have yet to be negotiated and Mr. Chávez's commitment to what he calls "21st-century socialism" clashes with Mercosur's support for open markets and free trade.

"In one word, it's a mess," said Rubens Barbosa, a former Brazilian ambassador to the United States and Britain. "In the European Union, they negotiate the terms of entry, and then the country joins. Here we're doing it the other way around, which is craziness because Venezuela now does not want to accept the conditions it has to accept for membership."

In private, the four original members have also expressed concerns about Venezuela's ability to adhere in the future to the group's requirements that members follow democratic practices, which was important in Paraguay's transition out of a military dictatorship. As they see it, recent moves by Mr. Chávez raise the specter of a one-party state, perpetual re-election, a controlled press and doubts about respect for private property.

In Caracas on Thursday, the National Assembly voted unanimously in a preliminary vote to grant Mr. Chávez the power to enact laws by decree for a period of 18 months. A final vote on the measure is expected next week.

His supporters already control the legislature, the Supreme Court and most state governments, but the president sought the decree powers to speed changes to Venezuela's political and economic structures. Critics say the new powers would move Venezuela toward authoritarianism.

"It was a tremendous error to allow Chávez into Mercosur, not only because he wants to control it, but also because he is Lula's biggest rival," said Felipe Lampreia, who was Brazil's foreign minister from 1995 to 2001, referring to President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva. "Lula is moderate and pragmatic, while Chávez is a revolutionary, socialist and international agitator who sees himself as the leader of Latin America."

With Mr. Chávez's enthusiastic support, Bolivia, led by his ally Evo Morales, is expected to apply formally for full membership in Mercosur. But that has created divergences within the group, because Bolivia wants a special exemption on tariff and other issues that has not been granted to the group's other smaller members.

Uruguay, in fact, has been so unhappy with its status in Mercosur that, though led by a Socialist president, it has been seeking closer ties with the United States. Next week, the two countries are to sign a Trade and Investment Framework Agreement in Montevideo, which some experts see as the prelude to a free trade agreement that would require Uruguay's exit from Mercosur.

"At this moment, there are two Mercosurs, with the old one obviously dying," said Gilberto Dupas, director of the Institute of Economic and International Affairs, at the University of São Paulo. "Chávez wants to bring his anti-American discourse into the group, but that is not desirable for Brazil, and the little partners will never accept it, especially Uruguay."

Among the proposals Mr. Chávez brought with him was one to create a Mercosur development bank, which he envisions as an alternative to the World Bank. But Brazil's minister of finance, Guido Mantega, reacted warily to the idea, saying it was "complicated" because it would require "a new structure" that might compete with existing regional financial mechanisms.

Mr. Lampreia, referring to his former colleagues, said, "They're starting to realize they've fallen into a trap." He added: "They thought they could influence Chávez, but he can't be influenced. He's the owner of the ball, rich and all-powerful, and says and does what he wants."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Wiretap Review Plan Is Still Unclear (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Greg Miller And David G. Savage, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

Bush and Gonzales say the domestic spying program is essentially unchanged except for its legal justification.

WASHINGTON — A day after announcing that it had scrubbed a controversial warrantless surveillance program, the Bush administration refused to provide details to Congress of how a new court-review process for terror-related wiretaps would work, triggering a fresh round of complaints and suspicions from Democrats about what the administration was doing.

At the same time, President Bush and other administration officials indicated that little had changed in the electronic eavesdropping program, originally launched after the Sept. 11 attacks, other than the fact that a court had finally blessed it.

Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales revealed Wednesday that the secret court created by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to supervise wiretaps approved orders authorizing the surveillance last week.

Bush said the approval vindicated his position that he was justified in launching the surveillance. "Nothing has changed in the program except the court has said we've analyzed it and it's a legitimate way to protect the country," Bush said in an interview with Tribune Broadcasting.

Pressed during a hearing Thursday before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Gonzales said the administration had changed the legal justification for the surveillance program but not the essential elements of the operation.

Disputing the suggestion that the warrantless program, run by the National Security Agency, had been "terminated," Gonzales said, "It took us a period of time to develop what we thought would be an acceptable legal argument that would be acceptable to the FISA court."

When asked to explain the legal argument, Gonzales refused. "I don't want to get into a public discussion about the deliberations and work of the court," he said.

The surveillance issue has become the first major battlefront between the new Congress and an administration that Democrats consider overly secretive and reluctant to share power.

With Gonzales and other officials mum about the program's details, Democrats refused to accept their assurances. It was not immediately clear how that stalemate might be resolved. The administration supplied classified briefings to several members of Congress, but lawmakers said they continued to have questions.

"I don't think there were any assurances today" that the White House is not still bypassing parts of FISA, Rep. Anna G. Eshoo (D-Atherton), a member of the House Intelligence Committee, said in a telephone interview. When administration officials briefing her committee Thursday, including Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, were asked about the matter, she said, "I think they were quite skittish."

The Senate Judiciary Committee chairman, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), and the ranking Republican, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), said the chief judge of the FISA court had promised them late Wednesday access to the court orders approving the surveillance. But Gonzales indicated at the hearing that the administration might attempt to block the move because of concerns that the documents contained classified information.

The administration's decision appeared to leave Congress with few options. Legal experts said the ruling appeared to render moot a series of private lawsuits challenging the program. The main option Congress has left is to change the FISA law under which the court has acted, although lawmakers acknowledge they have too little information at this point to know whether that would be necessary.

Gonzales said the idea of bringing the program under the FISA law had long been discussed in the White House, and that he made the issue a priority shortly after he became attorney general in early 2005.

Government officials familiar with the matter said the Bush administration's negotiations with the FISA court accelerated after Democrats won control of Congress in November.

The officials also said the negotiations centered on securing an agreement that would allow the administration to seek warrants on groups of people in certain circumstances, rather than being required to obtain separate court orders for every individual under suspicion.

One official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said this was the "innovative" new interpretation that Justice officials had described when briefing reporters on the new guidelines.

The changes appear to require individual warrants when the target is a U.S. citizen or has permanent legal resident status. But the changes could make it easier to obtain multiple warrants rapidly when the targets are in the country on temporary visas, as was the case with the Sept. 11 hijackers.

The new arrangement is likely to continue to be a source of controversy because the ability to obtain a "bundle" of warrants, as one official put it, could be seen as undermining the intent of the law to require the government to show cause in individual cases.

Seeking to target members of a group as a whole, even Al Qaeda, would be unusual, legal experts said.

"That would be novel and controversial," said Michael Woods, a former chief of the FBI national-security law division. "But that would explain why you got something new without having to have changes in the FISA statute."

The FISA law does distinguish between U.S. citizens and certain foreigners living in the United States.

When Congress passed the law in 1978, it was concerned with protecting Americans from being spied on by U.S. intelligence agencies. At the same time, lawmakers wanted the CIA and NSA to monitor Soviet spies and other foreign agents in the United States.

FISA says the government must seek a warrant first before "intentionally targeting a United States person" by listening to their phone calls. These persons are defined as U.S. citizens and lawful permanent residents.

The law is less clear, and less demanding, for other persons in the United States. That distinction could give the administration justification for arguing that it seeks to intercept the calls of foreign terrorists and foreigners who are living in the United States, but it was not "intentionally targeting" U.S. citizens.

The FISA judges may have been persuaded that kind of surveillance did not violate the 1978 law and therefore could be authorized legally.

Senators Blast Bush Security Policies (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, January 19, 2007

Influential senators on Thursday demanded that the Bush administration provide more details about its move to place its controversial National Security Agency domestic spying programme under supervision by a special court.

Patrick Leahy and Arlen Specter, the top Democrat and Republican on the Senate judiciary committee, told Alberto Gonzales, the US attorney-general, that the Bush administration needed to provide some more information about the surprise decision this week to allow a secret intelligence court to monitor electronic domestic spying.

“This reversal is a good step, but there are still several outstanding questions that remain,” said Mr Leahy, who assumed the chairmanship of the committee after the Democrats regained control of Congress in November.

“To ensure the balance necessary to achieve both security and liberty for our nation, the president must fully inform Congress and the American people about the contours of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court order authorising this surveillance programme and the programme itself.”

In a major policy reversal announced on Wednesday, the US Justice Department said that President George W. Bush would not re-authorise the so-called Terrorist Surveillance Programme. Justice Department officials said that the administration had reached an agreement whereby any electronic eavesdropping would in future be monitored by a special intelligence court.

Mr Bush authorised the controversial eavesdropping programme – which permitted the NSA to eavesdrop without court warrant on the international communications of Americans with links to al-Qaeda – after the September 11 attacks in New York and Washington in 2001.

Critics had accused him of illegally circumventing the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which requires the government to seek a warrant from an intelligence court before it can spy on Americans.

Mr Specter, who has been a fierce critic of the programme, questioned why the administration had not informed Congress last year about its attempts to bring the programme into line with FISA. In contentious exchanges, the senators asked Mr Gonzales to provide them with the authorisation the administration received from the intelligence court.

When Mr Gonzales refused to say whether he would comply with their request, Mr Leahy shot back, “Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us a decision that you publicly announced...Are we Alice in Wonderland here?”

A federal court last year ruled that the programme was unconstitutional, and rebuked Mr Bush, saying there were “no hereditary kings” in America.

The policy U-turn comes just weeks before an appeals court was scheduled to hear the case, but Mr Gonzales denied that the administration’s switch was related to the legislation.

Mr Leahy and Mr Specter also criticised the administration over a host of issues, including Guantanamo Bay and secret CIA renditions of prisoners.

DOJ_NMG_0118800

"In the 32 years since I first came to the Senate – during the era of Watergate and Vietnam – I have never seen a time when our constitution and fundamental rights as Americans were more threatened by their own government," said Mr Leahy. "The [Justice] department has also played a pivotal role…in eroding basic human rights and undercutting America's lead role as an advocate for human rights throughout the world."

Senators Press Gonzales On Delay In Getting Court OK On Surveillance (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was grilled Thursday by senators who questioned why it took the Bush administration more than four years to allow a court to oversee the National Security Agency's electronic eavesdropping of Americans and others in terrorism investigations.

During his first appearance before a Senate panel since Democrats took over Congress in the November elections, Gonzales also faced a series of questions from Democrats and some Republicans over how the NSA's program will operate now that agents' surveillance requests must be approved by a special court of federal judges that monitors classified intelligence gathering within the USA.

VIDEO: Attorney general talks to senators

Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said he was encouraged by Gonzales' announcement Wednesday that President Bush no longer would authorize the NSA to conduct warrantless surveillance of communications coming into or going out of the USA in terrorism probes. Leahy and other lawmakers had blasted the administration's eavesdropping program, saying it illegally sidestepped judicial oversight and violated privacy rights.

However, Leahy and other senators made it clear that they remained unhappy about the administration's handling of surveillance issues. They said they will be watching how the program operates now that surveillance requests will be vetted by the court established in 1978 by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA).

"For years, the administration has engaged in warrantless wiretapping of Americans, I believe contrary to the law," Leahy said.

"The Justice Department has been complicit in advancing these government policies, which threaten our basic liberties and overstep the bounds of our Constitution," he said.

Gonzales insisted the administration had the power to authorize an undisclosed number of eavesdropping requests without a court's involvement. He said the White House changed course and allowed the FISA court to oversee the eavesdropping once officials became satisfied the court could handle requests quickly enough in cases in which there appears to be an imminent threat to security.

The committee's ranking Republican, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, said that despite being briefed on the eavesdropping program by Justice Department attorneys, he still had questions about it and how it will operate in the future. He added that the administration's previous policy of allowing warrantless surveillance likely damaged Republicans in the midterm elections.

"The United States and the administration have paid a heavy price for not acting sooner to bring the terrorist surveillance program under judicial review," he said.

Leahy and Specter also questioned Gonzales about Bush's claim last month that he had the authority to allow agents to open Americans' mail without a warrant. Bush made the claim as he signed legislation aimed at protecting the privacy of U.S. mail.

"If the president is asserting that the act of Congress is unconstitutional, then he ought to say so and not sign the act," Specter said.

Gonzales said Bush "simply wants to preserve the authority that the Congress had already granted to him." He said he knew of no case in which mail had been opened without a court warrant.

White House Shifting Tactics In Surveillance Cases (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

In a four-paragraph letter on Wednesday announcing that the Bush administration had reversed its position and would submit its domestic surveillance program to judicial supervision, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales used one phrase three times. A secret court, he said, had fashioned a way to allow the program to be monitored by the judiciary without compromising the need for "speed and agility."

That phrase also captures, some critics say, the administration's moving-target litigation strategy, one that often seeks to change the terms of the debate just as a claim of executive authority is about to be tested in the courts or in Congress.

On Wednesday, the administration announced that an unnamed judge on the secret court, in a nonadversarial proceeding that apparently cannot be appealed, had issued orders that apparently both granted surveillance requests and set out some ground rules for how such requests would be handled.

The details remained sketchy yesterday, but critics of the administration said they suspected that one goal of the new arrangements was to derail lawsuits challenging the program in conventional federal courts.

"It's another clear example," said Ann Beeson, associate legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union, "of the government playing a shell game to avoid accountability and judicial scrutiny."

In other cases, too, the timing of litigation decisions by the government has been suggestive.

Shortly before the Supreme Court heard a set of three detainee cases in 2004, the administration reversed course and allowed two Americans held incommunicado by the military to meet with their lawyers, mooting that issue.

After the court ruled that one of the men, Yaser Hamdi, could challenge his detention in court, the administration instead freed him and sent him to Saudi Arabia.

And just as the Supreme Court was considering whether to review the case of the second man, Jose Padilla, he was transferred to the criminal justice system last year, mooting his appeal.

Paul W. Butler, a former federal prosecutor who served as special assistant to Donald H. Rumsfeld when he was secretary of defense, said the administration's critics were too quick to view ordinary developments as nefarious ones.

"You do have to ascribe some good faith," said Mr. Butler, now a partner with the Washington law firm of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld. "The government uses presidential authority when they think it's necessary and the law does not provide the specific authority they need. If there is a road that can be taken, operating according to statutes or putting people into the criminal justice system when that makes sense, they will do that."

Like other administrations, even when this one alters course, it almost never concedes that its earlier actions were mistaken.

In the case of the eavesdropping program, the administration continues to maintain that it is free to operate without court approval. Its decision to submit to the secret court, administration lawyers said, was voluntary. At a briefing Wednesday, almost as an afterthought, a senior Justice Department official said, "There's obviously an advantage to having all three branches involved."

The announcement about the surveillance program came two weeks before a federal appeals court in Cincinnati was to hear the first appellate argument about the lawfulness of the program. Government lawyers now say that case is moot, but their claim is open to question.

The usual rule is that cases seeking relief in the future are indeed moot when the relief they seek is granted. But there is an exception, said David Cole, a lawyer with the Center for Constitutional Rights, which has challenged the program in a separate lawsuit filed in New York.

He cited a series of Supreme Court decisions in which the defendants had voluntarily done what the lawsuits were seeking. Such cases are moot, the court ruled in 1968, for instance, only if it is "absolutely clear that the allegedly wrongful behavior could not reasonably be expected to recur."

Because the administration has reserved the right to continue the program, Mr. Cole said, the courts should rule on whether it violated a 1978 law, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and the Constitution.

A third case, from Oregon, is almost certainly not moot. In addition to asking the court to stop surveillance without warrants in the future, that suit asks for money as damages for past surveillance.

The Oregon case, brought by an Islamic charity and two of its lawyers, differs from the Cincinnati appeal and the New York suit because the plaintiffs in it say they have seen a classified document confirming that their communications were actually intercepted.

"We're certainly center stage now," said Jon B. Eisenberg, who represents the charity, Al Haramain Islamic Foundation, and the lawyers.

Mr. Gonzales, speaking to the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday said that the recent orders involved a creative reading of the 1978 law, often called FISA. After the Sept. 11 attacks, he said, administration lawyers determined that the program could not be reconciled with the law but later decided to "push the envelope."

Statements like that frustrate the administration's critics.

"It is very difficult to know if this order in fact satisfies FISA," Mr. Cole said.

Because FISA applications are one-sided affairs, with no one arguing the other side, there is no losing party who can appeal from the orders. In a letter on Wednesday, Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, the presiding judge of the 11-member court, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, said she would have no objection to the release of the relevant orders to lawmakers if the Justice Department approved.

DOJ_NMG_0118802

But Mr. Gonzales indicated that the department would object to the release of at least the “operational details” disclosed in the orders.

Gonzales Under Fire In Senate (TIME)

By Brian Bennett

Time, January 19, 2007

Alberto Gonzales spent two hours every day for the last three weeks steeling himself for today's hearing before the Democrat-led Senate Judiciary committee, says a close aide. Staffers peppered him with possible questions that each Senator might ask. He went in armed for the fight with freshly penned letter to the chairmen of that committee — Democrat Patrick Leahy of Vermont and Republican Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania — telling them not to worry about the whole warrant-less wiretapping issue anymore; it has been approved by judge. It seemed like a nimble pre-emptive duck to take a contentious issue off the table. Some Senators thought it felt more they were being led down a rabbit hole.

In an often-heated exchange, Gonzales refused to disclose details about the court's decision and exactly how it applied to the President's controversial wiretapping program. While disclosing that the court had ruled, Gonzales was unwilling to reveal any of the "operational details about how we're doing this." At one point, an exasperated Leahy asked, "Are we Alice in Wonderland here?"

The big question was whether there will be some genuine judicial oversight that monitors how individual wiretaps are being used, or if the court approval is a one-time pass for the entire program. Frustrated Senators pointed out that it was still unclear what procedures, if any, will actually change with the court order, issued on Jan. 10 by a single judge sitting on the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) court.

The judge, Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, wrote in a letter today that she was willing to give Senators copies of the court's opinions on the secret program — provided the Justice Department approved the release of the classified documents, as is the court's standard practice. By the end of the day, many Senators were unsatisfied, feeling they were getting new answers to their old questions, but none of it added up to new information.

The program in question, run by the National Security Agency program and later named the Terrorist Surveillance Program, was designed to listen in on international telephone conversations into or out of the U.S. when one of the callers is believed to be affiliated with a terrorist group. The Justice Department has argued for a year that going through the FISA court for approval of these sensitive, urgent wiretaps was too cumbersome and time consuming.

But after the program was uncovered in press reports in December 2005, pressure mounted on the White House to have judicial oversight. Republican Rep. Pete Hoekstra of Michigan applauded the change today, saying it was a result of "tough questioning" by the House Intelligence Committee over the past year.

But Heather Wilson, a New Mexico Republican who serves on the House Intelligence committee and has been briefed on the program, told the New York Times that she believed the FISA approval was "programmatic" in scope, rather than involving the ongoing review of individual warrants. If that's the case, it doesn't change very much for the Administration — other than eliminating the need for the President to reauthorize the program every 45 days, as he's done since it was initiated in October 2001. The White House has gotten a judge to do that — indefinitely.

Senators Grill Gonzales Over Spy Program (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, January 19, 2007

Senators still suspicious of the government's domestic spying program grilled Attorney General Alberto Gonzales Thursday over whether new oversight by a secret court will help protect peoples' privacy rights.

Gonzales offered few answers, maintaining during 3 1/2 hours of sharp rebukes that disclosing details of the program would expose sensitive security information.

His resistance was underscored by a letter from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court's presiding judge, offering to detail some of its new authority with lawmakers if allowed to by the Bush administration.

"Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us a decision that you publicly announced?" Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., asked. "Are we a little Alice in Wonderland here?"

Gonzales responded: "There is going to be information about operational details about how we're doing this that we want to keep confidential."

His appearance in front of the Senate Judiciary Committee came a day after the administration announced it would allow judicial review of the spying program that President Bush secretly authorized after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks. Until last week, the National Security Agency conducted domestic surveillance of people suspected of links to al-Qaida without court warrants.

Bush on Thursday denied there had been any change in the program, other than to receive a court's blessing of it.

"The courts yesterday said I did have the authority," the president said in an interview with Tribune Broadcasting. "That's important. And the reason it's important that they verify the legalities of the program is it means it's going to extend, make it extend beyond my presidency. This is a really important tool for future presidents to have."

He added: "Nothing has changed in the program except the court has said we've analyzed it and it's a legitimate way to protect the country."

In hearings on both sides of Capitol Hill, lawmakers said they welcomed the reversal by the Bush administration, which had previously opposed review by the so-called FISA Court. But they wanted to know more about how judges might consider evidence when approving government requests to monitor phone calls and e-mails between the United States and abroad.

"I'd like to know if there's an intention to do this on an individual basis, or at least on a case-by-case basis where five, six, ten, 20, 100 individuals are involved, or is it broader brush than that?" said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. "Because if it's a very broad brush approval and again, because it's secret we have no way of knowing, it doesn't do much good."

"They meet the legal requirements under FISA," Gonzales said.

"I think we have to assume these are broad program warrants, barring some comment from you," Schumer responded. He added: "If it's a broad program warrant, it really isn't very satisfying in terms of protection that the Constitution requires."

Gonzales later added that the warrants go "above and beyond what we normally find in a FISA order to ensure that any information that shouldn't be collected is destroyed in an appropriate way."

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said it remains unclear whether the FISA court has a blanket authority to approve all eavesdropping requests — even though Justice Department attorneys have assured him warrants would target individuals. "From their description to me, I think we need to know more on the oversight process," he said.

Specter also needled Gonzales on why the spying program was only last week put under judicial review after it was revealed a little over a year ago. He noted that Republicans lost control of Congress in elections last fall that were widely seen as a repudiation of administration policy.

"The heavy criticism the president took on the program was very harmful in the political process, and for the reputation of the country," Specter said.

Since assuming oversight authority, by a Jan. 10 order, the FISA court already has approved at least one surveillance warrant targeting a person suspected of having ties to al-Qaida or an associated terror group.

In a letter released at the Senate hearing, FISA Court Presiding Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, said she has no objection to giving lawmakers copies of orders and opinions relating to the secret panel's oversight of the spy program.

"However, the court's practice is to refer any requests for classified information to the Department of Justice. In this instance, the documents that are responsive to your request contain classified information and, therefore, I would ask you to discuss the matter with the attorney general or his representatives," Kollar-Kotelly wrote in the Jan. 17 letter.

"If allowed, the Court will, of course, cooperate with the agreement," she wrote.

Both Gonzales and National Intelligence Director John Negroponte, testifying separately before the House Intelligence Committee, said it was uncertain whether the court orders and details about the program will be disclosed. Negroponte said there may be separation of powers issues involved in turning over information to Congress about the program.

Officials would not say whether case-by-case basis decisions on surveillance of Americans are now made by FISA judges or by NSA officials.

Last August, a federal judge in Detroit declared the spying program unconstitutional, saying it violated the rights to free speech and privacy and the separation of powers. The Justice Department launched an appeal of that decision, but now is considering whether to ask a three-judge panel of the Cincinnati-based appellate court to dismiss the case.

Gonzales Hit On Wiretap Oversight Delay (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales was challenged yesterday by members of the Senate Judiciary Committee on why the Bush administration took more than five years to seek oversight by an independent court for its domestic terrorist-surveillance program.

"For years, this administration has engaged in warrantless wiretapping of Americans contrary to the law," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and committee chairman. "I welcome the president's change of course to not reauthorize this program and to, instead, seek approval for all wiretaps from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, as the law requires.

"This reversal is a good first step, but there are still several outstanding questions that remain," Mr. Leahy said. "The president must also fully inform Congress and the American people about the contours of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court order authorizing this surveillance program and of the program itself."

Mr. Gonzales announced Wednesday that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court would monitor Justice Department intercepts of international calls involving terrorism suspects in this country. He said an order establishing oversight was issued Jan. 10 and it gave the department, which conducts the program through the National Security Agency, the "necessary speed and agility while providing substantial advantages."

The announcement was considered a major concession for President Bush, who since the secret program was publicly disclosed in 2005 has argued that he did not need -- or want -- to use the special intelligence court.

Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the committee's ranking Republican, said the administration could and should have moved quicker to get court approval. "I cannot help but conclude that there hasn't been a sufficient sense of urgency on behalf of the Department of Justice to get this job done faster," he said.

Mr. Specter, who has been critical of the White House for its refusal to disclose details of the surveillance program, has described the policy as a "clear-cut violation" of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA).

Mr. Gonzales challenged Mr. Specter's statement that the matter should have been handled faster, saying the issue was not something "we could have pulled off the shelf and done in a matter of days or weeks." He called the process "a very complicated application," but added that it will enable the government to intercept calls to and from those in this country with suspected terrorists ties, subject to the approval of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

He said the court orders would "allow the necessary speed and agility the government needs to protect our nation from the terrorist threat."

Both Democrats and Republicans on the committee demanded more information about the court's oversight role, citing a letter from FISA's presiding judge saying the court would have no objection to giving the panel confidential information, but it would have to be provided by the Justice Department.

Mr. Gonzales said only that there would be "information about operational details about how we're doing this that we want to keep confidential."

Spy Court's Orders Stir Debate On Hill (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

The Bush administration quickly locked horns with Democratic lawmakers yesterday over its revised domestic wiretap program, signaling that the government will probably oppose efforts to release new court orders from a clandestine court that now governs the spying.

The head of the secret court that approved the program said she has no objection to releasing the documents, but Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte indicated that the administration is likely to resist.

The conflict followed the administration's announcement Wednesday that it will dismantle the controversial counterterrorism surveillance program run by the National Security Agency and instead conduct the eavesdropping under the authority of the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, which issues warrants in spy and terrorism cases.

Yesterday's debate underscored continued skepticism among Democrats and some Republicans over the parameters and legality of the administration's surveillance efforts, even with court approval, and signaled that Congress and the executive branch are likely to continue sparring over the details.

Although the precise contours and scope of the revised spying program remain unclear, some new information emerged yesterday. Sen. Arlen Specter (Pa.), the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee, said Justice Department briefers told him the effort was based on "individualized" warrants, rather than a blanket order that would allow broader surveillance.

Four other people who have been briefed on the program, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the program is classified, described it as a hybrid effort that includes both individual warrants and the authority for eavesdropping on more broadly defined groups of people.

Administration officials have declined to provide details of how the new version of the program will operate, including whether the government must obtain warrants for each person targeted for surveillance. Officials say the orders from a judge of the intelligence court are "complex" and "innovative" but adhere to the limits of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), a 1978 law that governs domestic surveillance of suspected terrorists and spies.

Leading Democrats, while praising the administration's decision to conduct surveillance under court authority, said yesterday that there are still too many unanswered questions about how the program will be conducted. Specter and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), the Judiciary Committee chairman, demanded the release of the intelligence court judge's orders allowing the new program, issued Jan. 10.

Those demands were bolstered by U.S. District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, the presiding judge of the intelligence court, who wrote in a letter to Leahy and Specter that she has "no objection to this material being made available" to lawmakers.

But Kollar-Kotelly said the final decision is up to the Justice Department, because the orders include classified information.

Gonzales, appearing before the Judiciary Committee, said he could not guarantee the release of the orders because of classified-information restrictions. Negroponte told the House intelligence committee that letting the secret court turn over information about the program to Congress may violate separation-of-powers provisions.

The government program targets telephone calls and e-mails between people in the United States and others overseas if one party is suspected to have links to al-Qaeda or other terrorist groups.

"Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us decisions that you've publicly announced?" Leahy asked. "Are we a little Alice in Wonderland here?"

"I'm not saying that I have objections to it being released. What I'm saying is it's not my decision to make," Gonzales responded. He added later: "There is going to be information about operational details about how we're doing this that we want to keep confidential."

Several senators also sharply questioned why it took nearly two years for the Justice Department to come up with a surveillance plan that was acceptable to the secret court.

"It is a little hard to see why it took so long," said Specter, who unsuccessfully attempted to shepherd legislation through Congress last year that would have allowed the administration to seek the court's approval for the spying. "The heavy criticism the president took on the program was very harmful in the political process and for the reputation of the country."

Gonzales argued that disclosing even the basic outlines of the program would reveal vital intelligence sources and methods to terrorist groups. He also defended the time it took for Justice lawyers to devise a plan that would pass court muster.

"This is a very complicated application," Gonzales said. "It's not something you just pull off the shelf."

Gonzales said the program adheres to FISA and that "minimization" procedures to destroy unneeded data go "above and beyond" what is required in a typical FISA case.

Gonzales said Justice Department lawyers began exploring ways to use the surveillance law for the NSA program shortly after he became attorney general in early 2005.

Another source said the department had informally floated a proposal to Kollar-Kotelly in recent months about how to resolve concerns among the intelligence court's judges that information gleaned from the president's surveillance program might taint the court's warrant process.

Kollar-Kotelly raised the same point with top Justice officials in 2005, when she was briefed on the president's domestic spying program, according to several officials familiar with the FISA process. The judge did not consider it her place to determine whether the program was constitutional, but she was very disturbed by the risk that information gleaned from warrantless wiretaps could be used in warrant applications without the court's knowledge.

Senators Demand Details On New Eavesdropping Rules (NYT)

By David Johnston And Scott Shane

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — Lawmakers demanded more information on new rules for governing a domestic surveillance program on Thursday, a day after the Bush administration announced that it had placed the National Security Agency eavesdropping under court supervision.

Senators from both parties who had long criticized the eavesdropping without court warrants said at a Judiciary Committee hearing that they welcomed the change but wanted details. They said they wanted to be sure that the new rules adequately protected Americans' privacy.

A central question is whether the court will approve eavesdropping case by case, its traditional practice, or will it issue broader orders that provide additional government leeway in selecting targets.

A Congressional official who has been briefed on the new procedures called it a hybrid of individual warrants and broader approval.

DOJ_NMG_0118806

Some lawmakers wanted to know why the administration had waited five years from the start of the program to put it under the supervision of the secret intelligence court and asked whether the administration might decide on its own to revive eavesdropping without warrants if the court denied a request.

At the hearing, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, a chief defender of the program, tried, apparently without success, to quell the flood of questions.

The session quickly became a forum for senators to say the administration was withholding pertinent information about the decision. House Democrats raised similar concerns.

Pressed repeatedly for details, Mr. Gonzales offered little new information and would not agree to provide more documents to explain the decision. He declined to answer questions about why the administration had reversed itself after saying for more than a year that the program could not operate effectively under court supervision.

"There was a reason why we didn't do this as an initial matter shortly after the attacks of Sept. 11," said Mr. Gonzales, who was White House counsel.

Referring to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, the law that created the secret court, he added, "The truth of the matter is we looked at FISA and we all concluded there's no way we can do what we have to do to protect this country under the strict reading of FISA."

Later, Mr. Gonzales said, after he became attorney general in 2005, he started reviewing whether the program might be brought under the court's supervision.

Justice Department officials said they had worked on the "innovative, complex orders" for two years.

On Jan. 10, an unidentified judge of the court approved the first new order. The next day, National Security Agency officials called the House and Senate intelligence committees to outline the new system, and Justice Department officials briefed some committee staff members on Friday, Congressional officials said.

A senior administration official involved in formulating the policy expressed frustration with the criticism on Capitol Hill. He said Democrats had repeatedly said the program was valuable but should be conducted under FISA.

Now that that has happened, the official said, "People ought to take yes for an answer."

He added that even if the critics are suspicious of the administration, "I don't think there's any basis for being suspicious of the FISA court," which has approved the system.

At the hearing, Mr. Gonzales said the rules protected national security by allowing continued eavesdropping, but required the government to halt quickly the monitoring of people who were not found to be doing anything wrong.

With Justice Department officials unwilling to provide lawmakers with documents, lawmakers explored other ways to obtain information. In response to a request from the Judiciary Committee chairman, Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, the presiding judge of the foreign intelligence surveillance court, Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, a federal district judge in the District of Columbia, said the court would be willing to turn over to the panel its classified orders.

But Judge Kollar-Kotelly wrote in a letter that her court would cooperate only "if the executive and legislative branches reach agreement for access to this material."

Mr. Gonzales, asked by Mr. Leahy whether he would object to the disclosure of the documents to Congress, replied that he hoped to keep operational aspects of the program secret. Mr. Gonzales said that before he answered the question he would need to consult his "principal," apparently a reference to President Bush.

Mr. Leahy expressed skepticism, saying: "I don't think I fully understand that. Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us decisions that you've publicly announced? Are we a little Alice in Wonderland here?"

Mr. Gonzales replied: "I'm not saying that I have objection to its being released. What I'm saying is it's not my decision to make."

Some lawmakers said the administration should have changed course much sooner.

"It is a little hard to see why it took so long," said Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, asked about the court's approval of the surveillance orders.

"I'd like to know," Mr. Schumer said, "if there is an intention to do this on an individual basis or on a case-by-case basis where 5, 6, 10, 20, 100 individuals are involved or is it broader brush than that? Because if it is very broad-brush approval, again because it's secret, we have no way of knowing, it doesn't do much good."

Mr. Gonzales said, "They meet the requirements under FISA."

The Justice Department has tried to streamline the application for warrants under the surveillance law, creating a computerized system called Turbo FISA.

Bush Makes Concessions To Congress (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, January 19, 2007

President Bush's about-face on warrantless wiretapping was the latest in a series of White House retreats and reversals. This is a different day for a president known for his stubbornness and insistence on seeing things his way.

In just two months, Bush has acknowledged making mistakes in Iraq, sacked Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon and given up the fight for John Bolton at the United Nations. He has promised a plan to balance the budget by 2012 — after aggressively presiding over record deficits and tax cuts; Democrats also have set such a target. And the president has agreed tentatively to increasing the minimum wage.

Bush seems to be bending to the realities of the new Democratic control of Congress — and laying down markers to keep the last two years of his presidency from being seen as only about Iraq.

"It appears that Bush is cleaning up a lot of the outstanding cats and dogs prior to the State of the Union," said GOP strategist Scott Reed. "I think both sides are going to try to get something done for the next year before presidential politics totally consume the country," said Reed, who ran Bob Dole's presidential campaign in 1996.

Bush was expected to emphasize a range of domestic initiatives in the annual State of the Union address on Tuesday. It will be his first to a Congress fully under Democratic control.

With his eye increasingly on his presidential legacy, Bush is seeking areas where he can reach agreement with Democrats. That could include shoring up Social Security, overhauling immigration rules and reducing the country's reliance on imported oil.

That may run counter to Bush's self-assured, in-your-face image, but it's also a recognition that Democrats are now calling many of the shots, said Bruce Buchanan, a political science professor at the University of Texas and a longtime close observer of the Bush family.

"Since he feels compelled to stick to his guns on Iraq in a way that he knows bucks public opinion and Congress, he wants to be able to point to some areas where he is doing his best to cooperate, to acknowledge the (midterm) election results," Buchanan said.

As governor, Bush earned an early reputation for successfully reaching out to Democrats who controlled the Texas Legislature. But, said Buchanan, the Democrats in Texas were centrist business Democrats whose goals often meshed with Bush's, a situation not matched in Washington.

The abrupt retreat from warrantless eavesdropping of calls between the U.S. and overseas appeared designed to head off certain confrontations with Congress and federal courts.

After claiming for months it had the authority to order such spying, the administration now says it will let an independent panel of federal judges oversee the program.

The turnabout raised fresh questions about other post Sept. 11 anti-terror policies that appear to push the constitutional envelope, including secret CIA prisons overseas and the continued existence of the prison camp for suspected terrorists in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"The government is again one of checks and balances," said Steffen Schmidt, a political scientist at Iowa State University. "The fact that the Democrats won and will scrutinize his policy, investigate his decisions and say `no' to things means he has to essentially be a president in a different way than when he had a compliant Republican Congress for six years."

Bush was drawing criticism even from within his own party over the domestic spying program, initiated soon after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and first disclosed in December 2005 by The New York Times.

"The United States and the administration have paid a heavy price for not acting sooner to bring the terrorist surveillance program under judicial review," Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania told Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a sometimes testy Senate Judiciary Relations Committee hearing on Thursday. Specter is the panel's senior Republican.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the chairman, asserted that, in his more than 30 years in the Senate, he never had seen a time when the constitutional and fundamental rights of Americans "were more threatened, unfortunately, by our own government."

Until the turnabout, the administration argued strenuously that the president possessed extraordinary legal powers because of the need to protect the country after the Sept. 11 attacks.

The warrantless spying program was part of a campaign spearheaded by Vice President Dick Cheney, who argued that many presidential powers had been eroded by Congress in response to the Vietnam War and the Watergate scandal. Cheney defended the program as recently as Sunday in a television interview.

The White House denied that Bush's recent concessions to Congress were a sign of political weakness.

"A lot of people are looking for a `panic' or `failure' narrative out of this White House. It's just not the case," said presidential press secretary Tony Snow.

White House Backs Down On Wartime Powers (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush has claimed some far-reaching powers for the executive branch in its prosecution of the war against global terrorism – but in the face of legal challenges and newly empowered Democrats, some of those powers slowly are being curtailed.

In the latest such move, the administration itself has decided to put the National Security Agency's secretive domestic spying program under judicial oversight. This program, under which the NSA monitored phone calls and e-mails between the United States and other countries when a participant was suspected of a link to terrorism, has until now operated without court-issued warrants.

The warrantless eavesdropping operation, along with the abuse of detainees at Abu Ghraib prison and other civil-liberties issues, has caused even US allies overseas to question what was happening to the basic nature of the United States, says Joseph Nye, former dean of Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government in Cambridge, Mass.

But now US courts have held that some aspects of the administration's detainee policies aren't constitutional. Harsh interrogation techniques such as waterboarding may no longer be permitted. And judges will apparently now decide whether NSA wiretaps are justified.

"We are still capable of self-correction," says Mr. Nye, now a professor of international relations at the JFK School. "That has an attraction overseas."

A senior Justice Department official who briefed reporters Wednesday on the change in the wiretapping program said that the NSA program had been run in a legal manner. That said, there are advantages to having a judge oversee the program, said the official – though he declined to specify what the advantages were.

"Obviously, this issue of the terrorist surveillance program is one that has been under intense public debate and scrutiny on [Capitol Hill]," said the official. "And just considering all these circumstances, the president determined that this is the appropriate course."

Last August, a federal judge in Detroit had ruled the program unconstitutional, saying it violated privacy and free-speech rights, as well as the separation of powers between the branches of government.

That ruling may now be moot, according to Justice Department officials. Long-standing critics of the program were not so sure, saying that the lack of details about what exactly had changed means the courts may still need to examine the issue.

"The NSA was operating illegally, and this 11th-hour ploy is clearly an effort to avoid judicial and congressional scrutiny," said ACLU executive director Anthony Romero. "Despite this adroit back flip, the constitutional problems with the president's actions remain unaddressed."

The NSA program, to this point, has been reauthorized every 45 days by executive order. On Wednesday, the Justice Department in a letter to congressional leaders announced that he will not reauthorize the program after the current 45-day period expires. Instead, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, a panel set up in the wake of Vietnam-era struggles over executive-branch secrecy, will handle NSA eavesdropping requests, apparently case by case.

In fact, such oversight is already occurring. The FISA panel issued multiple orders last week allowing surveillance of communications thought to be linked to terrorism in which one party is in the US.

The Justice Department announced the change a day before Attorney General Alberto Gonzales appeared for an oversight hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee. With the panel now controlled by Democrats, Mr. Gonzales's relations with Congress may be testier than they have been to this point.

For instance, at the hearing Gonzales announced that he might not be able to release details of FISA orders on the program, causing committee chairman Patrick Leahy (D) to say, "Are we Alice in Wonderland here?"

Gonzales responded, "There is going to be information about operational details about how we're doing this that we want to keep confidential."

Gonzales Faces Sharp Criticism By Senators (MCT)

By Greg Gordon

McClatchy Newspapers, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON - Senate Democrats and one Republican pressed Attorney General Alberto Gonzales Thursday to explain why it took the Bush administration five years to give a secret national security court control over government eavesdropping on suspected terrorists.

Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee that such a change was highly complex - "not the kind of thing you pull off a shelf" - and that it took time to find a way to do it without compromising the nation's security.

Until now, the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program, launched in the months after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, has monitored overseas phone calls and other electronic communications involving Americans without court warrants.

But Gonzales repeatedly rejected senators' assertions that it was illegal, saying the program was within President Bush's emergency war powers.

Testifying under oath in his first congressional appearance since Democrats took control of Capitol Hill this month, Gonzales was pummeled with allegations that the program and other administration anti-terrorism programs have trampled on federal civil rights laws and the Constitution. He also faced sharp questions about rising violent crime in some medium-sized cities, allegations of voting rights abuses against African-Americans in Maryland and his agency's recent dismissal of a half-dozen U.S. attorneys.

"I have never seen a time when our Constitution and fundamental rights as Americans were more threatened by their own government," said Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the committee chairman.

In his opening statement, Leahy pointed to "warrantless wiretapping," allegations that the U.S. has tortured some terrorism detainees held overseas and the evisceration of what he called "the Great Writ of habeas corpus" - a detainee's right to challenge the conditions of his confinement.

Leahy's face reddened and his voice rose when Gonzales said he couldn't explain for another few days why an innocent Canadian citizen, Maher Arar, was detained at New York's Kennedy Airport in 2002, then sent to Syria to be questioned.

A Canadian inquiry later found that the Syrians had tortured Arar while they held him captive for 10 months.

Gonzales said that his predecessor as attorney general, John Ashcroft, had received assurances from Syria that Arar wouldn't be tortured.

"Assurances?" Leahy asked. He questioned why the U.S. government would trust Syria.

"We knew damned well if he went to Canada, he would not be tortured," the senator said, describing the episode as "beneath the dignity of this country that has always been a beacon of human rights."

"The Canadians are wondering what's happened to us," said Leahy, who lives an hour's drive from the Canadian border. He threatened to hold a hearing on the matter if Gonzales fails to provide an explanation within a week.

Talking in low, controlled tones in response to questioning by Sens. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., Russ Feingold, D-Wis., and Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., Gonzales refused to provide specifics of the newly disclosed arrangement with the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, saying such matters are classified.

He said the new program complies with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), the 1978 law that created the court and gave it a lower threshold for approving wiretaps and other surveillance in national security investigations.

Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter, the panel's ranking Republican, said he'll explore further whether there's "any conceivable justification for 19 months elapsing" from the time Gonzales said the Justice Department first began exploring ways to put the program under the FISA court until it did so.

Specter sought to quell concerns that the court has given the administration a secret, blanket warrant to monitor the activities of suspected terrorists. Specter said that two senior Justice Department officials advised him, during a private briefing after the new arrangement was announced Wednesday, that orders signed by a judge on the court provide for "individualized" treatment of warrant applications.

Specter said that disclosure of the program, just as Congress was completing revisions to the USA Patriot Act in December 2005, weakened the law and may have been a factor in Republicans' election defeat last fall.

Leahy and Specter wrote to the FISA court's chief judge on Wednesday requesting copies of the new orders. Chief Judge Colleen Kollar-Cotelly responded that she had "no objection" to making the material public, but that it's the court's practice to refer requests for classified information to the Justice Department.

Gonzales repeatedly emphasized that all members of the Senate and House intelligence committees have been briefed on the orders and didn't immediately say how he'd respond to the demand from the Judiciary Committee.

The agreement was announced two weeks before the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati was due to hear arguments over a lower court judge's ruling that the warrantless surveillance program was illegal. A Justice Department official, who insisted upon anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the matter, said the agency would now argue that the case is moot.

Gonzales Balks At Providing Details On Wiretapping Plans (HC)

By Bennett Roth, Houston Chronicle Washington Bureau

Houston Chronicle, January 19, 2007

Attorney general faces harsh words from senators at committee hearing

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Alberto Gonzales refused to promise a Senate committee that the administration would let it review the text of an agreement ending its warrantless wiretapping program.

During a contentious Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Thursday, Democrats said they wanted more details about how the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court will approve federal eavesdropping on U.S. residents suspected of having ties to terrorists.

Committee chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., was taken aback when Gonzales wouldn't commit to turning over the FISA order spelling out the domestic wiretapping program.

"Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us a decision that you publicly announced," asked Leahy. "Are we in Alice in Wonderland here?"

Gonzales responded that release of the order was "not my decision to make." He added that "there is going to be information about operational details about how we're doing this that we want to keep confidential." The presiding judge of the FISA wrote Leahy that she had no problem giving the lawmakers the order if the administration signed off.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., who as previous chairman of the committee had been attempting to broker a compromise on the issue, criticized Gonzales for taking a year and a half to work out the deal.

"The heavy criticism the president took on the program was very harmful in the political process, and for the reputation of the country," said Specter, who noted that the Republicans lost congressional elections as the debate over the program raged.

Gonzales, however, said that working out details of the FISA oversight was a complex matter and not "something we pulled off the shelf and could have done in a matter of weeks."

Publicly disclosed in 2005The program was secretly approved by President Bush after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks but was not publicly disclosed until December of 2005. Bush and his aides have vigorously defended warrantless eavesdropping as necessary to catch terrorists while Democrats have questioned its legality.

Gonzales said the White House still believed it was acting lawfully in wiretapping without court approval, prompting Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., to question the permanency of the new agreement. "I, for one, can't feel very relieved knowing that the administration's view is they can go back and reinstitute the old program on a whim," Schumer said.

In his first appearance before the Judiciary Committee under Democratic control, the Texas lawyer spent much of the day fielding often hostile questions.

Leahy asked him about reports that the administration approved the opening of mail without warrants.

Gonzales said that there had been no physical searches of mail by federal authorities, but he would not say whether the president has the constitutional authority to order such searches.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., criticized the attorney general for forcing out a number of U.S. attorneys and installing temporary replacements who have not been confirmed by the Senate.

Gonzales responded it was a "sign of good management" that he was seeking the best people to be the Department of Justice's representatives in communities across the nation.

Attorney General Gets Sharp Questions On Surveillance (Update1) (BLOOM)

By James Rowley And Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, January 19, 2007

Jan. 18 (Bloomberg) -- Senators peppered Attorney General Alberto Gonzales with complaints that the Bush administration paid scant attention to civil liberties and made overreaching claims of presidential power during its five-year war on terror.

During his first appearance before a Democratic-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee, Gonzales was questioned repeatedly about why President George W. Bush didn't act sooner to put electronic surveillance of suspected terrorists under court supervision.

In a reversal, the Justice Department announced yesterday that a secret court will oversee the wiretapping of international phone calls by suspected al-Qaeda agents in the U.S., a program that began in 2001 after the Sept. 11 attacks.

``It is a little hard to see why it took so long," said Senator Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican who headed the panel until Democrats took control of Congress this month. ``There hasn't been a sufficient sense of urgency" to ``get this job done faster," he said.

In a letter to Congress yesterday, the Justice Department said it began ``exploring options" for judicial oversight at least four months before the program was disclosed in December 2005. A judge with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, established by a 1978 law, issued orders Jan. 10 authorizing the surveillance. The government told the court it had ``probable cause" to believe one party to an international phone call or e- mail exchange was an al-Qaeda agent.

`Strict Reading'

Gonzales said he disagreed with ``Senator Specter's innuendo that this was something we could have pulled off the shelf in a matter of days and weeks." He said that in 2001, the government didn't seek court approval because ``we all concluded there's no way we can do what we believe we have to do to protect this country" under a ``strict reading" of the 1978 law.

Gonzales was also questioned about Bush's assertion, after signing postal authorization legislation, that he can order Americans' mail opened without a warrant.

``To my knowledge there is no physical search of mail" unless authorized by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, Gonzales said.

Vermont Senator Patrick Leahy, the panel's new Democratic chairman, complained that the Justice Department has been ``complicit" in devising ``government policies which threaten our basic liberties and overstep the bounds of our Constitution." He cited the legal justification for detaining and interrogating suspected terrorists at secret prisons run by the Central Intelligence Agency.

Public Outcry

Following a public outcry over the spying on suspected terrorists without court warrants, Bush and his allies spent the past year defending the program's legality.

Bush said he has the power to conduct the surveillance under a congressional resolution authorizing the war on terrorism and under his constitutional role as commander-in-chief. The administration argued that it would be impossible to require a court order each time the National Security Agency wanted to wiretap international phone calls of a suspected al-Qaeda agent.

Specter said ``heavy criticism the president took on the program" was politically ``very harmful" to Republicans in the November elections when Democrats won control of Congress for the first time in 12 years.

Gonzales refused to say whether the recent orders signed by a Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court judge authorized surveillance of specific individuals or broader groups of suspected al-Qaeda agents.

New York Democrat Charles E. Schumer said he wasn't satisfied by the attorney general's answers. ``If it's a very broad-brush approval" by the secret court, ``it doesn't do much good" to meet traditional legal requirements that warrants authorize surveillance of a specific person, he said.

Too Many Questions

``There are still far too many questions to say this issue is resolved," Schumer said.

Schumer pointed to Gonzales's continued assertion that the National Security Agency's surveillance was legal without court warrants. ``You could turn this on and off at will" if the court ``didn't do what you wanted," Schumer said.

Under the new policy, the monitoring must be approved by the court, which meets in secret at the Justice Department's Washington headquarters. It has authority to approve government eavesdropping of U.S. citizens linked to a foreign power.

Gonzales declined to say whether the Bush administration would consent to the court's release of the order. The special court's presiding judge, Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, told Leahy and Specter in a letter she had no objection to giving Congress the documents if the Bush administration agreed to let lawmakers have access to them.

``That's a decision that I would like to take back to my principal," Gonzales told Leahy.

Senate Judiciary Committee Questions Surveillance (NEWSDAY)

By Tom Brune, Newsday Washington Bureau

Newsday, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales Thursday sparred with senators demanding details about a special court's approval of the president's controversial terrorist surveillance program and defended the years he waited before seeking judicial review.

In his first appearance before the Senate Judiciary Committee since Democrats took control of Congress, Gonzales rebuffed senators who grilled him about anti-terror policies they contend intrude on civil liberties and privacy.

"We have taken actions we believe are absolutely necessary," Gonzales said, after Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) said President George W. Bush had squandered the support of Congress and the public.

Much of the hearing focused on Gonzales' announcement Wednesday that the administration had reversed course and sought court approval for the National Security Agency's tapping of U.S.-international calls and e-mails of suspected terrorists, five years after Bush ordered it on his own authority.

Last week, a judge on the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court issued orders allowing the NSA "to target for collection international communications into and out of the United States where there is probable cause" one of the parties is a member of al-Qaida or an affiliated group.

Despite repeated questions about the scope of those orders, Gonzales insisted to senators that the court process and spying remain secret.

DOJ_NMG_0118812

Gonzales wouldn't budge when Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) disclosed a letter from the FISA court chief judge expressing a willingness to release the orders to the committee.

"Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us a decision that you publicly announced?" Leahy asked. "Are we Alice in Wonderland here?"

Gonzales said it wasn't his decision, but added, "Certainly in the application, there's going to be information about operational details about how we're doing this that we want to keep confidential."

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) was also caustic in his questioning, noting it took Justice Department lawyers 19 months to win the court order, while he wrote a bill to do it in a year.

"I cannot help but conclude there hasn't been a sufficient sense of urgency to get this done faster," Specter said.

Gonzales said, "I somewhat take issue with Sen. Specter's innuendo that this was something that we could have pulled off the shelf and done in a matter of days or weeks."

Gonzales said the confidential briefings would help senators understand the orders.

But Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) said he wasn't satisfied with Gonzales' responses.

"While many are rightly relieved that you finally decided to seek the involvement of the court, there are still far too many unanswered questions to say that this issue has been resolved," Schumer said.

He asked if the spying is done "on an individual basis, or at least on a case-by-case basis where five, six, 10, 20, 100 individuals are involved, or is it broader brush than that?"

Gonzales said the court orders "meet the legal requirements under FISA."

"We have to assume these are broad program warrants," Schumer said, which falls short of Constitutional protection.

Schumer also said he was concerned Bush believes he doesn't need a court order.

"We can't feel very relieved knowing that the administration's view is that they can go back and reinstitute the old program on a whim," he said.

Attorney General Mum On Spy Program Court Orders (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, January 19, 2007

At Senate hearing, Gonzales casts doubt on whether more details will be publicly disclosed about administration's latest surveillance plans.

WASHINGTON--Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' appearance before a key U.S. Senate committee Thursday yielded little new information about the Bush administration's sudden revelation that it would seek court approval for its domestic eavesdropping activities.

At a U.S. Department of Justice oversight hearing scheduled before the government announcement on Wednesday, Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) and ranking Republican Arlen Specter said they were pleased to hear that future activities associated with a controversial National Security Agency operation known as the Terrorist Surveillance Program would undergo review by judges on the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

But many critical questions about the scope and content of the court orders remain unanswered, committee members said.

"To ensure the balance necessary to achieve both security and liberty for our nation, the president must also fully inform Congress and the American people about the contours of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court order authorizing this surveillance program and of the program itself," Leahy said.

Few, however, probed for those details at Thursday's hearing, where questioning spanned everything from the Iraq war to violent crime statistics to online child exploitation. Aside from Specter, no Republicans asked questions about the surveillance activities, and some Democrats also focused their inquiries elsewhere.

Although Specter said he was concerned about what shape the court orders took, only one senator present directly posed that question. Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) grilled the attorney general on whether the orders described in his Wednesday letter (PDF) amounted to a blanket warrant for the entire eavesdropping program or were tailored to particular targets. Even Intelligence Committee members who had received closed-door briefings didn't seem to have a good feel for that information, he said.

"If it's a very broad-brush approval--and again, because it's secret, we have no way of knowing--it doesn't do much good," Schumer said.

Gonzales said he could only reveal that the orders "meet the legal requirements" under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), a 1978 law that was intended to govern eavesdropping on suspects outside the United States.

Perhaps others were hoping the court itself would help shed light on its activities. Specter and Leahy highlighted their joint request on Wednesday to presiding FISA court judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly for copies of the orders, which are typically kept confidential. According to Gonzales' letter, an unnamed FISA court judge on January 10 issued orders that authorized government wiretapping of communications when at least one end is outside the United States and one of the communicants is likely to be a member or agent of al-Qaida or associated terrorist groups.

Whether that information will be released to Congress--much less to the public--remains uncertain. In a letter dated January 17 and distributed to reporters Thursday, Kollar-Kotelly said she had no objection to furnishing the documents to the committee but because classified information is involved, she would have to refer their request to the Justice Department.

"If the executive and legislative branches reach agreement for access to this material," she wrote, "the court will, of course, cooperate with the agreement."

Pressed by Leahy on whether he would object to the court orders being shared with Congress, Gonzales first said he'd have to take it up with his "principals."

"Are you saying that you might object to the court giving us decisions that you publicly announced?" Leahy asked. "Are we a little Alice in Wonderland here?"

"I would say it's not my decision to make," Gonzales replied. He added that he couldn't remember exactly what was in the orders but that they undoubtedly include "operational details" that would need to be kept under wraps.

Schumer, Specter and Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) each questioned why the Bush administration hadn't approached the court sooner if it had truly begun exploring that option in spring 2005, as it said in its Wednesday letter.

"This is a very complicated application," Gonzales replied. "In many ways it's innovative in terms of the orders granted by the judge. It's not the kind of thing you just pull off the shelf. We worked on it a long time."

Attorney General Grilled Over Domestic Spying Changes (NJTD)

By Andrew Noyes, National Journal's Technology Daily

National Journal's Technology Daily, January 19, 2007

The Bush administration's top lawyer took heat from the Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday about the federal government's domestic electronic eavesdropping program and the Pentagon's use of an anti-terrorism law to collect financial records of U.S. citizens.

The Justice Department announced Wednesday that it would change how the National Security Agency's spying initiative operates by getting permission from a secret court that fields requests for surveillance warrants on U.S. soil.

It also was revealed over the weekend that the CIA and Defense Department have been utilizing a special subpoena power built into the USA PATRIOT Act to scour bank and credit-card records in espionage and international terrorism investigations.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales remained guarded throughout the hearing and refused to answer a number of questions asked by committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., ranking Republican Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and others.

Specter said he wanted to know "why it took so long" for the administration to agree to let the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court review electronic spying requests. The Justice Department said it had been negotiating a review process with the court since summer 2005.

The NSA initiative was implemented shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks but was not publicly disclosed until December 2005.

There are "far too many unanswered questions to say this issue has been resolved," added Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. He worried aloud that the administration could "turn [court review] off at will, particularly if you got a decision that you didn't want."

Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., said he was pleased that the administration decided to "return to the law" after more than five years of what he described as illegal wiretapping. The turnabout was a "stunning" and "long overdue change in direction," Feingold said.

On the issue of collecting bank and credit-card data, Specter said "there's a very basic, distinct role" of the FBI, which pursues domestic matters, and for the CIA, whose role is international. "I'm at a loss to see what the CIA is doing on domestic investigations," Specter said, noting that the Defense Department "has no authority to investigate American citizens."

"There is not a constitutional issue here," Gonzales insisted. He said Congress authorized law enforcement agencies to collect business records but not for criminal investigations or domestic terrorism cases. The files can only be used in espionage and overseas incidents, he said.

Caroline Fredrickson, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington office, said in a statement that the hearing was the "first real test to see if the new Congress will conduct meaningful oversight on the administration."

Government lawyers are slated to appear before the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in two weeks to challenge a lawsuit filed by the ACLU over the NSA program. The ACLU said a ruling remains important because the president still believes in his "inherent authority to engage in wiretapping without the oversight of the [Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act] court."

DOJ_NMG_0118814

Absent more details about what the secret FISA court has authorized, there is no way to determine whether the NSA's current activities are lawful, the ACLU said. "The legality of this unprecedented surveillance program should not be decided by a secret court in one-sided proceedings," ACLU lawyer Ann Beeson said.

U.S. Senator Blasts Gonzales About Arar, Demands Answers Next Week (CP)

By Beth Gorham, Canadian Press

Canadian Press, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON (CP) - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, lambasted by an irate senator Thursday over how Maher Arar was treated by American authorities, said he'll try to release more information about the case next week.

Democrat Patrick Leahy, who heads the Senate judiciary committee, told Gonzales that officials knew "damn well" Arar would be tortured when they deported him to Syria and Canadians are "justifiably upset" about a matter that's "beneath the dignity" of the U.S.

He also wanted to know why Arar remains on the U.S. security watch list despite being exonerated of any terrorist link

"This country has not said anything at all, that we made a mistake or had an apology," said Leahy.

"Why is he on a government watch list if he's been found completely innocent by this Canadian commission, which actually had the information from us?"

According to Canada's Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day, there's no reason at all.

Day, in town for meetings on security matters, said Canadians have finally seen the Arar file that American authorities refused to share until now and there's "nothing new" to suggest he's a safety risk.

"Our officials recently have looked at all the U.S. information and that does not change our position," said Day, who met with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

"We are still maintaining that he should not be on that fly list."

For his part, Gonzales promised a briefing for senators and said he hoped to release the information publicly.

Leahy, who's from Vermont and has an extensive interest in Canadian issues, called rendition cases like Arar's - where a foreign terror suspect is sent to a third country to be tortured - a "black mark" on the country.

And he scoffed at the notion that American officials sought assurances from Syria that Arar wouldn't be tortured.

"We knew damn well, if he went to Canada, he wouldn't be tortured. He'd be held. He'd be investigated," said Leahy.

"We also knew damn well, if he went to Syria, he'd be tortured. And it's beneath the dignity of this country, a country that has always been a beacon of human rights."

It's easy, said Leahy, "for us to sit here comfortably in this room knowing that we're not going to be sent off to another country to be tortured."

Gonzales, who noted that Arar is still suing U.S. officials, said he's willing to answer the committee's questions but suggested he needed to consult with the White House.

"I think we can say a lot more about it, if you just simply give me some additional time," he said.

"In fact, we may be able to publicly say more about this shortly."

Leahy said he'd wait a week for a briefing from Gonzales.

"If we don't get it, I guarantee you there will be another hearing on this issue.

"Canadians have been our closest allies . . . They're justifiably upset. They're wondering what's happened to us.

"I'm somewhat upset," Leahy noted.

"Yes, sir, I can tell," Gonzales replied. "But before you get more upset, perhaps you should wait to receive the briefing."

The tough stand on Arar is a sign of new era on Capitol Hill, where Democrats are now in control and present more challenges for President George W. Bush on all sorts of security issues.

The administration agreed this week to disband a contentious warrantless surveillance program and replace it with one that will be overseen by the secret court that governs clandestine spying in the U.S..

Arar, a Syrian-born Canadian, was seized at a New York City airport in 2002 and sent to Syria, where he was held for more than a year and tortured into making false confessions of terrorist involvement.

Canada's public inquiry concluded RCMP gave U.S. authorities misleading information about Arar before he was deported.

The Americans have maintained they have their own data that justifies keeping him on the watch list.

Last month, Secretary of State Condoleezza said she asked Chertoff and the Justice Department to investigate why the Canadian engineer still can't enter the United States or even fly over U.S. air space.

But Chertoff refused to comment on the case, citing privacy rules and even suggesting it's a hypothetical issue.

"This becomes a relevant issue only if and when somebody presents themselves to come into the U.S.," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0118815

Prime Minister Stephen Harper has expressed frustation about the case, saying he suspects it's a matter of bureaucrats refusing to admit an error.

The U.S. didn't tell Canada that Arar was being sent to Syria.

Harper demanded an apology from the U.S. but had to settle last fall for a promise to collaborate with Canada on any future deportation cases.

An About-face On Warrantless Wiretaps (SCRIPPS)

By Dale McFeatters, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard, January 19, 2007

After a year spent fighting it, the Bush administration has made an abrupt about-face and put its wiretap program under the jurisdiction of a secret court, which many believe the law requires anyway.

The concession does not constitute a White House change of heart in its sweeping assertions of executive power, but rather a move to head off challenges to its warrantless eavesdropping in the courts and Congress that it seemed destined to lose. By folding now, the president retains the prerogative of reasserting the power later.

The Justice Department had already lost a challenge at the district court level and will now seek to have the case declared moot. The then-Republican Congress refused to ratify the program last year when its existence became known, and the Democrats might well have overturned it legislatively.

In essence, the administration said it would comply with the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and seek warrants from the secret panel of federal judges for its monitoring of phone calls and e-mails to and from the United States, a process that it had insisted before was too slow and too cumbersome.

Without those warrants, there is no guarantee to privacy other than the administration's word for it. President Bush waived the warrant requirement shortly after 9/11 in a secret order that didn't become public knowledge until December 2005.

Still, questions remain about what the new compliance, under what the Justice Department says is an "innovative" arrangement with the FISA court, really means. Must the National Security Agency seek individual warrants, or does the administration feel that blanket warrants are acceptable? Or does it believe a simple court approval of the program as a whole is OK? These are fair questions for the House and Senate Intelligence and Judiciary committees to put to the administration.

The Bush administration has been forced to scale back from a number of its assertions of unbridled presidential power _ detention without trial, military commissions, torture, secret prisons _ but that is hardly a wholesale embrace of civil liberties, due process and personal privacy.

The Administration That Cried Wolf On Spying (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

THE BUSH administration's abrupt acknowledgment that it can, after all, track suspected terrorists without shredding the privacy rights of Americans inspires mixed reactions — relief that the rule of law has triumphed, suspicion that the administration's concession isn't all that it's cracked up to be and, most of all, anger at the president and his surrogates for suggesting that any criticism of their tactics was tantamount to treason.

After the New York Times revealed in December 2005 that the National Security Agency had been eavesdropping on Americans without the court order required by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, the administration insisted that the privacy protections of FISA — about which it had raised no public alarm — had been rendered obsolete by the war on terror.

In the middle of the uproar that followed the disclosure of the program, Bush vowed, "I'll continue to reauthorize this program for so long as our country faces a continuing threat from Al Qaeda and related groups."

The threat remains. But this week Bush said, essentially, "Never mind." As a federal appeals court prepared to hear arguments on the legality of the program, Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee that the administration has determined that it can obtain court orders for surveillance with the "speed and agility" necessary to detect terrorist conspiracies.

"Accordingly," Gonzales deadpanned, "under these circumstances, the president has determined not to reauthorize the Terrorist Surveillance Program when the current [presidential] authorization expires."

A similar "never mind" letter was dispatched to the clerk of the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals, which has agreed to review a federal district judge's finding that the program violated FISA and the Constitution.

The Bush administration is now conceding what this page and many members of Congress have argued for months: The Terrorist Surveillance Program can be conducted consistent with FISA protections. Sens. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Arlen

Specter (R-Pa.) co-sponsored a bill that would reaffirm the authority of FISA while increasing the emergency period in which investigators could conduct electronic surveillance without a court order.

Such legislation can be shelved if the administration truly has seen the light — but has it? Or is it now operating under a sort of FISA Lite?

In a background briefing for reporters, a Justice Department official refused to be pinned down on whether the administration is now asking the FISA court for authorization to monitor each individual suspect or whether there is a broader grant of authority.

This is unacceptable. The agreement by which the FISA court assumed jurisdiction over the program should be shared with Congress and (if it doesn't disclose sensitive operational details) with the public. And there would be nothing mean-spirited about a congressional inquiry into why the administration didn't involve the FISA court when it began this program in 2002.

The public has a right to know in general terms whether and how their privacy is protected by judicial review. Or, as a Justice Department official put it this week, "There's obviously an advantage to having all three branches involved." Too bad that civic books lesson dawned on the administration only after it had demonized its critics for making the same point.

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

The Iraq War has been hurting President Bush's poll ratings for a couple of years now. But keeping him from political free fall is the fact that the United States has suffered no terrorist attacks since 2001, and the widespread belief that White House policy might have something to do with it. So count us baffled by Mr. Bush's surrender Wednesday on warrantless wiretapping authority that even the Carter Administration believed was well within the Constitutional power of the executive branch.

The recent al Qaeda wiretaps at issue provoked little public outrage, after all. Most Americans outside partisan media circles or libertarian think tanks understand what's at stake. Although Congress whined about not getting enough information about the program -- it always does -- it didn't dare try to shut it down either.

But now, and for reasons that seem shortsightedly political, the Justice Department has announced that future domestic surveillance of al Qaeda would be conducted within the confines of a 1978 law called the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. No Administration and no serious court has ever recognized FISA as a binding limit on Presidential authority.

We don't know the details of the deal the Administration says it struck with the special court that grants FISA warrants. But even an eased and expedited process is likely to prove an unnecessary impediment to meeting U.S. intelligence needs. FISA is a Cold War-era law that was written primarily to enable surveillance of suspected Soviet bloc spies operating out of embassies. It is ill-suited to the realities of today's fast moving antiterror battlefield.

In particular, FISA warrants require that the government show that an intended subject of surveillance is an "agent" of a foreign power. Which raises the important question of what happens the next time we pick up an al Qaeda bigwig with a list of U.S. cell phone numbers on him? Are those numbers to go unmonitored because they don't fit FISA's "agent" paradigm and we can't know in advance to whom they're attached? Or what about known individuals who are not al Qaeda "agents" but active sympathizers? Are they out of bounds? The Administration has some explaining to do -- not least to its own officials who spent months saying FISA warrants were dangerously restrictive.

All the more so because the legality of the warrantless wiretaps was not really in question. There is all the difference in the world between wiretaps for criminal surveillance and prosecution and wiretaps for gathering intelligence on our enemies. Just as the President doesn't need a warrant to listen to enemy communications on a foreign battlefield such as Iraq, he doesn't need one simply because one end of an enemy communication happens to take place in the U.S.

That's why Carter Attorney General Griffin Bell made a point of emphasizing when FISA was passed that the law "does not take away the power of the President under the Constitution." And it's why the FISA appeals court itself wrote in 2002 that it and "all the other courts to have decided the issue" believe the President has "inherent authority to conduct warrantless searches to obtain foreign intelligence information."

As for the possibility that Presidents might abuse that power, federal judge Laurence Silberman has argued that fear of exposure is an even stronger disincentive than legal constraint. By contrast, he noted, "there is no self-correcting mechanism" to remedy abuses of power by politically unaccountable judges. This gets to the fundamental problem with FISA, which is that it replaces an elected official with a judge on intelligence gathering matters that may have life or death implications. In other words, it's FISA, not warrantless wiretapping, that is arguably unconstitutional.

The Bush Administration's decision to accede to this Congressional and judicial power grab is all the more shocking given recent history. Remember the 9/11 Commission and all the talk about "the wall"? Well, that intelligence-sharing barrier was a product of executive branch attempts to deal with the demands of the FISA court. It's almost certain this new attempt to operate through FISA will lead to the production of nonsensical guidelines of its own. For the most part we'll never know what valuable information is lost as a result. * * *

The White House may think this FISA concession will allow it to escape more onerous legislative restrictions. But Congress may now merely take this concession and codify it anyway. If Democrats wanted to fight him over wiretapping, Mr. Bush should have relished the prospect given that he had the law and the public on his side. Instead, he's offered to dilute executive powers in a way that will damage the antiterror efforts of his own Administration, as well as those of his successors.

Editorial: TSP, R.I.P.: Bush Surrenders Credibility (MANUL)

Manchester (NH) Union Leader, January 19, 2007

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales would have Americans believe that, after years of asserting that national security depended upon the administration's ability to tap terror suspects' phone lines without waiting for the slow Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to OK the spying, the court suddenly became capable of instantly approving such wiretaps the very same week Democrats took control of Congress.

Is the administration trying to lose its last remaining shreds of credibility?

In a letter to Sens. Patrick Leahy and Arlen Specter, Gonzales asserted that on Jan. 10 a FISA judge issued an order authorizing the government to intercept the international communications of anyone suspected of being "a member or agent of al-Qaida or an associated terrorist organization." As a result, the administration will not renew the Terrorist Surveillance Program, up for reauthorization in a month and a half, which allowed it to intercept the communications of terror suspects without a court warrant.

What about terror suspects who are not members or agents of terrorist organizations associated with al-Qaida? What about the President's constitutional authority, which Gonzales had asserted for so long, to spy on terror suspects without a direct court order?

The administration is backing out of a program and a constitutional argument it previously labeled essential to national security. It is doing so in such a way as to make its previous assertions appear entirely disingenuous.

More than the WMD claims, more than the "Mission Accomplished" banner, more than anything else in the past six years, this change of course undermines the President's credibility and authority. Retreating from a program that until now he has claimed was absolutely essential to stopping terrorist attacks on U.S. soil is either an inexcusable dereliction of duty, or a tacit admission that his previous claim was utter baloney.

Editorial: Spy Reversal: Bush's Welcome Action Is Shaded By Real Doubts (PPG)

Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, January 19, 2007

That sound you don't hear is one hand clapping. The Bush administration has surprisingly reversed itself on its anti-terrorism policy of eavesdropping on Americans without warrants, something that certainly deserves support and praise. But it would be unwise to get carried away.

After all, this is the reversal of a policy that never should have been adopted in the first place. While Americans certainly want their government to root out terrorists and while they understand that tapping phone calls and e-mails to and from the United States may be necessary in some cases, many don't want such surveillance to be done without regard to the law.

This high disdain for legal procedures in the pursuit of warrantless surveillance has been going on for years, and it has been as shocking as it has been unnecessary. The nation lost much on 9/11 and it does not have to junk its traditional civil-liberty protections to achieve security, or so many Americans believe.

Unfortunately, the Bush administration is not among the believers. After the attacks in 2001, the executive branch asserted a theory of executive ascendancy that, in the name of fighting the war on terror, was bolder and more far-reaching than any of its recent predecessors. The presidency has become something of an imperial institution that recognizes no restraints on its power.

The examples are numerous, ranging from the more than 800 presidential signing statements that seek to override the plain intent of legislation passed by Congress to the arrest of a U.S. citizen on American soil and his detention for years without any contact with counsel in flagrant disregard of the Constitution.

The clandestine spying on Americans was all of a piece with this reckless behavior. But a procedure always existed to do legally what the administration was doing extra-legally -- a secret court that oversees the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, and which is empowered to approve wiretaps and searches.

Yet the administration couldn't even abide this formality. Although suggestions were made that the court could not act quickly enough in urgent cases, the administration did not attempt to change the law -- it just blew it off because it felt it could.

Now supposedly an arrangement has been worked out that allows the court to oversee the National Security Agency's spying program "with the speed and agility necessary to protect the nation from al-Qaida," as Attorney General Alberto Gonzales put it. Why this couldn't be done years ago and is happening now is not hard to guess: Congress is in the hands of the Democrats.

The details of the new program are murky and it must be taken on faith that this is progress -- a very big leap of faith indeed, given recent history. The administration, of course, does not concede that it did anything wrong. In other words, use the hand that's not clapping to cross your fingers.

The Justice Department Submits To The Law (OREG)

The Oregonian

The Oregonian, January 19, 2007

The attorney general says the agency won't wiretap without a warrant any longer

A ttorney General Alberto Gonzales on Thursday told members of the Senate Judiciary Committee that, at the Department of Justice, "every day is Sept. 12."

Would that it were so.

That day 64 months ago is worth remembering. It was a day of sorrow. Of mourning. Of unity. Of resolve. It was the day after congressional Republicans and Democrats stood together on the steps of the Capitol and sang "God Bless America."

It was also a day when the laws governing Justice Department activities were still respected. Americans still believed, for example, that the Justice Department still complied with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. It was years before the public would learn that the department had electronically eavesdropped on people suspected of links to terrorism without seeking the legally required approval from a secret federal court.

That seems like a long time ago now. On a Thursday when the committee chairman shouted at Gonzales and the attorney general responded with characteristic dismissiveness, the Justice Department let it be known that it had decided to resume complying with the law that governs wiretapping. Investigators would conduct such surveillance under the authority of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, as critics had demanded, Gonzales said.

Would the Justice Department have belatedly embraced the law if a federal court had not already determined that warrantless wiretapping was unconstitutional? Would it have embraced the law if the nation hadn't turned against the strategy and tactics of the Bush administration's war on terror? Would it have embraced the law if Democrats had not taken control of both houses of Congress?

There's no way to know. But the friction that developed between the White House and Congress -- and between the White House and the majority of the public -- is rooted in the different views each took after the attacks of Sept. 11. Gonzales' predecessor, John Ashcroft, set the tone for the subsequent debate when he spoke to the same committee in December 2001. He told senators, in part: "To those who scare peace-loving people with phantoms of lost liberty; my message is this: Your tactics only aid terrorists."

He was wrong, but those in the White House believed he was right. And that belief justified the administration's end-justifies-the-means approach to stopping terrorism.

Balance is returning to the struggle, it now appears. The Justice Department is acknowledging now that, contrary to earlier assertions, it won't be too burdensome to get approval from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court when it wants to eavesdrop. In fact, Gonzales said Thursday, the program allows "the necessary speed and agility the government needs to protect our nation from the terrorist threat."

The threat is real, as we knew well on Sept. 12. And as we know now, lost liberty is no phantom.

Sense On Intelligence (NSL)

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), January 19, 2007

When a federal judge ruled last summer against President Bush's claim that he had full authority to order wiretaps of Americans' international phone calls and e-mails, he scolded her for not understanding "the nature of the world in which we live."

With his abrupt turnaround on domestic surveillance, the president seems to be starting to acknowledge that he is the one who has been out of touch. The White House has also been forced to back down on its assertion of executive power when it comes to detainees at Guantánamo and CIA secret prisons.

While judicial and legislative pushback has been a necessary corrective to the abuse of presidential authority, it will be impor tant for Congress to move carefully to craft a way forward that allows for appropriate measures for intelligence gathering without inappropriate assaults on civil liberties.

DOJ_NMG_0118819

In advance of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' appearance yesterday in front of the Senate Judiciary Committee, the White House said it will now seek warrants from the court set up by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, to monitor communications to and from anyone thought to be "a member or agent of al Qaeda or an associated terrorist organization."

That's a fine gesture, but it might not be a genuine concession to the need for legislative or judicial oversight. Because the new warrant process is secret, no one knows exactly what kind of deal the Justice Department has made with the FISA court. Justice Department officials haven't explained, for example, how targets will be chosen or said whether the department has agreed to a new set of standards for determining how approval will be given.

Congress will need to press harder to curb the White House's impulses toward secrecy. But Democrats, who are now the majority on the Hill, must be careful not to abridge executive power to the point of crippling the presidency, as Congress did in the wake of the Vietnam War. The Bush administration is not wrong that times of threat can require a president to assert unique authority. One of the many failures of the Bush administration is that it has so abused that authority as to jeopardize it entirely.

Posada Ally Surrenders Arms Cache (MIH)

By Jay Weaver

Miami Herald, January 19, 2007

An ally of Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles turned over a stockpile of illegal machine guns, dynamite and a grenade launcher to federal agents this week in a bid to reduce his prison sentence, several sources familiar with the arms surrender said.

Santiago Alvarez, a wealthy Miami developer convicted last fall on a weapons-conspiracy charge, arranged for the turnover of the new cache of firearms on Wednesday at his attorney's office in downtown Miami, sources said.

Alvarez and convicted co-defendant Osvaldo Mitat are seeking to reduce their respective four- and three-year prison sentences by one or more years. The unusual arms surrender has no connection to Posada's latest troubles with federal authorities.

The Alvarez stash consisted of dozens of machine guns, rifles, C-4 explosive, dynamite, detonators, a grenade launcher and ammunition, sources said. The cache was considerably larger than the nine illegal firearms seized by federal agents in late 2005 when Alvarez and Mitat were first indicted on weapons charges in Broward County.

Agents for the FBI and Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives collected the latest stash of weapons at the Miami law office of Silvia Piñera-Vazquez and Sofia Powell-Cosio. The lawyers were granted temporary immunity to surrender the firearms to federal authorities on behalf of their clients, Alvarez and Mitat. Piñera-Vazquez, who declined to comment for this article, personally delivered a letter to the U.S. attorney's office on Tuesday detailing the proposed weapons turnover.

The voluntary surrender was designed to take the firearms off the street and boost the defendants' chances of reducing their sentences.

Alvarez, 65, has been in federal custody since November 2005, as has Mitat, 64, a handyman who worked for him. To obtain reductions of their sentences, they must prove to prosecutors they have provided enough "substantial assistance." Prosecutors would have to file the request in federal court.

Defense attorneys for Alvarez and Mitat have said their clients never had any designs to carry out an attack against the U.S. government. They say the men's goal was always to topple Cuban leader Fidel Castro.

PIPE BOMB FOUND

The weapons turnover occurred just days after an FBI informant -- who has informed on Posada, Alvarez and Mitat -- reported that he discovered a pipe bomb under his pickup truck in Hialeah on Sunday. Miami-Dade police officers detonated the device at the Hialeah police station. They found wires and gun shells among the bomb scraps. The FBI launched a probe but declined to comment.

Attorneys for Alvarez, Mitat and Posada said their clients -- all in federal custody in Texas -- were not involved in the pipe-bomb incident. They expressed serious doubts about the credibility of the informant, Gilberto Abascal, whom they have characterized as a "double agent" for the FBI and for Castro's government.

Lawyers for Alvarez and Mitat have been negotiating with the U.S. attorney's office since their sentencings in November to turn over the new weapons cache, sources familiar with the case told The Miami Herald.

COMMON THREADS

Intrigue surrounding the weapons surrender could not be greater. Last September, Abascal was the main federal witness who helped convict Alvarez and Mitat on weapons-conspiracy charges in South Florida. Abascal was also the primary witness in last week's federal indictment of former CIA operative Posada on fraud offenses.

A federal grand jury in El Paso, Texas, charged Posada, 78, with lying about how he sneaked into the United States in March 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0118820

The same grand jury also charged Alvarez and Mitat with contempt of court for refusing to testify about Posada's entry into the country. Three other associates have been charged with contempt in the case.

Posada has long maintained that he entered the United States by crossing the Mexican border with the assistance of a migrant smuggler, not by sea -- as prosecutors now allege.

Abascal said Posada entered the country on a shrimping boat called Santrina, which was manned by Alvarez, Mitat and others, including the informant himself. Abascal said the Santrina crew picked up Posada on the Mexican island of Isla Mujeres and transported him to the United States.

By charging Posada, the Justice Department signaled its willingness to target a man who has been in investigators' cross hairs since 1997, when he first was suspected of masterminding a series of deadly tourist-site bombings in Cuba.

Federal agents began zeroing in on Alvarez in May 2005 when he helped Posada emerge from hiding before his arrest for entering the country illegally. That November, Alvarez and Mitat were charged with stashing machine guns, a silencer and a grenade launcher in a Lauderhill apartment complex that belonged to Alvarez.

The defendants' attorneys claimed Abascal, who called federal agents on the way from Broward County to Miami-Dade, set up his former friends.

Although prosecutors never accused the two men of planning to use those firearms in an attack against the Cuban government, they intended to introduce evidence at trial that showed Alvarez had financed a failed 2001 incursion against Castro, among other paramilitary activities. Plea deals came on the eve of trial.

Court records also show that federal and Bahamian authorities recovered a large cache of weapons and explosives hidden on Guinchos Cay in August 2005 -- ``an operation conducted after agents learned that Alvarez was storing and maintaining this arsenal."

U.S. To Store Detainees' DNA (AZREP)

Kyl, Arpaio push collecting from terror suspects, illegal immigrants

WASHINGTON - The Justice Department is planning to add DNA from undocumented immigrants, suspected terrorists and other detainees to the FBI's national crime database, a move pushed by Arizona GOP Sen. Jon Kyl and Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio.

The federal database now only includes the DNA of felons and some misdemeanor offenders. The new plan would add the DNA of individuals who may never be convicted of a crime.

"The (Department of Justice) is engaged in extensive consultation with affected agencies and is moving forward to issue the implementing regulations," department spokesman Erick Ablin confirmed Thursday.

advertisement

Proponents say the move will help to solve more crimes.

Opponents call it a mistake.

"People will end up in this database even without probable cause for their arrest or detention," said Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a public interest group in Washington, D.C.

It could be more than a year before the Justice Department plan is finalized to collect DNA from tens of thousands of immigration violators, terrorism suspects and others accused but not convicted of federal offenses.

A draft proposal is only now circulating internally within the Justice Department and its agencies. The plan also must be sent to other affected agencies outside of the Justice Department, and to the White House Office of Management and Budget. Officials would not release a copy of that draft.

It already has been a year since President Bush signed the bill expanding the federal DNA collection program to include non-U.S. citizens and those arrested or detained. The authorization was included in an amendment sponsored by Kyl to the 2005 reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act. Authorities have been working on legal language and details since then.

Depending on how broadly the final rule is written, it could affect a range of departments and agencies, from the FBI, Homeland Security Department and Drug Enforcement Administration, to the National Park Service.

"Sen. Kyl appreciates that the implementation of the regulations raises a host of complex issues and that it will take time to resolve those issues before the regulations can fully move forward," Kyl spokesman Ryan Patmintra said in a statement this week.

"Given the complexity of these issues, the amount of time that has been devoted to resolving them does not appear unusual," Patmintra said.

Opponents said the expanded program should concern everyone because it could affect everyone.

Someone selected for a secondary screening at an airport is, technically, being detained and could be required to provide a DNA sample, said Tim Sparapani, legislative counsel for the national office of the American Civil Liberties Union.

So could someone selected for inspection while crossing the border, or those detained as material witnesses to a crime.

"All of these situations can have innocent people's DNA entered into the database," Sparapani said.

But Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio, who pushed for the expanded program, said it will be a strong law-enforcement tool.

"I'm all for it - it makes sense - you never know who these guys are," Arpaio said of taking DNA samples from arrestees and detainees and not just those who are convicted felons. "It's about time."

A majority of states, including Arizona, have also been collecting DNA samples from convicted felons. Some have since expanded that to include detainees. But Tim Mason, a spokesman for the Department of Public Safety, said Thursday that DNA is not being obtained from pretrial detainees. The department became the DNA data center for all state enforcement agencies years ago at the request of FBI, and its data is part of the FBI's Combined DNA Index System, known as CODIS.

Law enforcement agencies in Arizona get DNA samples for several reasons, such as:

· Court-ordered samples: Under state law, every felon sentenced to prison must provide DNA.

· Case file evidence: Whenever detectives work cases and find relevant DNA for testing, the sample is entered into the system.

· Miscellaneous: DNA may be entered for various other reasons. For instance, a person is reported missing and family members submit DNA so that, if a corpse is found, investigators will be able to identify the body. Also, if DNA is obtained from a criminal suspect under court order, that specimen goes into the system.

Mason said access to the information is "very controlled" and limited to authorized law enforcement purposes.

When the Senate passed his amendment in October 2005, Kyl noted the technological ability to run crime-scene fingerprints through a national database has become a critical tool for law enforcement.

"We now have the technology to use DNA even more effectively than fingerprints. Failure to take advantage of it would make no sense," Kyl said.

But already, the government has access to more than 3.5 million DNA records, and that the number is expanding dramatically, said Marc Rotenberg, Executive Director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a public interest group in Washington, D.C.

Some also warn that the larger the DNA database gets, the greater the chance of finding two samples that look the same but are not from the same person.

"When you have a database filled with people presumed to be criminal and add people simply for all kinds of non-criminal reasons and mistakes, you've diluted your database and mistakes can be made," Sparapani said.

Roberto Reveles, president of the Phoenix-based immigrant rights group, Somos America, said the DNA database expansion shows that "Big Brother is going really fast." He said the tactic represents a violation of privacy and he hopes conservative Americans will join in "making the loudest protests against this."

Detainee DNA May Be Put In Database (USAT)

By Richard Willing, Usa Today

USA Today, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — The federal government could add DNA from tens of thousands of immigration violators, captives in the war on terrorism and others accused but not convicted of federal offenses to the FBI's crime-fighting database under a plan being finalized by the Justice Department.

Erik Ablin, a Justice Department spokesman, confirmed the plan, which hasn't been publicly disclosed, and said details are expected to be completed soon.

Proponents of the plan, including U.S. Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., and Maricopa County, Ariz., Sheriff Joe Arpaio, say taking DNA from federal detainees would solve many crimes committed by illegal immigrants and make it easier to identify and track potential terrorists.

Opponents, such as Caroline Fredrickson, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington office, say such mass seizures of DNA violate privacy and do little to improve law enforcement.

Fredrickson says the law that defines federal detainees is so broad that it could apply to hikers stopped by park rangers or airline passengers selected for screening. Authorization for taking the DNA was included in a bill reauthorizing the Violence Against Women Act that President Bush signed last year.

The DNA samples, which contain an individual's unique genetic code, would be compared against genetic profiles from 3.9 million criminals and 157,000 unsolved crimes held by the system of federal and state DNA databases that the FBI administers. The FBI says its system has aided more than 41,000 criminal investigations since 1990.

DNA from federal arrestees and detainees would be held on a computer index, enabling law enforcement to track illegal immigrants who return after being expelled from the USA or who commit crimes after being released. War-on-terrorism detainees, who often use aliases, could be positively identified by DNA and linked to evidence seized at suspected terrorist sites.

"We know from real-life examples that a database of arrestees can prevent many future offenses," Kyl said in a statement.

The plan would greatly increase the pool of DNA profiles available to law enforcement. In most states, a person must be convicted of a crime before his DNA is added to the national system, which the FBI calls CODIS. In seven states, DNA can be taken from suspects after they are arrested and formally charged.

The new plan would apply to "any person arrested under federal authority and from any non-U.S. person who is detained," according to the Violence Against Women law. Each year, the greatest number of those are illegal immigrants caught at the border or rounded up after entering the country.

DNA from immigration violators would remain on file permanently. Genetic profiles from people arrested for federal crimes could be removed from the database if they are not convicted.

Law enforcement authorities say illegal immigrants commit crimes out of proportion to their numbers. A Justice Department study of 100 illegal immigrants arrested and released by local authorities in 2004 found that 73 were later rearrested. "To me, it's a no-brainer," Arpaio says. "Regardless of how you feel (about illegal immigration), nobody wants criminals to get a free pass to come in here." Fredrickson says collecting DNA from anyone detained by a federal officer would clog the system to "where it becomes useless."

Pentagon Sets Rules For Detainee Trials (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, January 19, 2007

The Pentagon set rules Thursday for detainee trials that could allow terror suspects to be convicted and perhaps executed using hearsay testimony and coerced statements, setting up a new clash between President Bush and Congress.

The rules are fair, said the Pentagon, which released them in a manual for the expected trials. Democrats controlling Congress said they would hold hearings and revive legislation on the plan, and human rights organizations complained that the regulations would allow evidence that would not be tolerated in civilian or military courtrooms.

According to the 238-page manual, a detainee's lawyer could not reveal classified evidence in the person's defense until the government had a chance to review it. Suspects would be allowed to view summaries of classified evidence, not the material itself.

The new regulations lack some protections used in civilian and military courtrooms, such as against coerced or hearsay evidence. They are intended to track a law passed last fall by Congress restoring Bush's plans to have special military commissions try terror-war prisoners. Those commissions had been struck down earlier in the year by the Supreme Court.

At a Pentagon briefing, Dan Dell'Orto, deputy to the Defense Department's top counsel, said the new rules will "afford all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized people."

In an interview, Brig. Gen. Thomas Hemingway, legal adviser to the Pentagon's office on commissions, said he doubted that most cases would rely solely on coercive or hearsay evidence.

"These case are pretty complex and it's not going to sink or swim, I don't believe, on a single statement," he said.

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said he planned to scrutinize the manual to ensure that it does not "run afoul" of the Constitution.

"No civilized nation permits convictions to rest on coerced evidence, and reliance on such evidence has never been acceptable in military or civilian courts in this country," said Elisa Massimino, Washington director of Human Rights First.

Officials think that with the evidence they have now, they could eventually charge 60 to 80 detainees, said Hemingway said. The Defense Department is currently planning trials for at least 10.

There are almost 400 people suspected of ties to al-Qaida and the Taliban being held at the military's prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. About 380 others have been released since the facility was opened five years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0118823

Last September, Congress — then led by Republicans — sent Bush a new law granting wide latitude in interrogating and detaining captured enemy combatants. The legislation prohibited some abuses of detainees, including mutilation and rape, but granted the president leeway to decide which interrogation techniques were permissible.

In outlining the maximum punishment for various acts, the new manual includes the death penalty for people convicted of spying or taking part in a "conspiracy or joint enterprise" that kills someone. The maximum penalty for aiding the enemy — such as providing ammunition or money — is lifetime imprisonment.

As required by law, the manual prohibits the use of statements obtained through torture and "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment" as prohibited by the Constitution. But it allows some evidence obtained through coercive interrogation techniques if obtained before Dec. 30, 2005, and deemed reliable by a judge.

The Detainee Treatment Act, separate legislation championed in 2005 by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., prohibited the use of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of military and CIA prisoners.

Congress and the White House agreed last year that hearsay — a witness quoting someone else — can be allowed as evidence if a judge rules the testimony is reliable. According to the manual, this is necessary because witnesses — such as military personnel or foreigners — may not be available to testify.

The Pentagon's Dell'Orto said that since both sides of the case can admit hearsay evidence, that "levels the playing field."

Under the rules, the accused will be allowed to know about all evidence that is provided in the trial, Dell'Orto said. They will not be allowed to see classified material, but will be given an unclassified summary or substitute, with the judge first determining whether the summary sufficiently represents the classified material.

"When you're in the middle of a war against this enemy, you need to be particularly concerned about the disclosure of that evidence," Dell'Orto said of classified materials.

Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., said he believes the Pentagon's top lawyers assigned to defend detainees were excluded from the preparation and review of the manual. Last fall, critics of Bush's plan for military commissions charged that the administration ignored the advice of uniformed legal experts.

Dodd, a presidential candidate, said he will introduce a bill addressing flaws in the manual "that are impediments to the effective and credible prosecution of suspected terrorists."

The document was hailed by Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, top Republican on the House Armed Services, who said, "Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind behind the 9/11 attacks, and his cohorts are a step closer to trial."

Pentagon Releases Rules For Trials Of Terrorism Suspects (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

The Defense Department yesterday released its detailed rules for military trials of terrorism suspects, a move that reignited last year's controversy over a joint decision by the Bush administration and the Republican-led Congress to restrict key detainee rights during such trials.

The 238-page manual, issued after a three-month drafting effort, closely tracks the Military Commissions Act, approved mostly by Republicans in September. It incorporates controversial rules blocking a detainee's right to challenge his or her detention and allowing prosecutors to use hearsay information or coerced evidence if a military judge rules that it is reliable and relevant.

The manual is meant to prescribe how military commissions will try some of the roughly 395 prisoners now detained at the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Officials predicted yesterday that 60 to 80 will face the commissions.

Under last year's legislation, the manual's procedures could also be applied to foreign nationals in the United States designated as "enemy combatants" under a controversially broad definition of that term.

In releasing the manual, Daniel J. Dell'Orto, the Pentagon's principal deputy general counsel, disclosed that the new military commissions are to be overseen by Susan J. Crawford, who served in the late 1980s as Army counsel and Defense Department inspector general, under then-Defense Secretary Richard B. Cheney. She is currently a senior judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.

Crawford will have the authority to select judges for the commissions, send charges to trial and act on commission findings or verdicts, Pentagon officials said.

Although Dell'Orto said the manual was drafted to ensure fairness and to hew closely to what Congress ordered, human rights groups and other critics faulted the rules for not fixing what they consider to be defects or loopholes in last year's legislation. The critics said the manual will give new impetus to their drive to get the law amended in the new Congress, controlled by Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0118824

Several such efforts are already underway. Early this month, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and the panel's ranking Republican, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), introduced legislation to overturn last year's narrow vote denying detainees the right to challenge their detention through habeas corpus proceedings.

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) said yesterday that he is drafting a bill with Leahy and Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) to change what Dodd called the manual's unwarranted "limits on the independence of military judges," inadequate safeguards against the use of coerced evidence and limits on defense lawyers' access to witnesses and evidence.

The outcome of this debate will affect the adjudication of allegations against some of the longest-held and most well-known terrorism suspects -- including 14 people transferred to Guantanamo Bay last year from secret CIA prisons.

The Bush administration has sought maximum flexibility in its use of evidence, allowing, for example, the use of information obtained from cruel, unusual or inhumane interrogations before 2005, when many of those in CIA custody were questioned. Human rights groups and many Democrats say, however, that it will mean more to the public if convictions are secured using procedures that fully comply with international legal standards.

Dell'Orto, speaking at a Pentagon news conference, said the new manual enforces a presumption of innocence, includes a requirement that defendants be allowed to see all the evidence used against them, safeguards defendants against self-incrimination and prohibits evidence obtained through torture.

Comments on the new manual were solicited only from the Justice Department and other executive branch agencies, Dell'Orto said yesterday, provoking complaints from several military-justice experts that the rules should have been subjected to a period of public comment. "This was the antithesis of a transparent rulemaking process, and it was completely unnecessary," said Eugene R. Fidell, president of the nonprofit National Institute of Military Justice.

Tom Malinowski, Washington advocacy director for Human Rights Watch, said he faults the manual for not requiring a presiding judge to tell a defendant or his attorney whether critical evidence was obtained from coerced confessions.

Marine Col. Dwight Sullivan, the chief defense counsel of the Pentagon's Office of Military Commissions, similarly said that the rules "would allow an extremely unfair trial" and are a "recipe for laundering" uncorroborated evidence derived from extreme coercion.

Sullivan said they even leave open the possibility of someone being sentenced to death without knowing that he had been convicted based on coerced evidence and without having the chance to contest the evidence on that ground. A Pentagon spokesman, Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey Gordon, said such an outcome is improbable.

Pentagon Revises Its Rules On Prosecution Of Terrorists (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — The Pentagon on Thursday unveiled its new courtroom rules for prosecuting prisoners held as terrorists, allowing military tribunals to consider hearsay evidence and testimony obtained through coercion, but not torture.

Pentagon officials said, however, that the new policy more closely resembled courts-martial governed by the Uniform Code of Military Justice than the previous procedures used to prosecute terrorist suspects.

Under legislation signed into law last year, the government is poised to restart tribunals that the Supreme Court halted last summer. Pentagon officials said military prosecutors had determined there was sufficient evidence to bring war crimes charges against 60 to 80 of the 395 prisoners detained at the military prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

The Pentagon detailed the new procedures in a 238-page manual released Thursday.

The new procedures follow the guidelines Congress set down in the Military Commissions Act late last year.

Representative Ike Skelton, the Missouri Democrat who became chairman of the House Armed Services Committee this month when control of the House changed hands, pledged to scrutinize the new procedures so that they did not “run afoul” of the Constitution.

The new manual explicitly forbids military prosecutors from using evidence obtained through torture. At the same time, it makes a distinction between torture and coercion, allowing testimony that came as the result of coercive techniques used by military and intelligence officials until late 2005, when Congress passed a law banning cruel and inhumane treatment of prisoners.

In order for coerced testimony to be used in military commissions, a military judge would have to determine that it was both reliable and relevant to the case. The matter is particularly important because the Pentagon is planning for the trials of 14 “high value” detainees, who until they were moved to Guantánamo Bay in September were kept elsewhere in secret prisons run by the Central Intelligence Agency.

The prisoners detained at those sites, including Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the accused mastermind of the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, are believed to have been subjected to particularly harsh interrogation methods like "water boarding," which induces a feeling of drowning.

Daniel J. Dell'Orto, the Pentagon's principal deputy general counsel, told reporters on Thursday that the new procedures followed the guidelines of the Military Commissions Act and ensured that detainees receive, as called for by international law, "all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized people."

Pentagon officials said that none of the most significant prisoners would be among the first group to stand trial before the military commissions.

"Those cases are going to have to be developed carefully, and it's going to take some time, because they are extraordinarily complex," said Brig. Gen. Thomas L. Hemingway, a Pentagon official who helped draft the new guidelines.

The Bush administration established the military commissions in the months after the Sept. 11 attacks to prosecute "unlawful combatants" captured during counterterrorism operations around the globe, many of them in Afghanistan.

Last summer, the Supreme Court struck down the commissions as unconstitutional, forcing the White House and Congress to develop new guidelines.

Human rights groups on Thursday criticized the new procedures for straying from the military's traditional rules for courts-martial. Among other things, the rules allow too much leeway for government lawyers to keep defendants from viewing classified evidence, they said.

"Classified sources and methods are protected," said Jennifer Daskal, a lawyer at Human Rights Watch. "This creates the possibility that the defense will not learn the ways in which the evidence was obtained, which could have been through coercive techniques like water boarding and sleep deprivation."

Mr. Dell'Orto said that while defendants would not be allowed to see classified evidence, defense lawyers would be given an unclassified summary of the material.

There are currently 395 detainees held at Guantánamo Bay, but it is likely that only a fraction of those will be prosecuted before military commissions. Even if prisoners are not charged, officials said, the United States still has the right to detain them indefinitely or hand them over to their native governments.

"It doesn't mean that they are not unlawful combatants. It doesn't mean that they shouldn't be detained," said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman.

Besides Mr. Mohammed, according to the government, the former C.I.A. detainees currently at Guantánamo Bay include senior members of Al Qaeda believed to be responsible for the bombing of the United States destroyer Cole in 2000 in Yemen and the 1998 attacks on American embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

The prosecutors for the trials of those men will be a mix of military and civilian lawyers.

Marine Corps Colonel Among Critics Of New Terror Trial Rules (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon's release of new rules for military trials of foreign terror suspects triggered a fresh round of questions and criticism Thursday about the administration's handling of detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The Pentagon's manual for war-crime trials is 238 pages, but much of the talk about it Thursday focused on rules for using evidence: Suspects may be convicted — and even sentenced to death — based on information from coerced confessions and hearsay evidence.

VIDEO: Coerced testimony could be considered

Coerced confessions are not allowed as evidence in traditional civilian courts or military courts martial. Hearsay evidence — testimony from a witness who merely repeats what someone else said out of court — usually is barred from both types of courts.

Those criticizing the manual for lacking traditional safeguards of military trials included Marine Corps Col. Dwight Sullivan, the chief defense lawyer for the military tribunals, or commissions. Human rights groups such as Amnesty International and Democrats such as Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut also expressed concern that the rules unfairly limit defendants' rights.

The new rules follow Congress' passage last October of the Military Commissions Act. The law came after the Supreme Court rejected President Bush's earlier plan to hold military tribunals to try terrorism suspects.

The court said Bush lacked the power to set up such tribunals without Congress' authorization, and declared that the procedures then in place violated the U.S. Military Code of Justice and Geneva Conventions rules aimed at protecting prisoners of war. Bush had established the tribunal system weeks after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, as U.S.-led forces were launching a worldwide hunt for terrorism suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0118826

On Bush's orders, hundreds of suspects have been held indefinitely at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay. Ten detainees were charged under the 2001 system. Some of the trials were underway in 2004 but stalled after a federal judge ruled the tribunal procedures were flawed.

The ruling led to the Supreme Court's decision.

The Pentagon's new plan, says Daniel Dell'Orto, deputy general counsel at the Defense Department, offers suspects "all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized people."

Air Force Brig. Gen. Thomas Hemingway, legal adviser for the commissions, said Thursday he expects the new commissions to begin soon, possibly this spring.

However, it's clear that the system for trying foreign suspects will continue to draw fire. Sullivan said the rules for evidence to be used during the trials could allow a defendant to be convicted and sentenced to death on nothing more than a coerced confession, hearsay evidence or uncorroborated testimony.

"This is extraordinary," said Sullivan, who has raised concerns on behalf of Guantanamo detainees who would be the subject of the first U.S. war crimes trials since World War II.

Dodd cited a "lack of safeguards against coerced evidence being introduced in trial, and the limitations on defense access to witnesses and evidence."

He said he intended to introduce legislation to ensure "credible prosecution of suspected terrorists."

The Pentagon says 395 detainees are now held at Guantanamo. Among the 10 who had been charged before the trials were halted in 2004 was Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a Yemeni accused of serving as a bodyguard for Osama bin Laden and delivering weapons to al-Qaeda. It was his case that prompted the Supreme Court ruling that led to the new tribunal system.

Apology Not Accepted (NYT)

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

It is hard to render a convincing apology when you are not really apologizing. Consider Charles Stimson, the deputy assistant secretary of state for detainee affairs, who has been trying to spin his way out of his loathsome attempt to punish lawyers who represent inmates of the Guantánamo Bay internment camp.

Last week, Mr. Stimson expressed his “shock” that major American law firms would represent terrorism suspects, hinted that they were paid by unsavory characters and suggested that companies should reconsider doing business with them. On Wednesday, Mr. Stimson said he apologized and regretted that his comments “left the impression” that he was attacking the integrity of those lawyers.

It was not just an impression. It was exactly what he did. Mr. Stimson actually read out a list of law firms during an interview with a radio station friendly to the Bush administration.

Mr. Stimson clearly had no regard for his position as a public official who helps set policy on the detainees, never mind the small matter of people’s basic right to representation. He connected the detainees to the 9/11 attacks, even though he certainly knows that the very few detainees who have a connection to 9/11 don’t have legal representation.

President Bush and Defense Secretary Robert Gates should have fired him. Their silence was deafening, although hardly surprising given the administration’s record of trampling on people’s rights in the name of fighting terror. But Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was not silent. In an interview with The Associated Press, Mr. Gonzales actually expanded the attack on lawyers, claiming that it has taken as long as five years to bring detainees to trial because of delays caused by their lawyers.

There’s no truth to that. The cause of the delay in bringing any Guantánamo detainee to trial is Mr. Bush himself. He refused to hold trials at first, then refused to work with Congress on the issue and claimed the power to devise his own slanted court system. Mr. Bush went to Congress only when the Supreme Court struck those courts down. The result was a bill establishing military tribunals for detainees that is a mockery of American justice.

Mr. Stimson’s appalling behavior should not be overlooked by the relevant bar disciplinary committee. Existing rules for lawyers deem it professional misconduct to do things that are prejudicial to the administration of justice. Even if the administration does not, the legal profession imposes a higher duty on those holding public office to obey proper standards of behavior.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Can George Bush Order A Killing On U.S. Soil? (NSWK)

Newsweek, January 19, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118827

Feb. 13, 2006 issue - In the latest twist in the debate over presidential powers, a Justice Department official suggested that in certain circumstances, the president might have the power to order the killing of terrorist suspects inside the United States. Steven Bradbury, acting head of the department's Office of Legal Counsel, went to a closed-door Senate intelligence committee meeting last week to defend President George W. Bush's surveillance program. During the briefing, said administration and Capitol Hill officials (who declined to be identified because the session was private), California Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein asked Bradbury questions about the extent of presidential powers to fight Al Qaeda; could Bush, for instance, order the killing of a Qaeda suspect known to be on U.S. soil? Bradbury replied that he believed Bush could indeed do this, at least in certain circumstances.

Current and former government officials said they could think of several scenarios in which a president might consider ordering the killing of a terror suspect inside the United States. One former official noted that before Flight 93 crashed in Pennsylvania, top administration officials weighed shooting down the aircraft if it got too close to Washington, D.C. What if the president had strong evidence that a Qaeda suspect was holed up with a dirty bomb and was about to attack? University of Chicago law professor Cass Sunstein says the post-9/11 congressional resolution authorizing the use of military force against Al Qaeda empowered the president to kill 9/11 perpetrators, or people who assisted their plot, whether they were overseas or inside the United States. On the other hand, Sunstein says, the president would be on less solid legal ground were he to order the killing of a terror suspect in the United States who was not actively preparing an attack.

A Justice Department official, who asked not to be ID'd because of the sensitive subject, said Bradbury's remarks were made during an "academic discussion" of theoretical contingencies. In real life, the official said, the highest priority of those hunting a terrorist on U.S. soil would be to capture that person alive and interrogate him. At a public intel-committee hearing, Feinstein was told by intel czar John Negroponte and FBI chief Robert Mueller that they were unaware of any case in which a U.S. agency was authorized to kill a Qaeda-linked person on U.S. soil. Tasia Scolinos, a Justice Department spokeswoman, told NEWSWEEK: "Mr. Bradbury's meeting was an informal, off-the-record briefing about the legal analysis behind the president's terrorist-surveillance program. He was not presenting the legal views of the Justice Department on hypothetical scenarios outside of the terrorist-surveillance program."

Chertoff Urges Caution On Threat Reports (AP)

By Beverley Lumpkin, Associated Press Writer

The AP, January 18, 2007

WASHINGTON — Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told newspaper editors Thursday they should use caution and context in reporting about threats or emergencies.

"We owe you information that's accurate," he said, "and you need to resist the temptation to just get something fast."

Chertoff said it's the core function of the media to convey to individuals the information they need to save their lives and their families' lives.

He invited the media to continue to participate in a series of dialogues and exercises his department has been conducting on how best to communicate information during a crisis.

Chertoff pointed out that the department receives "a lot of threat information, every single morning," but that it varies greatly in terms of specificity and credibility.

Even a threat of limited credibility still has to be run down and investigated, Chertoff said, but it shouldn't become public during that stage. If threat information is made public too soon, he warned, there is a danger the public will become either desensitized in a "cry wolf syndrome," or over-sensitized, in a "constant state of hyper-anxiety."

"And perhaps," he added, "we would be accused of deliberately fostering that for political purposes."

Sometimes, he said, when information is shared with state and local officials, department officials are aware that "very likely this information is going to get out." Then the issue is one of context, and he urged editors to use good judgment.

Chertoff mentioned several instances in the recent past in which information "got spiked up" and overplayed on cable TV networks. One was a report about six months ago that an Internet bulletin board had called for a so-called "denial of service" cyber attack on the U.S. banking and financial sector. Chertoff said it took a "fair amount of effort to put it back into perspective."

Another instance was a threat to NFL football stadiums posted on a message board last October. Chertoff said it had been treated by one cable network "as if it was a second September 11."

Much more is at stake, he warned, in reporting on actual emergencies, because people immediately want to know what they should do to protect themselves.

In this regard, Chertoff warned the editors against over-reliance on dubious experts.

"It's been my observation that you can get an expert to tell you anything you want to hear," he said, adding: "We owe you clarity about who's an authoritative source."

Asked about the lessons he learned from Hurricane Katrina, Chertoff said "we have to be very clear."

"I learned that the media if they get information wrong can have a real operational impact."

Terrorism Hoaxes Still Plaguing Law Agencies (USAT)

By Mimi Hall, Usa Today

USA Today, January 19, 2007

The cruise ship Carnival Destiny, packed with passengers on the last leg of a trip to the Bahamas, was chugging Sunday toward the harbor in San Juan, Puerto Rico, when the U.S. Coast Guard got an ominous call.

Someone claimed a bomb was on board.

The Coast Guard ordered the craft to anchor away from the harbor piers so it could be searched. No bomb was found during repeated security sweeps that involved Customs and Border Protection officers, the Puerto Rico Ports Authority, the FBI and teams of bomb-sniffing dogs.

The case — among the most recent of the constant terrorism-related hoaxes and false threats that plague the nation's law enforcement and homeland security agencies — remains under investigation by the FBI.

Five years after 9/11 and the 2001 anthrax attacks caused a spike in false threats, senior federal officials say they still are forced to run down hoaxes nearly every day, creating a huge drain on agents' ability to pursue real threats to the nation's security.

Some hoaxes make national news, such as last October's radioactive "dirty bomb" threat against seven football stadiums. But FBI agents and officials from the Justice and Homeland Security departments say those represent just a fraction of those received by phone, mail and e-mail each year.

At police stations and FBI offices across the country hoaxes are "a serious drain," says Ken Wainstein, head of the Justice Department's National Security Division. "These terror hoaxes distract law enforcement."

They also scare people.

On Thursday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the government doesn't publicize most threats because "people would be in a constant state of hyper-anxiety."

The department posts Internet hoaxes on its website to reassure citizens and encourage them not to pass on bogus e-mailed chain letters. Among those that have been circulating for several years, the website says, is a fake government warning that someone bought $32,000 worth of United Parcel Service (UPS) uniforms off eBay. The fraudulent message urges people to be wary if a UPS employee comes to their door.

In an effort to help prosecutors and deter hoaxes, Congress in 2004 set stiffer penalties, allowing judges to send people to prison for up to five years for making false threats.

Among the cases that have grabbed headlines:

·A phony "dirty bomb" threat against seven football stadiums last October. Grocery store clerk Jake Brahm of Wauwatosa, Wis., was arrested after posting the threat on several Internet sites. The threats "caused a massive mobilization of every resource you can think of," said Michael Drewniak, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office in Newark, N.J.

"You cannot possibly quantify the amount of dollars this cost in manpower and resources all because (someone) decided to scream fire — scream terrorism — in essentially seven football stadiums."

·A false tip called in to San Diego's 911 center days before President Bush's second inauguration in January 2005. Jose Quinonez, a Mexican drug addict and smuggler, said he had smuggled two Iraqis and four Chinese chemists across the border and they were headed for Boston with nuclear material.

The tip prompted a huge response from more than 30 government agencies. Agents conducted a nationwide manhunt, the public was alerted and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney skipped the inauguration and flew home to reassure state residents. In September, Quinonez was sentenced to three years in prison.

"We're on the front lines of keeping this country safe, and when you're distracted by these false threats, it goes right to the heart of our ability to protect the country," says Dan Dzwilewski, head of the San Diego FBI office. He oversees an entire unit within his region's Joint Terrorism Task Force that does nothing but chase down hoaxes and false threats.

·A false tip in October 2005 that six Egyptian men were planning to blow up one of the tunnels that carries traffic under Baltimore's harbor. Officials closed the tunnel, part of a major East Coast interstate, for three hours and raided at least three city businesses run by Arabs.

Police arrested several people on immigration charges during area raids, but the tip turned out to be a hoax called in by an Egyptian man who had been deported from the United States.

Charlie Allen, Homeland Security's top intelligence officer, says hoaxes and bogus tips come in "almost on a daily basis." Allen says he knew right away that the football stadium threat was "absurd." But he says every threat requires a thorough investigation because "you just can't take chances."

Officials say they want stiff penalties imposed on those who make false threats. Allen said the incidents frighten the public, force emergency responders to go on alert, and tie up federal agents and investigators at a time when the nation faces serious threats. "It's a malicious, malevolent act," Allen says, "and a felonious act."

GAO Criticizes Rail Security Assessment (AP)

By Donna De La Cruz

AP, January 19, 2007

Transportation officials have yet to assess the risks of a terror attack on the nation's passenger rail system, congressional investigators said Thursday.

The finding by the Government Accountability Office was disclosed at a Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation hearing on rail security. After the July 2005 London subway bombings, the GAO recommended that the Transportation Security Administration conduct a risk assessment of passenger rail systems. The TSA, formed after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, is responsible for the security of the nation's transportation systems.

Cathleen Berrick, the GAO's director of homeland security and justice issues, told the committee that until the TSA finishes its risk assessment, the agency may not know which rail systems are more at risk than others.

"Given competing priorities and limited homeland security resources, difficult policy decisions have to be made by Congress and the executive branch to prioritize security efforts and direct resources to areas of greatest risk," Berrick said.

TSA Director Edmund S. "Kip" Hawley said the agency is working with a host of other federal agencies and entities to make sure passenger rail systems are safe. TSA's goal is to apply a "common methodology across all transportation systems, regardless of mode," Hawley said.

That includes assessing threat levels, vulnerability and the consequence of an attack, developing baseline security standards as well as enhanced systems of security, he added.

"TSA has a clear strategy to address surface transportation security," Hawley said.

Several committee members were critical of TSA's efforts.

"I'm frustrated with the Bush administration's foot-dragging on measures to secure the nation's rail systems," said Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J. "Terrorists have attacked passenger rail systems in other countries since 9/11, but the lessons of those attacks continue to be ignored by the administration."

The San Jose Mercury News, January 19, 2007

LOS ANGELES - A man seen on videotape spilling a small amount of mercury onto the platform of a subway station was wanted for questioning by police, the FBI and other members of a multi-agency terrorism task force.

There was no evidence to suggest the actions were terrorist or criminal acts, but authorities wanted to ask the unidentified man why he was carrying mercury and what was his motivation for apparently spilling the toxic substance, said FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller.

Video footage showed the man entering the downtown Pershing Square station Dec. 22 and spilling a vial of liquid onto the platform. The man appeared startled and walked to a Metropolitan Transit Authority call box, where he reported the mercury spill, the FBI said.

A Los Angeles County Sheriff's hazardous materials team confirmed the substance was mercury and removed it.

MTA Admits Subway Spill Errors (LAT)

By Andrew Blankstein And Jean Guccione

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

Who is the young man in the sports coat shown on a grainy videotape spilling mercury on a platform of the Red Line subway station at Pershing Square?

When it happened on Dec. 22, officials quickly labeled it a harmless accident.

But Thursday, officials acknowledged that the Los Angeles County Metropolitan Transportation Authority botched its response, waiting eight hours after being told mercury was on the platform before clearing the station and cleaning up the spill.

Police and transit officials said the workers erred by not immediately contacting law enforcement to cordon off the area and calling in hazardous-material experts.

DOJ_NMG_0118830

The incident also exposed the fact that many MTA workers are not trained to handle dangerous materials such as mercury.

Though no one was injured, the incident marked the first time the MTA faced the release of a potentially hazardous substance in the subway system.

Saying that "basic protocols were not followed," MTA chairwoman Gloria Molina on Thursday ordered an immediate investigation into what went wrong.

Several terrorism experts said Thursday that the MTA's handling of the incident was troubling.

"It's unnerving, a wake-up call," said USC professor James Moore, an expert in transportation and a researcher with USC's Terrorism Center.

"The lesson is that no matter how you slice it, the system isn't prepared to respond adequately. We really don't know what caused this failure, but we need to find out."

Since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the MTA has repeatedly touted its beefed-up security measures and increased employee training. But the bulk of the $9 million spent to improve security has focused mostly on preventing a terrorist bombing.

"We deal with suspicious packages, abandoned packages, white powdery substances," said Sheriff's Cmdr. Dan Finkelstein, who oversees security for the transit authority. "This is something that's never happened before."

Finkelstein and others said MTA workers were caught unprepared by the released mercury because it was a scenario they had not dealt with.

"What we need to do is educate all levels throughout our system, whether it's intercom operators or maintenance staff, as well as bus or rail operators," Finkelstein added.

But county Supervisor Zev Yaroslavsky, a member of the MTA board, said workers shouldn't need special training to know that they should call 911 if someone says he dumped mercury in a subway station.

"It's an embarrassment," he said. "Eight hours depending upon the substance ... could have been deadly."

On Thursday, security was increased at the Pershing Square station and on subway trains as federal and local law enforcement sought the public's help — even posting fliers — in locating the man who released the mercury. (The station serves about 122,000 riders a day.)

Finkelstein said the Sheriff's Department also has significantly increased the number of undercover officers riding rail lines in recent days.

Mercury can cause severe health problems if inhaled, ingested or touched. Officials said they believed no one was injured because of exposure to the metal.

Officials with the Joint Terrorism Task Force said there is no evidence to suggest the incident was terrorism, or even a criminal act.

One theory is that the man carrying the mercury used the element in jewelry manufacturing or refrigerator repair.

Video released by the Sheriff's Department on Thursday shows the man crouching on the Pershing Square subway platform before dropping a vial of liquid, possibly spilling it out.

The man jumped to his feet. He searched for and located an MTA intercom, on which officials say he called an operator.

According to law enforcement sources familiar with the investigation, the man told the operator: "I spilled mercury."

It wasn't until eight hours later, at 6:51 a.m. on Dec. 23, that sheriff's deputies were alerted to the spill.

They arrived eight minutes later, closing the station and calling in a hazardous-materials team from the Los Angeles City Fire Department. (Trains had continued running during six of those eight hours.)

Commuters were critical of the MTA's response.

"It seems like they should have sealed the station off before then," said Los Angeles resident Roy Horton, 59, as he waited for the subway Thursday afternoon. "It shows me that they have less concern for the patrons who use the system."

Aaron Trask, a Sherman Oaks resident who regularly rides the Red Line, said the incident has shaken his confidence in the system.

"I am considering not riding until someone can tell us why there was a complete lack of response to this incident," he wrote in an e-mail.

Well before 9/11, subways were considered potential targets for terrorism.

Members of the Aum Supreme Truth cult unleashed sarin nerve gas inside the Tokyo subway in 1995, killing 12 people and sickening thousands of others.

More recently, terrorist bombs killed hundreds in Madrid and London.

After the London attacks, the MTA increased spending on security, including sophisticated cameras able to pan and focus on specific people.

An MTA spokesman declined to provide details of what happened the night of the mercury spill, including whether there was anyone monitoring the videos from Pershing Square.

DOJ_NMG_0118831

But some terrorism experts said high-tech security equipment and even more officers go only so far.

K. Jack Riley, acting director of the RAND Center of Quality Policing, said transit agencies need a good supply of security officials trained to recognize and deal with many contingencies.

"They just have a better idea of what to look for and have been through simulations of different kinds," he said.

Parents Of 9/11 Victims Torn From Grandchildren (NYT)

By Paul Vitello

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

OYSTER BAY, N.Y. — Five years after their father was killed at the World Trade Center, two little girls, ages 7 and 5, sat crying in a car parked at the curb of their grandparents' home here one December day, refusing to go inside for a court-ordered visit. It was a painful family tableau rooted in a hundred tangled details, but one overriding and uncontested reality: 9/11.

Sometime after the death of Peter V. Genco, a Cantor Fitzgerald bond trader, in the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the relationship between the girls' mother and their late father's parents went sour. The grandparents, Barbara and Victor Genco, obtained a court order in 2003 allowing them to see the children — under supervision, and for exactly four hours, once each month. In legal documents, the mother accused her in-laws of abuse and neglect, including drinking in front of them.

And on that Sunday afternoon in December, as described by the grandparents, the girls had apparently had enough of the whole business.

"We had hoped to be a part of their lives and a link to their father," Barbara Genco, 69, said in an interview. "We imagined taking them with us to Europe, to Disney World. But it is too painful to see how the children have changed toward us."

This sad tale is not entirely uncommon among families torn by the terrorist attacks. There is no official registry of such separations. One 9/11 family advocate said he had encountered more than 100 conflicts in which aging parents of a World Trade Center victim, desperate to remain connected to the children of their lost offspring, had found themselves in bitter struggles with a surviving spouse who would rather they did not. A mediator who helped negotiate settlements among 9/11 families in the early years after the attacks said 1 in 10 of his cases involved estranged grandparents.

A few have been to court, where recent laws give grandparents some leverage. Many other grandparents have not. Some have been wise and circumspect in efforts to mend relations with their deceased child's widow or widower. Some have not.

"Sometimes, the spouse is remarried and just doesn't have time for Grandma and Grandpa anymore," said Bill Doyle, who lost his son, Joseph, at the World Trade Center and maintains an e-mail registry of several thousand surviving relatives for the Coalition of 9/11 Families.

"Sometimes, the spouse and the grandparents had differences about whether to bury or cremate the remains, or about where remains should end up," Mr. Doyle added. "Or sometimes, there is money at stake. Or the people just never liked each other and it comes to blows over the kids. It can get so ugly, it's beyond belief."

By most accounts, these situations are the exception. Family advocates and professionals involved in working with 9/11 families, including Kenneth R. Feinberg, head of the Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund, said in interviews that most families had remained on more or less good terms with in-laws, even after remarriages.

One 9/11 widow who recently remarried described her children as having "three sets of grandparents" — her parents, the parents of her husband killed on 9/11, and her new husband's parents. Linda Favuzza, the sister of Bernard D. Favuzza of Suffern, N.Y., a bond trader whose children were grown when he was killed on 9/11, said her brother's widow, Linda, had "welcomed us, reached out to us, done everything she could for my brother's family, especially our mother."

And yet, there is a British woman who has not spoken to her twin grandsons since her son handed them the phone on Sunday, Sept. 9, 2001. A Florida grandmother who said her daughter-in-law called the police the last time she tried to visit. A couple who have seen their grandson in Brooklyn only a few times through a four-year court fight.

For the widows and widowers, the grandparents can be a reminder of their darkest day, kept at a distance to let the children — and themselves — move on. But the older generation often clings to the children, not just as any doting grandparents would, but as their sole connection to the children they lost on 9/11.

"All I had of my son's was his dog, and the dog died last year," said Barbara Krukowski-Rastelli, who has not seen her grandson, now 15, since 2002.

Similar emotional dislocations can affect individuals and their in-laws after any death or divorce, family professionals say. But to the basic fuels of discord, 9/11-specific issues are the accelerants: disputes over the federal compensation money or the remains of the dead, and perhaps the most unmentionable issue, the desire of some surviving spouses to start over.

DOJ_NMG_0118832

Alan Gross, the mediator who said 10 percent of the 9/11 cases he worked on involved grandparents, said most involved "people who had a problem beforehand." Mr. Feinberg said that he did not encounter many such disputes but that when he did, "they could be bitter."

Neither the Gencos' daughter-in-law nor her lawyer responded to repeated requests for interviews. In other cases, parents asked not to be quoted but called their estrangements private matters with unique histories. Some accused their former in-laws of being mentally unstable.

Court documents fill in some of the nasty background. The Gencos' daughter-in-law has accused them of transgressions including striking the children and allowing a dog to frighten them (none of the charges were verified by court-appointed investigators). In another case, a grandfather, also accused of inappropriate behavior, calls his long-term court fight to see his grandson "the secondary trauma of 9/11."

People who have been limited or blocked from contact with their grandchildren describe situations as varied, complex and uncategorizable as the multitude of reasons people cite for getting divorced.

Some, like the Gencos, have been accused of abuse. Some were called overbearing or interfering. Some were accused of seeking money from the Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund at the expense of the spouses and children. Some admit they never got along with their child's spouse.

"Much of this family squabbling had been seething for years, with decades of slights now drawn to the surface by tragedy," Mr. Feinberg wrote in a passage dealing with conflicts — over a different flashpoint of tension, money — in his 2005 book about the victims' fund. "Where did the truth lie?"

Patricia Bingley, 72, the mother of Kevin Dennis, a Cantor Fitzgerald bond trader killed on 9/11, said her daughter-in-law refused to return her phone calls after the attacks. Mrs. Bingley looked into hiring a lawyer but thought she would have little chance of winning visits with her twin grandsons, since she lives outside London and they are in New Jersey, and since she had a fraught relationship with her daughter-in-law predating her son's death.

"On the Sunday before 9/11, Kevin put the boys on the phone with me, and that is the last time I spoke to them," Mrs. Bingley said. "Kevin was my only child. I lost him, and now I've lost my grandchildren."

Mrs. Krukowski-Rastelli, the mother of Firefighter William Edward Krukowski, 36, of Ladder Company 21 in Manhattan, said her son was divorcing at the time of his death. His widow has since remarried.

After Mrs. Krukowski-Rastelli, 65, filed a petition in Queens Family Court seeking visitation rights, a legal guardian appointed on her grandson's behalf interviewed him and recommended the petition be dismissed. They have not seen each other in almost four years.

Under a New York law that gives grandparents certain rights to visitation, grandparents must show that they have a longstanding relationship with the child, and that seeing the child is in the child's best interests. The guardian said Mrs. Krukowski-Rastelli had not established either condition.

Vladimir Gavryushin, 56, the father of a 9/11 victim, Yelena Melnichenko, came to New York from Lithuania after her death to be with his 7-year-old grandson, Eric. During two months in the family's apartment in Brooklyn, Mr. Gavryushin said, his relationship with the boy's father became difficult.

When Mr. Gavryushin and his wife returned to New York for the first anniversary of 9/11, his son-in-law refused to allow them to see Eric, and the Gavryushins sued.

In court documents, Eric's father says that Mr. Gavryushin upset Eric by bringing up conspiracy theories about the 9/11 attacks, tried to stop him from riding a school bus and interfered with efforts to "bring closure" to the child.

Mr. Gavryushin denied all the accusations, and introduced affidavits from 14 neighbors attesting to the positive effect his presence had on young Eric during the grandfather's two-month stay in 2001.

Two judges, forensic psychologists and a legal guardian were involved during a four-year legal fight until, in early January, the grandparents' petition for visitation was denied. Mr. Gavryushin, a professor of physics at the University of Vilnius, said in an e-mail message that the issue was moot. "We lost the child," he wrote. "He permanently was influenced against us. He forgot us. For us, it is the secondary trauma of 9/11."

For Barbara and Victor Genco, the case they initiated in Nassau County Family Court is in its third year of motions and countermotions. In the most recent development, their grandchildren's mother asked for an end to the monthly court-ordered visits. (That December afternoon, the girls were eventually coaxed inside. They are supposed to visit again in January, but the visit has not yet been scheduled.)

"I feel like we're reaching the end of the line," Mrs. Genco said. "But our grandchildren have a right to the love and affection of their father's family. They have a right to be connected to him.

"If we end up unsuccessful in court, that would be terrible for all of us. But at least, when they are older, they will know that we tried."

Nowhere To Turn For Shelter (editorial) (NYT)

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

In the long and sordid story of Hurricane Katrina, a new low may be approaching. In Louisiana alone, tens of thousands of displaced families who rely on the government to provide trailers or rent will lose their temporary housing next month — unless the Bush administration extends the standard 18-month time limit for their federal aid.

A year and a half is a long time for anything that is supposed to be transitional, as the families still trapped in cramped, flimsy trailers can testify. But the temporary help from the Federal Emergency Management Agency cannot end until the victims have somewhere else to go. And the federal and local governments have moved far too slowly in providing the necessary reconstruction money and building guidance. Hurricanes Katrina and Rita destroyed more than 200,000 homes in Louisiana, and only a small fraction have been replaced. (Neither the state nor the New Orleans city government knows how many have been completed.) A sky-high murder rate has dominated the news. The success of the Saints professional football team is not enough of a distraction.

The response to the drowning of New Orleans has been a failure on every level. President Bush's eloquent promise in Jackson Square to rebuild "higher and better" soothed the nation. But since then there has been no concrete action plan for reconstruction — only a patchwork of programs marked by dithering, bickering and bureaucratic finger-pointing throughout. The federal response was, after great delay, largely to cut a check and let overmatched local officials try to sort it out.

The president's Katrina czar, Donald Powell, sees his role as one of a convener, adviser and advocate rather than leader of a domestic Marshall Plan — which is what New Orleans needs. He says that local officials should take the lead. But the local reconstruction plan has yet to materialize. City officials hope that it will be out by the end of the month.

There is some local optimism that when it does arrive there will be a burst of rebuilding effort. Developers are finally beginning to break ground on apartment complexes. The city has issued more than 55,000 residential building permits since the storm, finally moving at a faster rate than before Katrina.

But the time is long past to turn from planning to action. And those in need of shelter today cannot take comfort in housing that won't be ready for another two years. The administration must extend the temporary housing provisions immediately, then make every effort to shift aid recipients to the longer-term Section 8 voucher program.

The new Democratic leaders in Congress also need to recognize that the many failures of Hurricane Katrina are more than just another reason to criticize the president. They need to quickly outline their own plans for salvaging New Orleans, so evacuees can once again call their city home.

That New Orleans remains a shattered city is a sad monument to impotence for the most powerful country in the world. Our grand plans were never laid, our brightest minds were never assembled, our nation's muscle and ingenuity were never brought to bear in any concerted way to overcome the crisis of the Gulf.

WAR NEWS:

House Dems To Support Iraq Resolution (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 19, 2007

Speaker Nancy Pelosi pledged the support of House Democrats Thursday for legislation declaring that President Bush's decision to send additional troops to Iraq is "not in the national interest of the United States."

Pelosi's commitment came as Senate Democrats said they intend to begin advancing a nonbinding measure next week that criticizes the White House's new strategy.

Democrats sought to bring public pressure to bear on the president's new policy as Bush and senior administration officials worked to limit Republican defections.

"He said, 'If you can help us out, I really appreciate your help,'" Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Colo., said after a White House meeting with the commander in chief.

Senate Democrats, backed by two Republicans, unveiled legislation Wednesday that criticized Bush's decision to increase troop levels by 21,500. "It is not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq, particularly by escalating the United States military force presence in Iraq," the nonbinding Senate measure states.

At a news conference, Pelosi read those words aloud approvingly, and said, "That resolution will be supported by Democrats in the House."

At the same time, Pelosi offered no indication that Congress will be able to prevent Bush from carrying out his plan.

DOJ_NMG_0118834

She did not directly address the issue when asked, and Rep. Steny Hoyer, D-Md., the House majority leader, said, "As a practical matter, we know that the president has the constitutional authority ... to increase the troops."

Democratic leaders in both houses have said repeatedly they will not support any attempt to cut off funds for troops who already have been deployed.

Democratic leaders have not said when they intend to seek votes on their legislation, and Senate Republicans have maneuvered successfully to avoid the spectacle of a repudiation of the president before he delivers his annual State of the Union address next Tuesday.

Joseph Biden, the Delaware Democrat who chairs the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said the panel will debate the measure criticizing Bush's troop escalation on Wednesday.

Republicans in both houses are expected to draft alternative legislation, in part to give members of their rank-and-file a measure to support rather than merely oppose what Democrats draft. Officials said one possibility under discussion is an alternative that supports the troop increase as long as the Iraqi government meets certain conditions, although no final decisions have been made.

Whenever the votes occur, administration supporters have expressed fears that the president faces a bipartisan repudiation of significant proportions.

So far, Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine are the only Republicans to announce their backing for the Senate measure. A third lawmaker, Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore., signaled during the day he is giving serious consideration to joining them.

"Senator Smith is opposed to a troop surge," said his spokesman, R.C. Hammond. "He is very open to serious ways that Congress can influence the president's Iraq strategy."

Another Republican critic of Bush's policy, Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota, said: "I don't support the surge in Baghdad, but there are some things in the resolution I don't agree with, and so we're kind of looking at language."

Bush's meeting with lawmakers was his third session in as many days as he struggles to build support for an increase in troops for a war that is opposed by the public and played a role in the Republican setbacks in last fall's elections.

In addition, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley traveled to the Capitol to meet with House Republicans.

Complicating Bush's political predicament is Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who has said in recent days that the United States is not providing enough training and equipment for Iraqi forces.

"He's been constantly asking for an upgrade of troops as well as equipment, and we're providing that," Bush told Belo Corp. television in an interview.

"We may not be providing as quickly as he wants. But nevertheless it's a good sign when the prime minister says just give us the capabilities, and that's precisely what my new strategy and new plan is attempting to do."

Bush defended al-Maliki against skeptics by saying that Iraqi forces now are going after all people "who are fomenting the violence."

Democrats have grown increasing critical of Bush's Iraq policy. "This president has taken the nation through a failed war," said Sen. Robert C. Byrd in remarks on the Senate floor.

Four retired senior U.S. military officers criticized the administration's strategy at a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing.

"It's a fool's errand," said Gen. Barry McCaffrey. "Our allies are leaving us," he said. "Make no mistake about that. Most will be gone by this summer."

Retired Marine Corps Gen. Joseph P. Hoar, said, "The new strategy reflects the inability of the administration to get it right." He said, "The proposed solution to send in more troops won't work. It is far too little and too late."

Hagel, long a critic of the war, said the administration's plans are doomed. "We are in a box, and putting our soldiers and Marines in more of a box and asking them to do things they cannot do," he said.

The committee's senior Republican, Sen. Richard Lugar of Indiana, said the Democratic-inspired legislation was unlikely to have any impact on Bush.

Describing the environment as politically charged, Lugar said, "We risk having reasoned debate descend into simplistic sloganeering."

House To Echo Criticism Of Troop Surge (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

Speaker Nancy Pelosi said yesterday that House Democrats will support a Senate resolution denouncing President Bush's proposal to increase the number of troops in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0118835

"It is not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq, particularly by escalating the U.S. troop presence in Iraq," she said at a press conference yesterday, reading with approval from the nonbinding Senate resolution.

"Introduced in a bipartisan way in the United States Senate, that resolution will be supported in the House by the Democrats," Mrs. Pelosi said. "We do not support the escalation of the war. We do not think it is in our national interest. We will engage the public in that debate."

Mrs. Pelosi has made clear her disdain for the "surge" proposal since before Mr. Bush's prime-time address to the nation last week, but yesterday's remarks were her first indication of the language that she will want the House to approve. The Senate bill was introduced Wednesday.

While the nonbinding resolution will have no concrete impact on the deployment of troops in the Middle East, it is likely to be a startling declaration to Mr. Bush, U.S. forces and the rest of the world that the commander in chief is operating without the support of either chamber of Congress.

Sen. Olympia J. Snowe of Maine, one of the Senate resolution's two Republican co-sponsors, said yesterday that even the symbolic power of a nonbinding resolution "should not be underestimated."

Passing both chambers "would speak loud and clear to the American people and to the president. A president can't sustain a military conflict without the support either of Congress as well as the American people, and that's what the president is up against," she told MSNBC.

During the past week, congressional opposition to Mr. Bush's war policy has made headlines around the world.

"Senators oppose Bush's Iraq plan" said Al Jazeera's Web site yesterday. The story quoted Sen. Chuck Hagel, Nebraska Republican and a co-author of the Senate resolution, saying: "I will do everything I can to stop the president's policy as he outlined it on Wednesday night. I think it is dangerously irresponsible."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat and chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said his panel will start debate on the resolution on Wednesday. It was not clear last night when there would be a floor vote in either chamber.

During yesterday's press conference, Mrs. Pelosi said she expects the legislation to garner bipartisan support in the House.

Some liberal Democrats want more. Earlier this week, Rep. Lynn Woolsey, California Democrat, introduced a bill that would require all U.S. troops to leave Iraq within six months and cut off funding if they do not. The bill has 17 co-sponsors, although none are party leaders.

Relegated to the sidelines in Congress after the November elections largely because of their support of the war, Republicans held a week of "listening sessions" to search for a war platform they could unite on.

"We have learned from our discussions that while differences of opinion do exist in the Conference, commonality also exists. What unites us is far stronger than what divides us," Republican Conference Chairman Adam H. Putnam of Florida wrote in a letter yesterday to colleagues. "As Democrats continue to debate over which course of cut-and-run they should support, House Republicans are categorically united behind four guiding principles."

Included in their list of principles is that "there is only one commander in chief," "failure in Iraq is not an option," and "we are opposed to cutting off funding for our troops."

And, after years of complaints from Democrats over lackadaisical oversight of the war, Republicans yesterday declared, "Congress has a constitutional right and obligation to exercise oversight."

Whither All The War Protesters? (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, January 19, 2007

from the January 19, 2007 edition - http://www.csmonitor.com/2007/0119/p01s03-ussc.html Whither all the war protesters? As the Iraq war heads toward 'surge,' the antiwar movement, now mostly online, nears a crucial moment.

By Brad Knickerbocker | Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

On a beach in US House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's San Francisco district the other day, about 1,000 war protesters formed up to spell out the word "IMPEACH." The aerial photo quickly spread to China and Europe.

Still, there were no political harangues, no civil disobedience. The quiet turnout was mostly "old hippies, and even older hippies," jokes event organizer Brad Newsham.

In Boston, a peaceful rally to protest the planned "surge" in US troops drew no more than a few hundred people.

Nearly four years into US combat in Iraq, the antiwar movement has yet to generate the kind of mass protest seen during the Vietnam War. There's no shutting down universities or blocking traffic at military bases – no tense face-offs with police.

DOJ_NMG_0118836

But with the new Congress, the Bush administration's surge strategy (which critics deem an "escalation" of the conflict), and increasingly negative public opinion polls on the war, this may be a critical moment for the antiwar movement.

Now, it is organizing and most active in cyberspace. And while that "public space" is not as visible as the town square and university grounds nearly four decades ago, it no doubt feeds the growing public opposition to the Iraq war. (Seventy percent of Americans oppose sending more troops to Iraq, according to an Associated Press-Ipsos poll last week.)

One key reason that opposition to the war has been less overt, organizers recognize, is the lack of a military draft. Also, the scale of the war is different. There were four times as many troops involved and 10 times as many American casualties over a comparable period in Vietnam.

Third, only a handful of Americans are directly affected by the war or asked to sacrifice for it.

For many, "it feels removed," says Tressa Jones of Needham, Mass., who joined the recent rally in Boston. "It's easy to forget because there hasn't been a draft. It's not wartime in the way we are living.... People aren't collecting scrap metal or growing victory gardens."

Yet scholars of recent controversial wars say that though the Iraq War is far different from Vietnam in many ways, opposition, in fact, developed much sooner.

"Protests against the Iraq war, throughout, have been at a far higher level than they were with regard to Vietnam at comparable stages of the invasions," says Noam Chomsky, the MIT linguist who was an early critic of US involvement in Southeast Asia and often opposes US foreign policy in general.

"It wasn't until late 1967, five years after [President John F. Kennedy's] outright invasion, that a substantial movement became visible – and even then, and in fact until the end, it was mostly focused on the bombing of the North," Dr. Chomsky said in an e-mail. "It's hard to know how to measure effects – we don't have internal records, as in the case of Vietnam – but they have at least kept it visible enough so that most of the population has been in favor of withdrawal."

The Web played an important part in defeating war supporters in Congress last November, which in turn led to the current Democratic majority there.

One significant development: Thanks to e-mail and the Internet being available to most troops in Iraq and their families back home, the war can be very immediate to many Americans. That keeps many fighting men and women more politically aware and engaged than in past wars.

As a result, more American troops now disapprove of President Bush's handling of the war than approve of it, according to a recent Military Times poll.

"When the military was feeling most optimistic about the war – in 2004 – 83 percent of poll respondents thought success in Iraq was likely," Military Times reports. Now, " that number has shrunk to 50 percent. Only 35 percent of the military members polled this year said they approve of the way Bush is handling the war, and 42 percent said they disapprove."

At the same time, according to the poll, the number of military respondents who identify with the Republican Party has dropped from 60 percent in 2004 to 46 percent today.

On Tuesday, two active duty servicemen – Navy Petty Officer Jonathan Hutto and Marine Corps Sergeant Liam Madden, who served in two tours in Iraq – presented to Congress more than 1,000 signatures from active duty and Reserve troops in support of "the prompt withdrawal of all American military forces and bases from Iraq." The day before, about a dozen of those troops held a press conference at a Unitarian Church in Norfolk, Va., to voice their opposition to the war.

Those are relatively small numbers compared with the 140,000 US troops currently in Iraq. But it's the kind of act that gets public and political notice. And it echoes 1969, when 1,366 active duty troops signed a full-page ad in The New York Times opposing the war in Vietnam.

Around the country next week, Veterans for Peace will launch an antiwar effort based on a constitutional argument. Organizers will target Democratic lawmakers – especially those in leadership positions like House Speaker Pelosi.

"The Constitution is being violated," says Vietnam veteran Lee Thorn of San Francisco, referring to allegations that the US has tortured prisoners as well as what he calls infringements of civil liberties. "It's our duty as those who've taken an oath to defend the Constitution to continue."

Later in the week, a large "mobilization" of antiwar groups is planned in Washington.

In Baghdad, Pressing To Meet, With Iraqi Help, Pentagon's Own Standard For Force Levels (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — When Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus assumes his duties as the new American commander in Iraq, he will be guided by a new military doctrine on counterinsurgency that makes the security of the population a chief objective.

DOJ_NMG_0118837

But a pressing question that is likely to emerge when the Senate takes up his confirmation next week is whether the administration's new Iraq strategy will draw on enough forces to ensure security — as measured against the general's own guidelines.

The additional five combat brigades that would be sent to Baghdad under President Bush's strategy would roughly double the size of the American force involved in the security operation there, about 15,000 troops. But as a whole, that would still represent only a small portion of the 120,000-strong force that would be required to secure the entire capital according to the force ratios outlined in the military's new field manual for counterinsurgency, which General Petraeus helped to draft.

Interviews with military officers suggest that the Bush administration can come close to meeting the manual's guidelines by relying heavily on the efforts of Iraqi security forces and concentrating the effort on key neighborhoods. But this means that the strategy will depend greatly on the performance of Iraqi forces, including police units that have often been criticized as ineffectual or under the influence of Shiite militias.

The debate over the administration's Iraq strategy involves much more than troop levels. Some who criticize the plan, like Joseph P. Hoar, a retired Marine general and former head of the Central Command, have argued that it would be foolish to consider sending additional forces until Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki follows through on his program of political reconciliation and reins in the Shiite militias.

"My view is that the Maliki government is ill-equipped to make the needed political changes that might allow the efficacious use of extra troops," General Hoar said.

But the Bush administration has argued that it is not be possible for the Iraqis to take the needed political steps until security is improved, and, in any event, Congress is unlikely to block the deployment of additional forces. So an important question is whether there will be enough troops on hand for the strategy to work.

The goals in counterinsurgency are to protect the population, deprive the insurgents of sanctuary and generally maintain order over a broad area, making it a "manpower-intensive" approach, according to the counterinsurgency manual.

While noting that cases can vary, the manual stipulates a rough rule for determining how many troops are needed: one "counterinsurgent," which could be an American or a soldier or policeman from the "host nation," for every 50 inhabitants. With an estimated population of around six million, Baghdad would require a force of some 120,000 under those guidelines.

A study by John J. McGrath, published last year by the Army's Combat Studies Institute at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., noted that some counterinsurgency campaigns and postwar stability operations had succeeded when the American force level had fallen short of this standard, including the American counterinsurgency effort in the Philippines from 1899 to 1901. Even so, securing Baghdad is an especially challenging mission given the sectarian passions, multiple militias, determined insurgents, high level of crime and weak central government.

The five additional American combat brigades that are to be sent to Baghdad under Mr. Bush's plan would enable the United States to change the nature of its operations in the capital by maintaining a regular presence in some key neighborhoods. Even with the American reinforcements, the numbers show that the effort would require a stepped-up effort by the Iraqis.

Adding the five brigades, at roughly 3,500 soldiers each, would bring the American contribution in Baghdad to about 33,000. Expanding the Iraqi Army in Baghdad by three more brigades would push the number of Iraqi soldiers to around 15,000. American officials say that there are an additional 3,000 American and Iraqi Special Operations forces in the Baghdad area who will be part of the effort. In addition, there are 13,000 Iraqi National Police officers and 22,000 local Iraqi police officers. That would bring the total number of American troops and Iraqi soldiers and policemen to about 86,000 in the capital.

American officials say that the pervasive use of separate ministry security forces and the use of contractors to protect government buildings also needs to be factored into the equation. There are thousands of such personnel, though specific numbers are hard to come by.

According to the military's plan, the forces would also not be distributed evenly across the city but would instead be concentrated in specific sectors. Other American capabilities, like intelligence gathering, would also be enhanced in ways that are not readily quantifiable by the deployment of the additional brigades, military officials say.

Further, military officials said that the strategy should not be considered as purely a numbers game. American commanders are considering a number of steps that would help improve security, including limiting access to specific neighborhoods and establishing "no-drive areas" and weapons-free zones.

Improving the performance of the Iraqis is also an important element of the new strategy. The decision to deploy one or more American battalions with Iraqi Army and police units in each of the nine city sectors that are to be established under the plan is intended to establish the kind of partnership that will improve their performance.

A military officer involved in Iraq war planning said that given the complexity of securing Baghdad he could not say with precision how many forces would be needed to tamp down violence in the city. But the officer said he was convinced that the increase would make an important difference.

But Kalev Sepp, an assistant professor at the Naval Postgraduate School and a former Army Special Forces officer, expressed concern that the effort might be shorthanded.

“Even accounting for the idea of concentrating forces in specific neighborhoods, you still have to account for the possibility that violence will shift to other neighborhoods,” he said. “So there is something to the arithmetic that 120,000 security personnel are required. And beyond that there are the issues of quality and political reliability, particularly with the police, in trying to achieve security in the capital.”

Military Planners In Iraq May Soon Be Seeing 'Red' (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

FT. LEAVENWORTH, KAN. — While the Bush administration is reworking its overall strategy in Iraq, military leaders in Baghdad are searching for new ways to improve the decisions and choices they make closer to the ground.

The U.S. military has sent to Iraq a five-person team of dedicated skeptics, known in military jargon as a "red team." In a war known for its missteps and unanticipated results, the team will be assigned to review, and question, military operations. It will attempt to predict how enemies will react to various missions and what the unintended consequences might be.

Such teams have been used on an ad-hoc basis to critique specific battle plans. But this team is the first to work full time as devil's advocates, and is the first headed by officers trained as designated skeptics by Ft. Leavenworth's University of Foreign Military and Cultural Studies.

Red teams try to predict how the enemy, known as "red" in military-speak, will react to an American operation.

"A red team is trying to get into the enemy's head," said Gregory Fontenot, director of the Ft. Leavenworth program. "What is the other side liable to do and how are they thinking about the problem?"

In Senate testimony last week, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said a red team had been assigned to examine President Bush's new Iraq security plan "from the enemy's viewpoint." Bush plans to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq, although the increase and new strategy are not expected to be fully in place for several months as the Pentagon routes units into battle.

But red teams go beyond predicting how the insurgency might react.

Team members are trained to think differently from other officers in military planning sessions, said Steven Rotkoff, one of the instructors at Ft. Leavenworth who helped create the course curriculum. Since red team officers are outside the normal staff planning process, they theoretically can look more objectively at it.

"It is very hard to tell someone your baby is ugly and they don't dress them properly," Rotkoff said. "The red team members are valued by their commanders because they do not participate in group-think."

The military's strict hierarchy allows for quick decision making. But it also can prevent insights farther down the pecking order from receiving a fair hearing. With a red team in place, someone is always taking a skeptical look at the commander's ideas, Rotkoff said.

"We struggle with getting out of the comfort zone. To do what we are asking people to do is an unnatural act for the American military," Rotkoff said.

In Iraq, the new red team has begun working for Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, who recently became commander of day-to-day military operations there. The team may also get a higher profile with the arrival of Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, named the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

Petraeus, a supporter of such devil's-advocate approaches, pushed for more creative thinking while heading up key Army training programs at Ft. Leavenworth. Lt. Col. Jeff Ragland, Odierno's red team leader, said that although top officers and junior staff members are intrigued by the new group's mission, some mid-level colonels in Baghdad "seem to be less excited about our existence."

If a team's job is to argue against a particular plan, it becomes easy for other officers to dismiss its suggestions.

As a result, the red team course at Ft. Leavenworth includes instruction on how to criticize without being ignored. And in the field, Ragland's team is trying to figure out how to sugarcoat skepticism.

"At virtually every instance, we have had to present our ideas in an acceptable way, not with the 'sharp stick in the eye' approach," Ragland said.

The course examines conflicts such as the Philippine insurrection in 1899 and the post-World War II occupation of Japan.

The course covers Western and non-Western military theory and teaches anthropology so future red team members can better study other cultures.

In Iraq, for instance, it is the red team's job to think like Iraqis and figure out what might offend them.

DOJ_NMG_0118839

"We are not going to make [red team members] anthropologists; we are going to make them understand how ethnocentric they are," Fontenot said. "As soon as you assume the other guy thinks like we do, you are making a mistake."

Military organizations, Fontenot said, are not always good at predicting the after-effects of an operation. Traditionally, no staff officers are specifically assigned to think about long-term consequences.

Among military staffers, there is a tendency to become wedded to a plan and reflexively defend it, rather than critique it from a distance, said Lt. Col. Mark B. Elfendahl, a student in the red team course.

Though the focus of many red teams is to predict an enemy force's reactions, in Iraq it will be just as important to predict how allies might react to a given operation.

Ragland, the red team leader in Iraq, said other staff officers have the ability to critically assess a plan, but they often do not have the time to do so.

"Red teams are a direct, and necessary, response to the current operations tempo," Ragland said, adding that because team members are not invested in military plans, "we have the latitude regarding time and the charter to take this critical look."

At Ft. Leavenworth, Fontenot wants to spread critical thinking throughout the Army.

In the long term, the University of Foreign Military and Cultural Studies aims to influence how all officers think and plan.

For now, Fontenot says he is watching how the red team works in Iraq, and is adjusting the course based on feedback from the field.

"We will have to see how it goes in Iraq," he said. "I know we are doing the right thing. I don't know if we are doing it the right way."

Sunni Allies Give 'qualified Support' For Bush's Iraq Strategy (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, January 19, 2007

When Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, flew out of the Middle East on Wednesday after a tour of the region to mobilise support for the White House's controversial new Iraq strategy, Arab diplomats were left hoping, rather than expecting, that it might actually achieve something.

Two of the US's most important Sunni allies in the region – Egypt and Saudi Arabia – gave cautious backing to the initiative, while a third, Jordan, reiterated the need for Iraq's Sunni to be given a greater role in their country's political processes.

But the "support" also came with a clear message to Ms Rice in the hope that Washington may finally be ready to listen to its Arab allies – a military solution alone is not enough.

Sunni Arab states have a deep mistrust of Iraq's Shia-dominated regime and are sceptical about its willingness to tackle key issues - including disarming Shia militias and reaching out to Sunni - which they argue are crucial to the country's future.

Saud al-Feisal, the Saudi foreign minister, said while other countries could help, the main responsibility "rests on the Iraqis". Kuwait stressed the importance of Washington attempting dialogue with Syria and Iran, which was recommended by the Iraq Study Group, but rejected by the White House.

Still, given the dire situation in Iraq, as well as concerns about Shia Iran's growing influence in the region, Arab diplomats also accepted they had little option but to give the US strategy "qualified support".

They had already argued against an abrupt US withdrawal, fearing the Iraqi violence would destabilise the entire region, and the core of the plan is the deployment of an additional 21,500 American troops.

"We all feel that we are in the same boat so if America fails it is not our success," Hesham Youssef, a senior official at the Arab League told the FT. "If we do not address all the issues we will fail because even if you put an extra 20,000 soldiers on the streets today, and people do not see a political horizon, then it [may well] be making it more difficult for the insurgents and those advocating violence, but [it will] not deal with the root causes of the conflict."

When Amr Moussa, the league's secretary-general, met Ms Rice in Egypt he told her there were five fundamental points that needed addressing – ensuring the territorial integrity of Iraq; reconciliation; working with Iraqis on a basis of citizenship rather than as Shia, Sunni or Kurd; dealing with the militias; and political issues, including amendments to the constitution to give Sunnis – marginalised since the fall of Saddam Hussein - a greater role.

According to Mr Youssef, Mr Moussa's chief of cabinet, Ms Rice agreed the issues would receive the US's attention. Asked whether Washington would take note, he said: " We hope they will follow these elements with vigour. It's more than hope, it's an expectation."

Another Arab diplomat said Ms Rice accepted the fact that military action alone would not halt the bitter sectarian conflict. However, he said there was caution about whether the words would be translated into action.

A Plausible Plan B (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0118840

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

If we were allied with an Iraqi government that, however weak, was truly national -- cross-confessional and dedicated to fighting a two-front war against Baathist insurgents and Shiite militias -- a surge of American troops, together with a change of counterinsurgency strategy, would have a good chance of succeeding. Unfortunately, the Iraqi political process has given us Nouri al-Maliki and his Shiite coalition.

Its beginning was inauspicious. Months of wrangling produced a coalition of the three major Shiite religious parties, including that of Moqtada al-Sadr. Given Maliki's legitimacy as the first democratically elected leader of Iraq, however, he was owed a grace period of, say, six months to show whether he could indeed act as a national leader.

By November, his six months were up, and the verdict was clear: He could not. His government is hopelessly sectarian. It protects Sadr, as we saw dramatically when Maliki ordered the lifting of U.S. barricades set up around Sadr City in search of a notorious death squad leader. It is enmeshed with Iran, as we saw when Maliki's government forced us to release Iranian agents found in the compound of one of his coalition partners.

The hanging of Saddam Hussein did not change anything, but it did illuminate the deeply sectarian nature of this government. If it were my choice, I would not "surge" American troops in defense of such a government. I would not trust it to deliver on its promises. Lt. Gen. David Petraeus thinks otherwise. Petraeus, who will be leading our forces in Iraq, has not only served 2 1/2 years there but has also literally written the book on counterinsurgency. He believes that with an augmentation of U.S. troops, a change of tactics and the support of three additional Iraqi brigades, he can pacify Baghdad.

Petraeus wants to change the U.S. counterinsurgency strategy, at least in Baghdad, from simply hunting terrorists to securing neighborhoods. In other words, from search-and-destroy to stay-and-protect. He thinks that he can do this with only a modest increase of five American brigades.

I am confident that Petraeus knows what he's doing and that U.S. troops will acquit themselves admirably. I'm afraid the effort will fail, however, because the Maliki government will undermine it.

The administration view -- its hope -- is that, whatever Maliki's instincts, he can be forced to act in good faith by the prospect of the calamity that will befall him if he lets us down and we carry out our threat to leave. The problem with this logic is that it is contradicted by the president's simultaneous pledge not to leave "before the job is done."

In this high-stakes game of chess, what is missing is some intermediate move on our part -- some Plan B that Maliki believes Bush might actually carry out -- the threat of which will induce him to fully support us in this battle for Baghdad. He won't believe the Bush threat to abandon Iraq. He will believe a U.S. threat of an intermediate redeployment within Iraq that might prove fatal to him but not necessarily to the U.S. interest there.

We need to define that intermediate strategy. Right now there are only three policies on the table: (1) the surge, which a majority of Congress opposes, (2) the status quo, which everybody opposes, and (3) the abandonment of Iraq, which appears to be the default Democratic alternative.

What is missing is a fourth alternative, both as a threat to Maliki and as an actual fallback if the surge fails. The Pentagon should be working on a sustainable Plan B whose major element would be not so much a drawdown of troops as a drawdown of risk to our troops. If we had zero American casualties a day, there would be as little need to withdraw from Iraq as there is to withdraw from the Balkans.

We need to find a redeployment strategy that maintains as much latent American strength as possible, but with minimal exposure. We say to Maliki: Let us down, and we dismantle the Green Zone, leave Baghdad and let you fend for yourself; we keep the airport and certain strategic bases in the area; we redeploy most of our forces to Kurdistan; we maintain a significant presence in Anbar province, where we are having success in our one-front war against al-Qaeda and the Baathists. Then we watch. You can have your Baghdad civil war without us. We will be around to pick up the pieces as best we can.

This is not a great option, but fallbacks never are. It does have the virtue of being better than all the others, if the surge fails. It has the additional virtue of increasing the chances that the surge will succeed.

Tell The Troops (NYT)

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

It is bad enough for troops in Iraq to learn that their tours of duty have been extended. It is terrible for them to have to hear about it from loved ones at home rather than from their military commanders.

This is what happened to about 150 New Jersey National Guard troops who had been scheduled to return home in March after having served in Iraq for a year. Their tours of duty were extended for up to 125 days as a result of President Bush's decision to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0118841

A day after Mr. Bush announced the troop increase in a televised speech, the National Guard in New Jersey told family members that their relatives would have to stay on. The news quickly made it back to the troops in Iraq through anguished phone calls and e-mail.

Not until Sunday — four days after Mr. Bush's speech — were the troops notified by their Army commanders, after Gov. Jon Corzine of New Jersey made two phone calls to Army officials.

Mr. Corzine, who had learned of the lapse from outraged family members, said that Pentagon officials expressed regret and blamed the delay on a "breakdown in the chain of command on the ground in Iraq." The governor rightly called what happened "unacceptable."

But given all that has gone wrong with the misguided American adventure in Iraq, the foul-up is hardly surprising. It's one more sensitive issue that has been insensitively and unfairly mishandled.

Never Miss An Appointment, Or An At-Large Terrorist, Again (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Tired of all the cuddly baby polar bears, redwoods, waterfalls and other standard glossy photos on those daily planners you got for Christmas? Want a little something different to jump-start your day?

Then how about having your morning java looking at mug shots of Osama bin Laden and other wanted terrorists and learning how to recognize whether that muscle weakness is from yesterday's workout or perhaps botulism poisoning.

Yes, it's the National Counterterrorism Center's 2007 daily planner, "the largest since the calendar first appeared in a daily planner format in 2003," the introduction says.

No. 1 terrorist bin Laden -- with a $27 million reward "for information leading directly to" his being taken out of business -- is of course still there.

In fact, pretty much all the most-wanted folks are still there, year after year, including Faker Ben Abdelaziz Boussora, still with the $5 million reward offer, still with those "prominently protruding ears and . . . believed to have a serious pituitary gland illness."

A notable exception is Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, killed in a U.S. airstrike on June 7. But "despite the turnover in leadership," the calendar notes in an excellent turn of phrase, "as of October 2006 [al-Qaeda in Iraq] had claimed over 5,000 attacks . . . with no evidence of a change in strategy or tactics." And there are reports that Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, wanted for the bombings of U.S. embassies in Africa in 1998, may have been taken out in recent U.S. airstrikes in Somalia.

Osama is still listed as living in Pakistan, maintaining his trim 160-pound figure. His deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, is still hanging out in Afghanistan. And Mullah Omar, who seems to be giving e-mail interviews to journalists these days, insists that he is in Afghanistan, but the Afghans claim he's on the lam in Pakistan.

The NCTC is a great planning guide. Those who have it, for example, know there's a big three-day weekend coming up to celebrate Feb. 3, 2000, which is when "Syria and Sudan sign agreement on fighting terrorism in compliance with Arab Antiterrorism Convention" and the landmark Feb. 5, 2001, accord signed by Algeria and France "to cooperate in fighting terrorism." So you can take that Monday off.

The beautiful calendar "is designed for anyone concerned with terrorism or threat: law enforcement, intelligence, military, security personnel, contingency planners, or simply citizens concerned by terrorist threats," the introduction says.

But the public can get only the electronic version. That's at http://www.nctc.gov. You can download it even in northwestern Pakistan.

It's available to others at undisclosed locations.

A Softer Hard Line on Nukes

Meanwhile, the buzz, amongst those who know where those locations are, is that Kenneth C. Brill, a career diplomat who has been in the director of national intelligence's office as the director of the National Counterproliferation Center, is rejoining his pal, Deputy Secretary of State-designate John Negroponte.

Brill is said to be the likely pick to replace the outgoing undersecretary for arms control and international security, Robert Joseph. The move is seen as a potentially huge change on nonproliferation stances, focusing more on diplomacy and less on confrontation. Brill frequently crossed swords with Bush administration harder-liners on policies toward North Korea and Iraq.Confirm Two, Get One Free

Rumblings on the Senate side are that Gen. George Casey's confirmation as Army chief of staff is going to be a tough sell, especially with the Democrats in charge. And it's not just the Democrats that need to be sold. Even some Armed Services Committee Republicans are uneasy about this one.

"Gee whiz, the chief of staff of the Army is the guy everybody looks up to," Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) told our colleague Tom Ricks. "We were under Casey's leadership over there for the last three years," the senator said, referring to Iraq, "and it hasn't gone well." Chambliss said that he hasn't made up his mind whether to support the nomination.

There's even talk that the administration is concerned Casey is unconfirmable with the Senate in the mood it's in. So the White House may try to move Casey's nomination and that of Adm. William J. Fallon to head Centcom as a package along with the nomination of highly regarded Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to lead U.S. forces in Iraq.

The Wisdom of Lisa Simpson

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice didn't seem to be trying to make much news on her swing this week through the Middle East. Still, she offered an interesting take on what she called "a challenging time" in the region, our colleague Glenn Kessler reported.

"I don't read Chinese, but I am told that the Chinese character for crisis is weiji, which means both danger and opportunity," Rice pontificated on Tuesday. "And I think that states it very well. We'll try to maximize the opportunity."

Rice did not say where she learned this aphorism, but oddly enough it was once featured on "The Simpsons," as this excerpt from an episode shows:

Lisa: "Look on the bright side, Dad. Did you know that the Chinese use the same word for 'crisis' as they do for 'opportunity'?"

Homer: "Yes! Cris-atunity."

Chinese scholars actually dispute that oft-cited interpretation of the word.

In any event, echoing Lisa Simpson on the Middle East or on the Chinese language may not be a great idea.Dedicated Strictly to House Members

Correction: Contrary to an item in Wednesday's column, we're told that the Senate version of the new congressional ethics legislation does include a provision that would at least require lobbyists to disclose contributions to building funds and other programs promoted by members of Congress.

Mahdi Army Expressing Siege Mentality (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, January 19, 2007

Mahdi Army fighters said Thursday they were under siege in their Sadr City stronghold as U.S. and Iraqi troops killed or seized key commanders in pinpoint nighttime raids. Two commanders of the Shiite militia said Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has stopped protecting the group under pressure from Washington and threats from Sunni Muslim Arab governments.

The two commanders' account of a growing siege mentality inside the organization could represent a tactical and propaganda feint, but there was mounting evidence the militia was increasingly off balance and had ordered its gunmen to melt back into the population. To avoid capture, commanders report no longer using cell phones and fighters are removing their black uniforms and hiding their weapons during the day.

During much of his nearly eight months in office, al-Maliki has blocked or ordered an end to many U.S.-led operations against the Mahdi Army, which is run by radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, the prime minister's key political backer.

As recently as Oct. 31, al-Maliki, trying to capitalize on American voter discontent with the war and White House reluctance to open a public fight with the Iraqi leader just before the election, won U.S. agreement to lift military blockades on Sadr City and another Shiite enclave where an American soldier was abducted.

But al-Maliki reportedly had a change of heart in late November while going into a meeting in Jordan with President Bush. It has since been disclosed that the Iraqi leader's vision for a new security plan for Baghdad, to which Bush has committed 17,500 additional U.S. troops, was outlined in that meeting.

Al-Maliki is said by aides to have told Bush that he wanted the Iraqi army and police to be in the lead, but he would no longer interfere to prevent U.S. attempts to roll up the Mahdi Army.

In a meeting before his session with Bush, Jordan's King Abdullah II was said by al-Maliki confidants to have conveyed the increasing anger of fellow Sunni leaders in the Middle East over the continuing slaughter of Sunni Muslims at the hands of Shiite death squads.

Until February, much of the violence in Iraq was the work of al-Qaida in Iraq and allied Sunni organizations. They had killed thousands of Shiites in random bomb attacks in what was seen as an al-Qaida bid to foment civil war.

When al-Qaida bombers blew up the Golden Dome mosque, an important Shiite shrine in the mainly Sunni city of Samarra on Feb. 22, Shiite militiamen, especially the Mahdi Army fighters based in Sadr City, stormed out of the poor enclave in a drive for revenge that has only grown in ferocity.

DOJ_NMG_0118843

The U.N. reported this week that the sectarian fighting killed more than 34,000 Iraqis last year, a figure that was criticized but not disputed Thursday by the Iraqi government.

With the Sunni threat in mind, evidence since the meetings in Jordan indicates that al-Maliki has kept his pledge to Bush that there would be no further interference in favor of Shiite militias.

On Wednesday, the prime minister said 400 Mahdi Army fighters had been detained in recent months, although an exact timeframe was not given.

The midlevel Mahdi Army commanders, who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because the group operates in secret, said at least five top commanders of similar standing were captured or killed in recent months, including one snatched in a night raid from his Sadr City hide-out on Tuesday. They refused to name him.

Two other key officials at the top of the organization were killed in raids last month:

· Sahib al-Amiri, a senior al-Sadr military aide, was slain by American forces in the Shiite holy city of Najaf on Dec. 27. The U.S. military reported his death, calling him a criminal involved roadside bombings. Al-Sadr lives in Najaf.

· The other top commander, identified by a third Mahdi Army commander as Abu al-Sudour, was shot to death in a joint U.S.-Iraqi raid last month as well. He was hunted down in Sadr City.

The third commander, who also spoke anonymously to protect his identity, said U.S.-led raiding parties were now also engaged in massive sweeps, having rounded up what he said was every male old enough to carry a gun in south Baghdad's Um al-Maalef neighborhood Tuesday night.

The U.S. military spokesman, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, alluded to the tactics early this month when he was asked by the AP if the coming security operation would focus on pinpoint raids or broader military engagements.

"It'll be a combination of targeted killings and more traditional large-force operations," Caldwell said.

There has been so much advance publicity about the coming security plan, major speeches by both Bush and al-Maliki, that the militant targets of the operation — both Sunni insurgents and Shiite militiamen — have had ample warning the U.S. and Iraqi militaries are drawing a bead.

One of the Mahdi Army commanders who spoke with the AP said the early warning was not ignored.

"Our top leadership has told us to lay low and not confront the Americans. But if Sadr City is attacked, if civilians are hurt, we will ignore those orders and take matters in our own hands. We won't need orders from Sheik Muqtada (al-Sadr)," the midlevel commander said.

Others in the organization said street fighters have been told not to wear their black uniforms and to hide their weapons, to make their checkpoints less visible. Reports from the growing number of neighborhoods controlled by the militias indicate fighters are obeying.

Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, said the security strategy and the additional American forces would allow the crackdown to be sufficiently broad to sweep up those who try to escape Baghdad and operate elsewhere.

"On the militia, the Baghdad plan itself is integrated to a holistic, countrywide plan that the multinational corps is developing. And security for Baghdad won't just come from securing the inside of Baghdad," Casey said at a briefing on Monday.

"It comes from the support zones around the outside as far away, as you suggest, Baqouba and Ramadi and Fallujah. It goes all the way out to the borders to stop the flow of foreign fighters and support coming in there."

The Mahdi Army commanders said they were increasingly concerned about improved U.S. intelligence that has allowed the Americans to successfully target key figures in the militia.

"We're no longer using cell phones except in emergencies. Some of our top commanders have not been home (in Sadr City) for a year because they fear capture," one of the commanders said.

The militiamen said al-Sadr himself had apparently gotten wind of the coming assault and ordered a reshuffling of the Mahdi Army command structure, transferring many leaders to new districts and firing others who were of suspect loyalty.

While Shiite militiamen were less in evidence on Baghdad streets, Sunni insurgents continued their bomb and shooting attacks in Shiite regions and Shiite death squads remained active at night.

Police reported a total of 59 people killed or found dead Thursday, with the single largest toll from a triple car bombing that killed 10 in a wholesale vegetable market in a south Baghdad Shiite neighborhood. Twenty-seven bodies were found dumped in Baghdad, 19 on the largely Sunni west side of the Tigris, eight on the mainly Shiite east bank.

An al-Qaida-linked coalition of Sunni insurgents claimed responsibility for a Wednesday attack in Baghdad on a convoy of a Western democracy institute. The ambush killed an American woman and three security contractors. The woman was identified as Andrea Parhamovich, 28, of Perry, Ohio.

Officials Predict Shiite Militia Will Lower Profile In Baghdad (WP)

By Walter Pincus And Ann Scott Tyson

DOJ_NMG_0118844

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

U.S. intelligence leaders told Congress yesterday that Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr will probably lower the profile of his powerful militia in Baghdad and watch to see whether the new U.S.-Iraqi strategy of placing more troops in the city is aimed at uncontrolled violence or specifically at him and his organization.

"There's a clear indication at the present time he's not looking for contacts with coalition forces," CIA Director Michael V. Hayden told the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence yesterday. "And to the degree he controls Jaish al-Mahdi -- and that's a very important factor -- to the degree that he controls this, he's trying not to bait us or confront us into confrontation."

Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, delivered a similar message about Sadr and his organization, which is also known as the Mahdi Army. "They will probably reduce their level of activity in the near term in order to see what's going to happen, how it's going to happen, particularly in Baghdad. And I think they will continue to operate in other parts of Iraq to further establish their influence over the Shia population," he said.

A key element of President Bush's explanation for putting up to 21,500 additional troops in Iraq is disarming militias that are operating outside the government's security forces. U.S. military commanders have reported there are up to 23 separate militias operating inside Baghdad, many of which are associated with Sadr's Mahdi Army.

The administration has been pressuring Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who gained his office with Sadr's support, to take strong action against Sadr's militia members, who have been accused of sending death squads into Sunni neighborhoods in Baghdad.

At a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing yesterday, retired Marine Corps Gen. Joseph P. Hoar, who commanded U.S. forces in the buildup to the Persian Gulf War, said that no additional U.S. troops should be sent to Iraq unless Maliki disarms militias, including Sadr's, and cleans them out of the Iraqi security services. "If he's not committed to make hard choices early on, there's no chance in pulling this thing off," Hoar said.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, spokesman for the U.S military command in Iraq, told a group of Washington Post reporters and editors yesterday that he is worried that the American public will be impatient with the temporary buildup of U.S. troops in Iraq. "I for one am personally very concerned that expectations have been raised so high that people are going to look for some kind of immediate results in the next 30 to 60 days and are not going to see it," Caldwell said.

He warned that the buildup is "not the long-term solution" to security in Iraq and said that its primary purpose is to allow the U.S. military to accelerate the transition to Iraqi government control of its own forces this summer and fall rather than in 2008. "We've got to . . . let go of the reins," he said. The additional U.S. troops will also help the U.S. military to increase and expand its teams of advisers embedded with Iraqi units, which he said will have an "open-ended commitment" in Iraq.

Iraq plans to add 37,000 troops to its army starting this spring to fill out the ranks of its 10 divisions, as attrition, combat losses and leave mean many units have only half to 70 percent of their manpower available day to day. It will also create an 11th army division, "which they desperately need," Caldwell said, that will be a "much more mobile, much more responsive" force than the others.

Last year, some Iraqi units ordered to help quell violence in Baghdad "completely disintegrated" as soldiers refused to go, he said. U.S. commanders realized that "gosh, we built an army that's not mobile," Caldwell said. He called the government's recent success in getting one battalion of about 500 Iraqi troops to Baghdad "an incredible step forward," and said whether the government can fulfill its pledge to muster three more brigades of Iraqi troops for Baghdad is "a real test."

Yesterday, Maliki announced that Iraqi-U.S. military operations had resulted in the arrests of some 400 members of Sadr's militia, but it was in southern Iraq, where competing Shiite factions are fighting for control of towns and cities.

Iraq's Planned Budget Divisive Too (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi And Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

BAGHDAD — It's budget time in Iraq, and the lively debates that have erupted would strike a familiar chord for observers of such talks in any American statehouse or European parliament.

But war-ravaged Iraq is no ordinary country, and the murkiness surrounding many items in the proposed 2007 budget has contributed to the general distrust between sectarian factions as well as widespread doubts about the ability of the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to manage the nation.

Nearly $2 billion of the budget is allocated to agencies beyond the oversight of the central government at a time when potential international donors have balked at tossing more money into what has been viewed as a black hole.

The potential for abuse is high. Most ministries get multimillion-dollar discretionary funds known as "social benefits" with few spending safeguards, Iraqi officials say.

Item of contention

DOJ_NMG_0118845

The $41-billion budget, a copy of which was obtained by the Los Angeles Times, also includes money to assist the families of those killed and imprisoned under the regime of the late Saddam Hussein. The Shiite Muslim-sponsored provision has proved so offensive to Sunni Arab lawmakers that they have threatened to loudly condemn the entire spending plan unless benefits are also provided to prisoners who were abused by American troops at the Abu Ghraib prison and to those killed in U.S. military operations since the toppling of Hussein's Sunni-dominated government in 2003.

"If they do not change this particular law, we will not vote for the budget," said Alaa Saddoun, a Sunni lawmaker in the sect's main parliamentary bloc.

Iraq's budget is loaded with potentially divisive expenditures, some with sectarian overtones, as well as vaguely worded spending items that have raised the eyebrows of Iraqi lawmakers.

The budget debate comes as the U.S. proposes to pour an additional $1 billion into Iraqi reconstruction efforts and has been pressuring skeptical international donors to pitch in financially. At a time when suspicions are rife about government graft, the proposed budget trims the office of the Public Integrity Commission by 13%.

Maliki this week sent lawmakers a letter urging them to approve the budget quickly, and a vote could come next week.

But even the prime minister's closest political allies have raised tough questions about the proposed budget, which is 21% larger than last year's. The budget does not include $8 billion allocated to ministries last year that have yet to be spent on reconstruction projects around the country held up because of security worries. It also fails to incorporate funds donated by the international community, including the U.S.

Iraqi budget planners complained that they simply couldn't get figures such as how much Washington was contributing to Iraqi agriculture, even when they asked for them.

The budget, which would be largely funded with a projected $30 billion in oil revenue, about $1 billion in taxes and fees and the $8 billion left over from last year, does call for an ambitious 60% increase, to $10 billion, of funds for improving infrastructure.

"We don't want to spend all the government's income on paying salaries and handouts," Maliki told reporters this week. "We want to encourage investment — especially in the field of electricity and oil."

But many observers scoffed at the reconstruction figure, arguing that it would be impossible to spend so much money amid the daily gunfights, banditry and terrorism afflicting eight of the country's 18 provinces and its three largest cities.

Gross incompetence has also been a factor in the failure to spend allocated funds.

"Many key ministries have been unable to expend budget resources on capital improvements and are running large surpluses due in part to an ineffective procurement process and the inability to carry out fair, competitive contracting," a report by the U.S. Government Accountability Office said.

Some said the Iraqi government would be better off pumping money into services and salaries, giving jobs to needy youths.

"I think first the budget wasn't based on pure mathematics but merely opinion," said Hassan Senaid, one of Maliki's staunchest parliamentary supporters. "I think that many of the ministries will not be able to spend all their money."

The biggest chunk

The security forces account for the biggest chunk of Iraq's proposed budget. Year-to-year spending for the Sunni-led Defense Ministry would stay the same, at about $4 billion; whereas funds for the Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry, which oversees the police, would rise 25%, to $2.6 billion.

"This reflects our economic strategy," said Kamal Basri, a financial advisor to the Iraqi government. "The most important thing is security."

The budget would double, to $200 million, the allocation for the Kurdish-controlled Foreign Ministry, increasing the payroll of embassies ninefold as the country attempts to re-integrate itself into the international community.

Health and education spending would go up more than 50% as Iraq attempts to address its vast social problems. But the country would spend a mere $6 million on handling the burgeoning problem of families displaced by the country's sectarian civil war, about the same figure as last year.

Lawmakers were most perplexed at the 100% increase in the budget of national security advisor Mowaffak Rubaie. His title, many say, dwarfs the tiny role he plays.

"I think that he wants 10 undersecretaries and 30 director-general positions while he only has three rooms for offices, which is insufficient for all the people to sit," Senaid said.

Government officials say they have made a serious effort to be more transparent.

Much of the $2 billion in unspecified spending would go toward paying off Iraq's debt as well as for people's daily food rations and subsidies for provincial governments, the officials say. But many lawmakers worry that the funds come without safeguards.

DOJ_NMG_0118846

"It's cloudy, unclear," said Bassem Sharif Hocheimi, a Shiite lawmaker and outspoken reformer. "This might lead to problems and corruption. We want to allocate more money for the governorates [provinces]. They're in bad shape. But how can we monitor corruption in those governments?"

Lawmakers also have questioned the "social benefits" funds in the budget proposal. Basri said they were discretionary accounts that ministers could use to reward exemplary employees. But worried about their potential for abuse, he sent out a memo to ministers saying that no single employee could receive more than $190 a month from the funds. "That made me a rather unpopular person," he said.

The proposed budget allocates $126 million for religious foundations, with equal amounts for Sunni and Shiite Muslim charities even though the country's Shiites make up the majority of the nation's population. But that goodwill gesture was offset by the most explosive item in the budget, the $230 million allocated to victims of the Hussein government.

Critics argue that the law creating the restitution agencies was passed before the permanent government of Iraq was elected in December 2005 and needs to be revisited by the current batch of lawmakers.

They also wonder about oversight. Iraq's ministries typically appoint an inspector general who looks out for corruption and favoritism. But the proposed organizations, known as the Martyrs Institute and the Prisoners Institute, for doling out money to victims of the former regime may not have such monitors.

"We have a problem with this," said Salim Abdullah Jabouri, a spokesman for the Sunni bloc. "Who has been harmed? Who's defining the prisoners? This is a huge amount of money."

Still, even having such discussions shows genuine democratic progress, Iraqi government officials say. And most acknowledge that the budget battle could have been much worse, given the charged sectarian atmosphere.

Budget planners in the prime minister's office successfully resisted pressure by Shiite hard-liners to allocate funds to provinces based on a formula that would take into account not just population figures, but also the amount of suffering each region endured under Hussein's government.

"How do you calculate suffering?" said Basri, the government advisor, who is a British-educated economist and also the head of an economic think tank. "That was the problem."

Iraq Signals Changes In Protocols With Iran (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 18 — Iraq is carrying out an extensive review of its diplomatic protocols with Iran and may place new restrictions on them, the Iraqi foreign minister said in an interview on Thursday, after Iranian military officials and diplomats were picked up in three separate American actions here.

The raids have deeply embarrassed Iraqi officials, who say that the United States did not consult with them before it detained the Iranians, who were properly accredited visitors to this country. At the same time, Iraqi officials have been put in an awkward position by their neighbor, as the Iraqis concede that at least some of the Iranians appear to have been working with Shiite militias, just as the Americans claimed.

As a result, Iraq has decided to tighten diplomatic controls on Iranian officials, insisting on detailed itineraries for their missions here, closer coordination with Baghdad and pledges that the officials will not work with armed groups outside the government, said Hoshyar Zebari, the foreign minister.

Iraq may also demand that visits by Iranian officials be personally approved by the prime minister, Mr. Zebari said. He said this category would include the Iranian Revolutionary Guard, which the United States denounces as a terrorist organization but Iraqis regard as an indispensable player because it is among the most influential organizations in Iran.

Despite differences over the Guard, Iraq has signaled its intention to review its protocols with Iran in light of the American raids, even calling its ambassador to Tehran back to Baghdad to work on the changes, Mr. Zebari said.

“We informed them very clearly after the first incident that there are a number of agreements we are going to review, and you should be very careful,” Mr. Zebari said. “Yes, they have been notified.”

The first of the three episodes began on Dec. 20 near the evening curfew when American forces stopped a car carrying two Iranian diplomats and some guards. Early the next morning, American forces raided the compound of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, one of Iraq’s most powerful Shiite leaders, and detained a number of Iraqis with two Iranians who turned out to be members of the Revolutionary Guard.

The diplomats were soon released, but the military officials, who the United States said were directly linked to attacks on Americans, were asked to leave the country by Iraq only after a nine-day diplomatic crisis involving the three countries. Finally, a week ago, the Americans raided what was described as a diplomatic liaison office in the northern city of Erbil and detained six Iranians. Mr. Zebari said Thursday that just one of them had been released.

The United States later asserted that the other five were indeed members of the Revolutionary Guard, which it described as “an organization known for providing funds, weapons, improvised explosive device technology and training to extremist groups.”

On Thursday, the United States also said that it had entered the grounds of the Sudanese Embassy in Baghdad as part of an operation “aimed at denying insurgents safe haven to carry out attacks against Iraqi security forces and Iraqi citizens.” No further details were available.

The Iranian Foreign Ministry in Tehran and the Iranian Embassy in Baghdad have generally said little, although on Thursday an Iranian Embassy office manager who often answers the phone, but refuses to give his name, said that Mr. Zebari, a Kurd, had given assurances that the Iranians detained in Erbil would soon be released.

But in the interview, Mr. Zebari said he had little information on that issue except that American forces generally release detainees in 10 days or so if there is no evidence of wrongdoing. He said that the United States had a right to investigate people suspected of attacks but added, “We, as the Iraqi government, are treading a fine line.”

“On the one hand we understand the U.S. position,” he continued. “On the other hand, I understand my geographic position as well,” he said, referring to the border with Iran. After the raids, he said, the Iranians “come to us and we are incapable of responding.”

Mr. Zebari said that as Iraq reviewed its diplomatic relationship with Iran, the standing agreement that 1,500 religious pilgrims a day can enter this country was unlikely to change. But the number of entry points could be reduced as a way of keeping closer tabs on the traffic, he said.

Visitors with diplomatic passports will be required to give a clear accounting of the nature of their mission in Iraq and the likely length of their stay, he said. Political visitors might be required to gain the permission of the prime minister, further clarifying visits that could catch the Americans’ notice, he said.

The two Revolutionary Guards captured in the Baghdad raid had duly applied for Iraqi visas under an Iranian diplomatic note in October, Mr. Zebari said. But he added that there “could have been better clarification” of what the officials were actually doing in Iraq, and he conceded that they had not been truthful about their mission here.

For the first time, Mr. Zebari disclosed the total number of Iranian diplomats operating officially in Iraq. There are 36 in the embassy in Baghdad, he said, along with 11 at the consulate in Karbala and 9 at another consulate in Basra.

The officials detained at the liaison office in Erbil did not have diplomatic status, he said. As part of its review, the Foreign Ministry plans to turn the liaison offices in Iraq into consulates, giving them official diplomatic status, he said. He added that it was unclear how many of the liaison offices there were around the country, but said that they operated openly.

“This wasn’t something hidden, secretive,” Mr. Zebari said.

Insurgents In Iraq Claim Convoy Attack (AP)

By Maamoun Youssef

AP, January 19, 2007

An al-Qaida-linked coalition of Iraqi Sunni insurgents claimed responsibility Thursday for an attack in Baghdad on a convoy of a Western democracy institute that killed a 28-year-old Ohio woman and three security contractors.

The Washington-based National Democratic Institute identified its slain staffer as Andrea Parhamovich of Perry, Ohio. Contractors from Hungary, Croatia and Iraq also were killed in the ambush Wednesday. Two other people were wounded, one seriously.

Parhamovich, a graduate of Marietta College in central Ohio, had been working with NDI in Iraq since late 2006 as a communications specialist advising Iraqi political parties on how to reach out to voters and constituents. She was helping "build the kind of national level political institutions that can help bridge the sectarian divide and improve Iraqi lives," NDI said.

In the rural neighborhood where Parhamovich's parents live, David Rolfes of NDI and Parhamovich's brother-in-law, Joe Zampini, stood at a church across the road and asked reporters not to approach the family's home. Zampini appealed for privacy and said the family was in seclusion.

The community of about 1,100 people, about 35 miles east of Cleveland, is known for its many flower nurseries and greenhouses that take up acres of land, as well as being home to a FirstEnergy Corp. nuclear power plant.

"It's a sad time," said Perry High School principal Doug Jenkins, the middle school principal when Parhamovich attended the senior high school.

Tom Perry, spokesman for Marietta College, knew Parhamovich when she worked in the liberal art school's media relations office as a student.

"So it hit us as hard as anybody here because we knew her so well," Perry said.

DOJ_NMG_0118848

"We saw what an excellent person she was, and she obviously had a passion for something and wanted to go there and be a part of it," Perry said. "We're proud she wanted to do this. It shows it's not just the soldiers who are in harm's way."

Perry said Parhamovich, who was known as Andi, graduated in 2000 with a degree in advertising and public relations with a minor in journalism. She worked for film company Miramax in New York for a short time, he said.

A statement released by NDI said Parhamovich also worked in the Massachusetts governor's office, at Air America Radio and at the International Republican Institute in Iraq before joining NDI's Baghdad staff in late 2006.

NDI's chairman, former Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright, said, "There is no more sacred roll of honor than those who have given their last full measure in support of freedom. Yesterday, in Iraq, Andrea Parhamovich and our security personnel were enshrined on that list.

"They did not see themselves as heroes, only people doing a job on behalf of a cause they believed in. They were not the enemies of anyone in Iraq; they were there to help," Albright said.

The institute supports democratic processes and institutions worldwide. Its staffers in Baghdad run training programs in democracy and political participation, as well as women's rights. The group has had staffers in Iraq since June 2003.

Gunmen opened fire on the three-vehicle convoy on Wednesday in Yarmouk, a predominantly Sunni neighborhood in western Baghdad.

"Praise be to God, in an attack with light and medium weapons and RPG's in the Yarmouk area in Baghdad on Jan. 17, two SUVs belonging to the Zionist Mossad were destroyed and a third one was severely damaged," said a statement posted Thursday on an Islamic Web site.

The statement was signed by the spokesman of the "Islamic state in Iraq," the so-called Islamic government that al-Qaida in Iraq and several other Iraqi Sunni Arab insurgent groups declared earlier last year. The statement was posted on a Web forum where Sunni insurgents often release messages.

A U.S. official said that the statement's authenticity could not be determined.

Its purported author — Islamic state in Iraq — is considered al-Qaida in Iraq's political arm, said the official, who did not want to be identified because of the information's sensitivity.

Creation of the group in October was taken as a propaganda move and a signal of al-Qaida in Iraq's interest in unifying all Sunni jihadists under one umbrella, but the official said some Sunni groups haven't embraced the new organization.

In its Web statement, the group did not say anything about how many were killed or their nationalities, but al-Qaida usually refers to foreigners whose nationalities it does not know as members of the Mossad, the Israeli spy agency.

Parhamovich was the first full-time worker for the group to be killed in Iraq. A security contractor for the organization was killed in March 2004.

According to insurance claims on file at the Department of Labor, 770 civilian contractors have been killed in Iraq since the war began in March 2003 through Dec. 31 and 7,761 civilian contractors have been injured. The contractors include foreign workers.

Sunni Insurgent Group Asserts It Killed American (WP)

By Ernesto Londo?o And Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 18 -- A Sunni insurgent group linked to the group al-Qaeda in Iraq asserted responsibility Thursday for the killing of an Ohio woman working in Baghdad who died Wednesday after her convoy was attacked, according to a posting on a Web site used by some Sunni groups.

Andrea "Andi" Parhamovich, 28, of Perry, Ohio, who worked for the nonprofit National Democratic Institute, was killed along with three non-American security workers, according to a statement released by the institute.

"There is no more sacred roll of honor than those who have given their last full measure in support of freedom," Madeleine K. Albright, the NDI chairman and former secretary of state, said in a statement. "Yesterday, in Iraq, Andrea Parhamovich and our security personnel were enshrined in that list. They were not the enemies of anyone in Iraq. They were there to help."

The authenticity of the assertion of responsibility, signed by a spokesman for a group called the Islamic State in Iraq, could not be independently verified. The group released an 18-minute audiotape last year claiming support from tribal sheiks and previously independent insurgent groups.

Parhamovich is at least the fifth American civilian woman killed in Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

She graduated from Marietta College in Ohio and held jobs in the Massachusetts governor's office, that state's Department of Economic Development and Air America Radio before arriving in Baghdad in September. She moved to Iraq to take a job at the International Republican Institute but left last month to join NDI.

DOJ_NMG_0118849

"An outgoing woman who made friends quickly, Andi wanted to use her education and skills as a communications specialist to help Iraqi political party leaders and parliamentarians develop strategies to reach out to voters and constituents," the organization said in the statement.

NDI began operating in Baghdad in June 2003. It has worked to promote civic participation and strengthen the country's political parties, legislature and executive branch.

The killing of Parhamovich occurred as Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has been striving to show that his government has taken meaningful steps toward improving security.

In an interview Wednesday, he highlighted what he described as a series of operations carried out in recent days that he said had led to the arrests of 430 fighters of the Mahdi Army militia, which is led by Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, one of Maliki's political supporters.

A spokesman for Sadr acknowledged in an interview Thursday that 425 of his group's fighters had been arrested, but he disputed Maliki's assertion that the arrests occurred in recent days. The spokesman, Abdul Razak al-Nadawi, said the 425 include Mahdi Army members arrested after a fierce battle in August 2004 in Najaf, a city south of Baghdad that has long been a Sadr stronghold. Since the beginning of 2006, the Iraqi government has arrested 96 people, the spokesman said.

"These are exact numbers," he said. "We have a record because every one of those detainees there has a monthly salary" that goes to their families.

Also Thursday, Iraqi and Iranian officials criticized the arrest of five men by U.S. forces last week at an Iranian facility in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil. Iraqi officials said the facility was in the process of becoming an accredited consular mission.

Hassan Kazemi Qomi, Iran's ambassador to Iraq, said he had been told the five Iranian officials would be released in "coming days" and condemned the United States for arresting them. "There is a sovereign government in Iraq. Why are the Americans violating the sovereignty of Iraq?" asked Qomi, making his first public comments on the incident during a news conference.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari has said the Iranians were not accredited diplomats but worked in a liaison office performing consular services under the approval of the Kurdish regional government.

Lou Fintor, a spokesman at the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, said the arrests came after U.S. officials gathered intelligence linking the occupants of the facility to Iran's Revolutionary Guard Corps, which U.S. officials say targets coalition forces and incites sectarian violence.

"We believe many of the activities taking place in this facility were not consistent with normal diplomatic or consular functions," Fintor said. U.S. officials have not identified the men, disclosed whether they have been charged or revealed where they are being held.

Also Thursday, the U.S. military confirmed that it searched the Sudanese Embassy in Baghdad on Saturday. In a brief statement, the military said the search was part of an operation targeting havens for insurgents. Sudanese Embassy officials were not present during the search, and soldiers did not remove anything from the facility, according to a statement.

A variety of violent acts in the capital were reported by the Iraqi Interior Ministry, including a car bomb that detonated Thursday morning in central Baghdad near a police patrol station, killing two policemen and four other people; the assassination of two university professors; and the explosion of three car bombs in a market in southern Baghdad, which killed three policemen and four other people.

Staff researchers Meg Smith, Julie Tate and Robert E. Thomason in Washington and special correspondents Saad Sarhan and Naseer Nouri in Baghdad contributed to this report.

A U.S. Civilian In Baghdad: Standing Out, Even In Death (NYT)

By Christopher Maag

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

CLEVELAND, Jan. 18 — Andrea Parhamovich always stood out.

Before she was killed Wednesday in an ambush in Baghdad, Ms. Parhamovich, a 28-year-old political consultant from Perry, 40 miles east of here, was known to her friends and family as hard charging but lovable, possessed with Joan of Arc's determination and the charm of a pixie, who had dreams of working on a presidential campaign and possibly running for Congress.

Ms. Parhamovich, whom everyone called Andi, mocked death. In November 2006, two car bombs were discovered in front of the building where she lived in the Green Zone in Baghdad. The base was locked down, said Michael Hastings, her boyfriend, who is the Baghdad correspondent for Newsweek magazine. In the Green Zone convention center for hours, Ms. Parhamovich grew bored, Mr. Hastings said. She led 10 American and Peruvian men as they walked back to her building, mortars exploding nearby.

Mr. Hastings said he was planning to ask Ms. Parhamovich to marry him next month during a Valentine's Day trip to Paris. "She was this little blond-haired, blue-eyed girl from Ohio, but she was tough," he said. "She was far more brave than I am."

Ms. Parhamovich was teaching Iraqi politicians how to communicate with constituents. She was a staff member of the National Democratic Institute, a nonprofit group led by former Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright that works to build democratic institutions. She was in an institute convoy outside the Green Zone when it was attacked. On Thursday, a coalition of Sunni insurgents linked to Al Qaeda claimed responsibility for the attack, which killed a total of four people, The Associated Press reported.

She had left a job with the liberal Air America radio network, helping to organize its antiwar "Bring 'Em Home" concert in New York City in March 2006.

"Whenever I went into her office, I just felt a happiness, a glow," said Al Franken, the liberal radio show host, who choked up several times as he discussed Ms. Parhamovich. "She was a hard person not to like."

Ms. Parhamovich's father coached baseball at a high school near Perry, the small town where she grew up, and she had dreams of becoming a top fast-pitch softball player before back injuries forced her to quit the sport, said Joe Zampini, her brother-in-law.

She talked just as she played: fast. "She wasn't into small talk," Mr. Zampini said. "She wanted to get the most out of life. She was very highly motivated to help the world."

Ms. Parhamovich attended Marietta, a small liberal arts college in southeast Ohio, where she studied advertising and public relations. Politically liberal, she was conservative on personal matters, said Ryan Zundell, who worked with her in the college's public relations department. She rarely drank and eschewed low-cut shirts and jeans.

She graduated in three and a half years then worked for Jane Swift, who was the Republican governor of Massachusetts. Ms. Parhamovich opposed the war from the start, Mr. Hastings said.

"There's so much injustice in this country, so many horrible things happening," he said from Baghdad. "She felt like she could make a difference."

Activist Slain In Iraq 'Was An Idealist' (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

BAGHDAD — On their first date, Michael Hastings and Andrea Parhamovich met for milkshakes.

Fifteen months later, she followed him to Iraq.

Hastings hoped they would spend their lives together.

But on Wednesday, Parhamovich died in a hail of bullets, ambushed outside a Sunni Arab political office in Baghdad.

Sunni Muslim insurgents linked to Al Qaeda in Iraq claimed responsibility Thursday for the attack that took the lives of the 28-year-old and three bodyguards — a Hungarian, a Croat and an Iraqi. Two other security workers were wounded. None of these other victims' names had been released.

"She was an idealist," Hastings said of Parhamovich, who grew up in Perry, Ohio. "She always believed that people were good. Certainly, those ideals were put to the test when she came to Iraq."

Parhamovich, known as Andi, followed heart and ideals when she came to Baghdad. Hastings, a reporter with Newsweek, was working in Iraq. But Parhamovich was also drawn to political work in Baghdad, teaching Iraqis about voting and how to establish a functional government.

She worked first for the International Republican Institute, joining the National Democratic Institute a few months later.

On Wednesday, Parhamovich had gone to meet a group of Sunni politicians from the Iraqi Islamic Party. "She was really excited about the meeting," Hastings said.

The party headquarters is in Yarmouk, a west Baghdad neighborhood where shootings and executions are common.

After Parhamovich conducted her training seminar for the Sunni politicians, she left in a convoy with her armed guards. Moments later, the convoy was ambushed. The guards fought back but were outgunned by the attackers, whose arsenal included grenades.

"With God's assistance, we have succeeded in the destruction of two SUV vehicles belonging to the Zionist Mossad, killing all who were in them, attacking them by light and medium weapons," wrote the group that took responsibility, in a statement on a well-known Sunni insurgent website.

The group often refers to its targets as members of Israel's intelligence service.

But in fact, Hastings said, "they killed a wonderful, unarmed girl."

After graduating from Marietta College in Ohio, Parhamovich worked in the Massachusetts governor's office. In 2005, she got a job doing fundraising and publicity for Air America.

DOJ_NMG_0118851

"Working for a liberal radio network wasn't enough," said Jamie Horn, who worked with Parhamovich at Air America. "She had to go to the heart of the war and create change and understanding. She was so obstinate in her efforts to create change. Nothing could stop her."

Parhamovich met Hastings when he came to interview Jerry Springer, who was on an Air America show in New York. Unknown to him, Parhamovich had warned Springer not to say anything outrageous to Hastings.

"It was the most boring Jerry Springer interview in history," Hastings recalled. But an e-mail exchange about the story led to that first date — diner milkshakes.

"I considered it a date; she considered it just business," said Hastings, who at the time was about to leave for Iraq for the first time. When he mentioned his impending trip to the war-torn country, she was "totally unimpressed by it, and mocked me."

He did not mind, he said.

"She was beautiful," he said. "Funny. Intuitive. Really brilliant. And a bit of a nut."

Hastings got a permanent posting to Newsweek's Baghdad bureau late last summer, and by September, Parhamovich had left her job and come to Iraq.

The National Democratic Institute is one of the few nongovernmental groups still working in Iraq. The staff lives outside the heavily fortified Green Zone, home to the U.S. Embassy and the Iraqi government, often traveling around the capital to run seminars and workshops.

"They did not see themselves as heroes, only people doing a job on behalf of a cause they believed in," the institute's chairwoman, former U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright, said in a statement referring to all four killed in the attack.

"They were not the enemies of anyone in Iraq; they were there to help."

Although the couple lived in the same city, they could see each other only occasionally. Work, checkpoints and curfews would get in the way.

But Parhamovich thrived, hitting the ground running, Hastings and several of her friends say. "She wanted to be here, at the center of things, helping people," Hastings said. "She was fearless."

Joe Zampini, Parhamovich's brother-in-law, said in Perry that she viewed her work "as a challenge and quite an honor to help the Iraqis."

"She knew that Michael was there in Iraq, and I think she used this as an opportunity to learn more," said Zampini, who is married to Parhamovich's older sister, Marcy. "Her goal was really to go into politics."

The family released a statement that said in part: "Andi's desire to help strangers in such a dangerous environment thousands of miles away might be difficult for others to understand, but to us, it epitomized Andi's natural curiosity and unwavering commitment. She was passionate, bold and caring."

After spending a few months in Baghdad, Parhamovich went back to the U.S. but returned at Christmas. The couple spoke on the phone about future plans, including a long trip to Europe, Hastings said.

"We had — I have still — reservations at the Four Seasons in Paris on Valentine's Day."

Hastings had recently picked out two possible wedding rings. Ever since the milkshakes, he said, he had known he wanted to spend his life with Andi.

"She is pure at heart," he said, bringing her to life — momentarily — in the present tense.

Marine Corporal Pleads Guilty In Killing Of Unarmed Iraqi (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif., Jan. 18 (AP) — A Marine corporal pleaded guilty Thursday to kidnapping and murdering an unarmed Iraqi civilian last year, saying he and other servicemen went after him because they were “sick and tired of getting bombed.”

The marine, Cpl. Trent D. Thomas, 25, is the first of seven marines and a Navy medic accused in the case to plead guilty to murder. Four others have pleaded guilty to reduced charges in exchange for their testimony.

Prosecutors said the eight-man squad had kidnapped 52-year-old Hashim Ibrahim Awad in Hamdania, a Sunni stronghold west of Baghdad, taken him to a roadside hole and shot him to death, placing an AK-47 and shovel by his body to make it look as if he were an insurgent caught planting a bomb.

Corporal Thomas, a native of the St. Louis area on his second tour in Iraq when the man was killed on April 26, testified about the slaying as part of his plea deal. The group planned to go after a known insurgent, he said, but that plan was thwarted and they went to a neighboring house instead. The judge, Lt. Col. Tracy A. Daly, asked why the group had proceeded with the plan.

"We would get someone else to make a statement that marines, we were sick and tired of getting bombed," Corporal Thomas said.

Corporal Thomas said he and another marine seized Mr. Awad from a house by entering through an unlocked door. He said they used a combination of hand signals and Arabic commands to lure Mr. Awad away. Mr. Awad spoke little English, Corporal Thomas said, but he pleaded with the group of four marines.

"He started asking, 'Why, mister, why?' " Corporal Thomas said. "We didn't say anything."

The four took Mr. Awad to the roadside hole, where they rejoined the rest of the squad, Corporal Thomas said. Mr. Awad was struggling to break free, Corporal Thomas said, so he and others bound his hands and feet. Corporal Thomas said Lance Cpl. Robert Pennington tried to force Mr. Awad to lose consciousness by choking him.

The squad leader, Sgt. Lawrence G. Hutchins III, then reported over the radio that the group had spotted a man digging a hole, Corporal Thomas said. Someone fired a shot, he said, then he and others in the squad opened fire. Petty Officer Third Class Melson J. Bacos, he said, shot the AK-47 away from the group to make it appear as though a gunfight had occurred.

After the firing stopped, Corporal Thomas said, Sergeant Hutchins made sure Mr. Awad was dead by shooting a three-round burst of gunfire into his head.

Sergeant Hutchins, of Plymouth, Mass., is awaiting trial on murder charges and others. Corporal Pennington, of Mukilteo, Wash., is also awaiting trial and claims his rights were violated when investigators interviewed him.

Petty Officer Bacos, of Franklin, Wis., pleaded guilty to lesser charges and was sentenced to one year in prison. Another marine, Cpl. Marshall L. Magincalda, 23, of Manteca, Calif., has pleaded not guilty to murder charges and others.

Corporal Thomas faces up to life in prison without the possibility of parole, though he is likely to receive a more lenient sentence under his plea agreement.

Prosecutor Firings Not Political, Gonzales Says (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales acknowledged yesterday that some U.S. attorneys have been asked to resign their posts in recent weeks because of performance issues, but he denied any political motives and vowed to quickly submit new nominees for the jobs to the Senate for confirmation.

"What we're trying to do is ensure that for the people in each of these respective districts, we have the very best possible representative for the Department of Justice," Gonzales testified, adding later: "I would never, ever make a change in a United States attorney for political reasons or if it would in any way jeopardize an ongoing serious investigation. I just would not do it."

Gonzales's remarks in front of the Senate Judiciary Committee came in response to questions from Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and other lawmakers about the forced removals of at least six U.S. attorneys, including several who have overseen some of the government's highest-profile corruption prosecutions.

Officials say the removals include those of Carol C. Lam in San Diego, who led the corruption prosecution of former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), and Kevin V. Ryan in San Francisco, who has handled the probe into a lab at the center of a sports doping scandal involving baseball player Barry Bonds and other athletes.

Another recent change that has attracted widespread criticism from Democrats came in Arkansas, where U.S. Attorney H.E. Cummins III of Little Rock was replaced on an interim basis by J. Timothy Griffin, a former research director for the Republican National Committee.

Feinstein said she knows of at least six cases in which prosecutors have been asked to leave. She said she is concerned about the way the firings have been handled and about whether the Justice Department is attempting to evade Senate oversight of U.S. attorneys.

A little-noticed provision of last year's USA Patriot Act reauthorization legislation allows the attorney general to pick an interim U.S. attorney for an indefinite period of time.

"I'm very concerned, because, technically, under the Patriot Act, you can appoint someone without confirmation for the remainder of the president's term," Feinstein said. "I don't believe you should do that. We are going to try to change the law back."

Gonzales said the administration has no intention of avoiding confirmation hearings and said the department has forwarded six nominations to the Senate and is working on five more.

As far as prosecutors who have been asked to leave, Gonzales characterized the changes as routine personnel decisions based on evaluations of each prosecutor's performance. He declined to tell Feinstein how many prosecutors were asked to resign.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.) came to Gonzales's defense, noting that the prosecutors in question were hired by the current administration.

"I find it unusual that some of my colleagues are critical of replacing Bush appointees," Cornyn said.

Turnover In U.S. Attorneys Defended (LVRJ)

Gonzales says no one has been ousted for political reasons

WASHINGTON -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Thursday declined to say how many U.S. attorneys are being removed from their jobs and defended the practice to senators as "good management" to replace them with "the best possible people."

Advertisement

Gonzales insisted that politics did not come into play in forcing turnover among the chief federal prosecutors, who are appointed by the president. Although pressed by Democrats during an appearance before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Gonzales said he would not discuss individual cases.

At least six U.S. attorneys have been asked to resign, said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., including two in that state, one in Arkansas, one in Washington and Daniel Bogden in Nevada.

Democrats have expressed concern that a provision in the revised USA Patriot Act that passed last year would allow the attorney general to name long term replacements while circumventing the Senate confirmation process.

Gonzales said 11 U.S. attorney vacancies have been created since the law was passed but he declined to say how many were forced resignations.

The nation's chief law enforcement officer acknowledged that some of the chief prosecutors were asked to leave.

"But that happens during every administration during different periods for different reasons," Gonzales said. "That fact that that happens quite frankly some people should view that as a sign of good management. What we do is make an evaluation about the performance of individuals, and I have a responsibility that we have the best possible people in that position.

"I would never, ever make a change in a United States attorney position for political reasons or that in any way would jeopardize an ongoing investigation," Gonzales said. "I just would not do it."

Gonzales also said the administration plans to submit replacements to the Senate for confirmation although at least one, in Arkansas, has begun serving on an interim basis.

Bogden on Wednesday confirmed he was leaving the Nevada post effective Feb. 28, but a statement he issued did not address whether he was being forced out. His dismissal was confirmed last weekend by Nevada's two senators.

Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., who recommended Bogden for the post in 2001, said Wednesday he discussed the Nevada prosecutor's fate with the White House and the Department of Justice, "and it's their call."

On Thursday, Ensign would not confirm nor comment on a report by Review-Journal columnist Jane Ann Morrison. Morrison cited a Republican source saying Ensign asked that Bogden be allowed to stay on and was told the decision to remove U.S. attorneys was part of a plan to "give someone else that experience" in order to build GOP bench strength.

Ensign expects the Justice Department will ask him to suggest a new U.S. attorney, and he plans to comply, spokesman Tory Mazzola said. Ensign "is working with the Department of Justice to move forward," Mazzola said.

Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Thursday that Bogden got a bad deal that will force him to end a 16- year career as a federal prosecutor.

By replacing veteran prosecutors, the Bush administration is seeking to build "a farm team for Gonzales," Reid said. "He can farm out to somebody who drove him to work one afternoon."

Feinstein questioned whether the Patriot Act "is being used to put in people who want a reward or change for one reason or another, and they would never have to go through confirmation for the rest of the president's term. That is unacceptable."

The California senator has focused her concern on Carol Lam, the departing U.S. attorney in San Diego who successfully prosecuted former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham on corruption charges.

Feinstein said Lam was pursuing corruption cases against other federal lawmakers and staff, "so that raises the question" whether she was being forced to leave as a way to set back investigations.

"Now I am not accusing anybody, but my suspicions are aroused particularly because the FBI says nothing but the highest things about this prosecutor," Feinstein said after the hearing. "I would kind of like to know."

DOJ_NMG_0118854

Justice Department officials have said Lam was asked to resign based on declining drug and gun prosecutions in her district. Some Republicans in Congress also criticized her for not prosecuting more immigration cases.

U.S. Attorney Confirms He'll Be Leaving His Post (LVRJ)

By GLENN PUIT And TONY BATT, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, January 19, 2007

Spokeswoman says reports of Bogden's ouster 'erroneous'

Three days after Nevada's two senators said the Department of Justice had forced out Daniel Bogden, U.S. attorney for the district of Nevada, Bogden broke his silence on the matter, confirming that he will be leaving his post next month.

Bogden's announcement late Wednesday came one day after Natalie Collins, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office, belatedly responded to questions about the matter by saying that Bogden was still the U.S. attorney in Nevada.

Advertisement

Collins also claimed that media reports regarding Bogden's ouster were "erroneous."

In the issued statement, Bogden, who was appointed to the job by the Bush administration in 2001, said his resignation is effective Feb. 28.

Neither Bogden nor Collins has addressed whether Bogden was forced out of office as the senators contend, and if so, why.

He is one of at least seven U.S. attorneys around the nation whom senators say have been forced to resign in the last couple of months.

One of them is Bogden's counterpart in San Diego, Carol Lam, who received her walking papers from the Department of Justice, too.

Lam, who has been in charge of federal prosecutions in Southern California since September 2002, said Tuesday that she will leave her job Feb. 15.

Like Bogden, Lam had overseen federal prosecution of public corruption cases involving Michael Galardi, who owned strip clubs in Las Vegas and San Diego.

Lam, a former judge, also oversaw the corruption prosecution of former U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a Republican.

On Wednesday, The Associated Press reported that the U.S. attorney in San Francisco, Kevin V. Ryan, has submitted his resignation, too.

Ryan's notable prosecutions included the BALCO steroids case.

His office also launched investigations of Silicon Valley giants Hewlett-Packard Co. and Apple Inc.

Mahlon Brown, a former U.S. attorney for the district of Nevada who now leads the National Association of Former United States Attorneys, said the wave of unexpected resignations has him "in shock and awe."

"It has always been that no one gets fired like this unless they did something goofy, if they broke the rules," Brown said. "And from what I'm picking up, even they have no idea why they've been fired. No one knows."

Brown was the U.S. attorney in Nevada from 1977 to 1981.

He was appointed by the administration of Democrat Jimmy Carter and forced out when Ronald Reagan was elected president.

Brown said it is not unusual for U.S. attorneys to lose their jobs when presidential administrations change, but he said he had never seen a large turnover of U.S. attorneys in the midst of a presidential term.

Brown said the job of a federal prosecutor is not supposed to be impacted by politics in any way.

He said he sees the spate of forced resignations as further evidence that the Bush administration is not interested in following precedent when it comes to how such judicial appointments are made.

"I think it sends the same message that's been sent the last eight years: 'We'll do it our way and forget how it's been done before you,'" Brown said.

"You don't have to be a general in Iraq to realize your job is on the line everyday, and U.S. attorneys have never had to work under that type of environment before."

Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., who recommended Bogden for the job, said Wednesday, "The White House and the Department of Justice had their reasons, and I discussed it with them, and it's their call."

Ensign did not say what the reasons for Bogden's dismissal were.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said the treatment of Bogden was unfair and "a terrible shame."

"Do you realize that his career is now ended as a U.S. attorney? He can't go back there, so he's going to have to do something else," Reid said. "What a shame."

Reid said he heard nothing but praise about Bogden's job performance and could not understand why he had been removed.

A spokesman for the Department of Justice did not return a phone call from the Review-Journal seeking comment Wednesday afternoon.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Tuesday told The Associated Press the removal of the federal prosecutors was not politically motivated, as many Democrats have speculated.

"We in no way politicize these decisions," Gonzales said.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said Tuesday that at least seven U.S. attorneys have been forced to resign without explanation.

She accused the Bush administration of trying to circumvent Senate confirmation of their replacements.

Such appointments were subject to Senate review until last year when the Patriot Act was reauthorized with a provision that allowed the U.S. attorney general to appoint longer-term, interim replacements without Senate approval.

The departures, Feinstein said, come at a sensitive time when federal prosecutors are pursuing political corruption cases.

"The U.S. attorney's job is too important for there to be unnecessary disruptions, or, worse, any appearance of undue influence," Feinstein said.

Feinstein said she planned to bring up the issue today at a Senate Judiciary committee hearing at which Gonzales is scheduled to appear.

A Justice Department spokesman, Brian Roehrkasse, said senators would be consulted before the nomination of replacement U.S. attorneys, as has been the routine since the law was changed.

"It is inconceivable for a member of Congress to believe that use of an appointment authority to fill a vacancy is in any way an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process," Roehrkasse said.

Federal Prosecutor In Nevada Says He'll Step Down (AP)

By Ken Ritter, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 19, 2007

LAS VEGAS (AP) - The U.S. attorney in Nevada said Thursday he will step down, citing discussions with Justice Department officials and joining other federal prosecutors announcing resignations in recent weeks.

Daniel Bogden said his resignation after five years as U.S. attorney for Nevada will take effect Feb. 28.

"I'm going to take some time off and evaluate what direction I'm going to go in terms of my career," Bogden said, acknowledging he served at the pleasure of President Bush and refusing to say he had been forced out.

"It's a political appointment," he said, "a presidential appointment."

Bogden, 50, made public his resignation with a statement issued late Wednesday "after consultations with officials at Department of Justice," he said. He declined to identify those officials.

He said he planned to spend the next six weeks ensuring a smooth transition for his successor, and said he had no idea whom it would be.

Bogden's four-page statement cited successful prosecutions and included quotes of praise for his work from local, state and federal law enforcement officials and a federal judge in Las Vegas.

His resignation was his first public response to reports Sunday and Monday from aides to Nevada Sens. John Ensign and Harry Reid that he would be replaced. Justice Department officials have not responded to requests for comment.

Ensign, a Republican, nominated Bogden for the post in 2001 after Bogden won several high-profile drug cases and helped send five neo-Nazis to prison for a Reno hate crime. Reid, now Democratic majority leader, supported the nomination.

Bogden was an Air Force judge advocate general and served as a deputy Washoe County district attorney before spending 10 years as an assistant U.S. attorney. He oversees 40 federal attorneys in Las Vegas and Reno.

"During the past five years, our office has been tremendously successful in implementing the national and district priorities," Bogden said in his statement, which thanked Bush for his appointment.

He called terrorism, violent crime, public corruption, drugs, child exploitation, identity theft and fraud his top issues since being confirmed by the Senate in October 2001.

In one notable case, his office successfully prosecuted four former Clark County commissioners and a former striptease club owner on corruption charges. Ex-commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey reported to federal prison last Friday. Former commissioners Erin Kenny and Lance Malone and former club owner Michael Galardi face sentencing in coming weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0118856

Bogden's office also had several prosecutorial setbacks last year, including the mid-October unraveling of a federal racketeering case against the Hells Angels motorcycle club stemming from the a deadly brawl during a biker rally in Laughlin in 2002.

Bogden was one of several U.S. attorneys to announce their resignations this week. Others included U.S. Attorney Carol Lam in San Diego, who prosecuted Galardi and Malone on bribery charges in that city, and the U.S. attorney in San Francisco, Kevin Ryan.

Also leaving this month is U.S. Attorney John McKay in Seattle.

California Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a Democrat, complained on the Senate floor Tuesday that the White House was using a provision of the USA Patriot Act to oust Ryan, Lam and other federal prosecutors and replace them for the duration of the Bush administration with White House allies.

A provision in the terrorism-fighting act allows the attorney general to appoint replacements indefinitely, without Senate confirmation.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales denied Feinstein's claim. But he has said that in the year since the Patriot Act was reauthorized, at least 11 U.S. attorneys in the nation's 94 federal districts have resigned or announced their resignations - some at the urging of the Bush administration. He noted that federal prosecutors serve at the pleasure of the president.

Surging And Purging (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

There's something happening here, and what it is seems completely clear: the Bush administration is trying to protect itself by purging independent-minded prosecutors.

Last month, Bud Cummins, the U.S. attorney (federal prosecutor) for the Eastern District of Arkansas, received a call on his cellphone while hiking in the woods with his son. He was informed that he had just been replaced by J. Timothy Griffin, a Republican political operative who has spent the last few years working as an opposition researcher for Karl Rove.

Mr. Cummins's case isn't unique. Since the middle of last month, the Bush administration has pushed out at least four U.S. attorneys, and possibly as many as seven, without explanation. The list includes Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney for San Diego, who successfully prosecuted Duke Cunningham, a Republican congressman, on major corruption charges. The top F.B.I. official in San Diego told The San Diego Union-Tribune that Ms. Lam's dismissal would undermine multiple continuing investigations.

In Senate testimony yesterday, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales refused to say how many other attorneys have been asked to resign, calling it a "personnel matter."

In case you're wondering, such a wholesale firing of prosecutors midway through an administration isn't normal. U.S. attorneys, The Wall Street Journal recently pointed out, "typically are appointed at the beginning of a new president's term, and serve throughout that term." Why, then, are prosecutors that the Bush administration itself appointed suddenly being pushed out?

The likely answer is that for the first time the administration is really worried about where corruption investigations might lead.

Since the day it took power this administration has shown nothing but contempt for the normal principles of good government. For six years ethical problems and conflicts of interest have been the rule, not the exception.

For a long time the administration nonetheless seemed untouchable, protected both by Republican control of Congress and by its ability to justify anything and everything as necessary for the war on terror. Now, however, the investigations are closing in on the Oval Office. The latest news is that J. Steven Griles, the former deputy secretary of the Interior Department and the poster child for the administration's systematic policy of putting foxes in charge of henhouses, is finally facing possible indictment.

And the purge of U.S. attorneys looks like a pre-emptive strike against the gathering forces of justice.

Won't the administration have trouble getting its new appointees confirmed by the Senate? Well, it turns out that it won't have to.

Arlen Specter, the Republican senator who headed the Judiciary Committee until Congress changed hands, made sure of that last year. Previously, new U.S. attorneys needed Senate confirmation within 120 days or federal district courts would name replacements. But as part of a conference committee reconciling House and Senate versions of the revised Patriot Act, Mr. Specter slipped in a clause eliminating that rule.

As Paul Kiel of TPMmuckraker.com — which has done yeoman investigative reporting on this story — put it, this clause in effect allows the administration "to handpick replacements and keep them there in perpetuity without the ordeal of Senate confirmation." How convenient.

Mr. Gonzales says that there's nothing political about the firings. And according to The Associated Press, he said that district court judges shouldn't appoint U.S. attorneys because they "tend to appoint friends and others not properly qualified to be prosecutors." Words fail me.

Mr. Gonzales also says that the administration intends to get Senate confirmation for every replacement. Sorry, but that's not at all credible, even if we ignore the administration's track record. Mr. Griffin, the political-operative-turned-prosecutor, would be savaged in a confirmation hearing. By appointing him, the administration showed that it has no intention of following the usual rules.

The broader context is this: defeat in the midterm elections hasn't led the Bush administration to scale back its imperial view of presidential power.

On the contrary, now that President Bush can no longer count on Congress to do his bidding, he's more determined than ever to claim essentially unlimited authority — whether it's the authority to send more troops into Iraq or the authority to stonewall investigations into his own administration's conduct.

The next two years, in other words, are going to be a rolling constitutional crisis.

Democrats squawk as president dismisses a few U.S. attorneys

At the beginning of the week, President Bush sacked Daniel Bogden, U.S. attorney for the district of Nevada.

Natalie Collins, a spokeswoman for Mr. Bogden, ended a three-day silence Wednesday by contending press reports of the ouster were "erroneous" -- actually, he's resigning.

Advertisement

Of course the president gave his own nominee the option of saving face by tendering his resignation. Perhaps Ms. Collins will contend the two men's letters crossed in the mail -- that Mr. Bogden merely craves "more time with his family." Fine.

Mr. Bogden is one of at least seven U.S. attorneys around the nation whom senators say have been forced out in the past couple of months. One of them is Carol Lam, Mr. Bogden's counterpart in San Diego. Another is Kevin V. Ryan in San Francisco.

Whether the White House is disappointed with the cases these attorneys chose to prosecute, or with those they chose not to prosecute, or with their level of success, time may tell. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales did tell The Associated Press on Tuesday that the removals were not politically motivated, whatever that means.

Although the appointments of U.S. attorneys are subject to Senate confirmation, they exercise executive authority which the Constitution vests solely in the president. Therefore, they serve at the president's pleasure -- he can fire them at will.

"The president just no longer found it pleasurable," as one local former prosecutor said Thursday, with a smile.

Now, anyone is free to criticize the president's actions and to question whether the replacements -- whoever they may be -- are better qualified than those now packing their bags.

But Democrats in Washington, led by Sen. Dianne Feinstein of the Judiciary Committee, have tried to characterize this minor housecleaning as some kind of dirty deed.

"The U.S. attorney's job is too important for there to be unnecessary disruptions, or, worse, any appearance of undue influence," squawked Sen. Feinstein on Wednesday, stressing that the firings were "without cause" and implying the White House may be seeking to stymie unspecified political corruption cases.

"The public response has been shock," Sen. Feinstein said on the Senate floor Tuesday. "Peter Nunez, who served as the San Diego U.S. attorney from 1982 to 1988 has said, 'This is like nothing I've ever seen in my 35-plus years.' "

Replies Andrew C. McCarthy, a senior fellow at the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies, in a Jan. 17 piece for the National Review, "Yes, the public, surely, is about as 'shocked, shocked' as Claude Raines' Captain Renault, and one is left to wonder whether Mr. Nunez spent the 1990s living under a rock."

What Mr. McCarthy is referring to is the fact that one of President Bill Clinton's first official acts upon taking office in 1993 was to fire every single United States attorney then serving -- with the sole exception of Michael Chertoff, now Homeland Security secretary, but at the time U.S. attorney for the district of New Jersey, which put him in a position to be rescued by the personal intervention of powerful New Jersey Democratic Sen. Bill Bradley.

"Were the attorneys Clinton fired guilty of misconduct or incompetence?" Mr. McCarthy asks. "No. As a class they were able (and, it goes without saying, well-connected.) Did he shove them aside to thwart corruption investigations into his own party? No. It was just politics, plain and simple. Patronage is the chief spoil of electoral war."

Not only that, the very same Democrats who are now up in arms sat by quietly in 1993 as Bill Clinton fired U.S. attorneys "sweepingly and without cause," possibly because Mr. Clinton was firing prosecutors who had been appointed by Republican Presidents Reagan and Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0118858

Whereas, given that U.S. attorneys serve four-year appointments, while George W. Bush has now been president for six, President Bush is now firing U.S. attorneys who he himself appointed or re-appointed.

Oh, the humanity!

Sen. Feinstein also predicts the president will use his power to make interim appointments to these offices, thus sidestepping Senate confirmation.

Time will tell.

But as Mr. McCarthy points out, Mr. Clinton did that -- in cases such as that of Justice Department civil-rights division chief Bill Lann Lee -- even though it was of dubious legality at the time.

Now such interim appointments pending confirmation -- should the president find it necessary to take that route -- are perfectly legal, thanks to a provision of the Patriot Act reauthorization bill, approved last year by the, um ... the U.S. Senate.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron's Former Treasurer To End Home Confinement (AP)

By John Porretto, AP Business Writer

AP, January 19, 2007

HOUSTON — Ben Glisan Jr., the first former Enron executive to go directly to jail after pleading guilty to conspiracy in 2003, is expected to finish a stint of home confinement after three years in prison, his attorney and the federal Bureau of Prisons said Thursday.

Glisan, the former Enron treasurer, pleaded guilty on Sept. 10, 2003, in the corporate scandal that brought down the energy company and rocked Wall Street. He received a five-year sentence.

Glisan, 37 at the time of his plea, spent time in two federal prisons in Texas — one near Bastrop, the other in Beaumont — before being confined to his Houston home since September, Bureau of Prisons spokeswoman Felicia Ponce said. That confinement is scheduled to end Sunday, Ponce said.

Glisan's attorney, Tom Allen, said his client will be on probation once he's free to leave home, but he didn't elaborate.

"There is a plea agreement, and there are certain conditions that will continue pursuant to the plea agreement," Allen said.

During court proceedings, Glisan admitted helping design financial deals that enriched him and illegally kept investment losses off Enron's books.

He agreed to forfeit nearly $1 million in profits from an off-the-books deal at Enron and agreed to not seek a refund of $412,000 in income taxes he paid on that profit.

Twenty-three counts against Glisan were dismissed, including money laundering and fraud. He had pleaded innocent in May 2003 to 24 charges as part of a 109-count indictment against Andrew Fastow, his one-time boss and former Enron finance chief.

Last year, he testified against former Enron chief executive Jeffrey Skilling and company founder Kenneth Lay. Skilling and Lay were convicted last May on numerous counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and other charges. Skilling entered prison in December; Lay died of a heart attack July 5.

Glisan was fired in November 2001, less than a month before Enron filed for bankruptcy, when an internal probe revealed his $1 million profit from a $5,800 investment in one of several deals at the heart of the Justice Department's case against Fastow.

As recently as this month, former Enron executive Richard Causey reported to prison to begin serving 5 1/2 years for his role in the company's collapse. Causey, Enron's former chief accounting officer, pleaded guilty to securities fraud in 2005 shortly before he was scheduled to be tried with Enron founder Lay and Skilling.

From Ethics Overseer To Hedge Fund Boss (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

As the court-appointed guardian and self-described fixer of some of America's most wayward companies, Richard C. Breeden, the former top securities regulator, is considered a pillar of corporate ethics and governance.

Now he trying to become another paragon — that of savvy investor in troubled companies. And in the coming months he will face his first major test: taking on the Applebee's International restaurant chain in a proxy fight.

Mr. Breeden's fledgling advocacy hedge fund, Breeden Partners, which owns a 5.2 percent stake in Applebee's, began its battle last month, when Mr. Breeden nominated four close friends to its board.

DOJ_NMG_0118859

Hedge funds, the lucrative private investment pools for institutions like endowments and pensions, and for the wealthy, are nearly always managed by former Wall Street traders or money managers.

Mr. Breeden — a Harvard-trained securities lawyer — has no investing experience. But he is seeking to bring his knowledge of securities laws and corporate governance into investing in underperforming companies.

Some in the business are skeptical.

"I guess I wonder, how does a guy with no investment management experience run a hedge fund?" asked Philip Goldstein of Bulldog Investors, which runs hedge funds similar in style and intent to that of Mr. Breeden. "You get the guys leaving Goldman Sachs and raising $2 billion, but this is even more astonishing — he doesn't have a track record."

Mr. Goldstein added that "it's kind of like starting at the top — you'd think you'd want to work at a hedge fund for a while."

But what Mr. Breeden may lack in investing experience, he makes up for in other ways, according to his friends, who cite his hard-driving nature, his intellect, his attention to detail and his decisiveness, if marred at times by a divalike attitude.

"If it's a bad idea, Richard will kick it down the toilet and flush," said Laurence E. Harris, a lawyer in Washington who is one of four close friends that Mr. Breeden nominated last month to the board of directors at Applebee's, with a view to gaining a say in how the company is run.

Mr. Breeden "knows what to look for," Mr. Harris said. "He's a lot less likely to be fooled than a lot of people who are pure investors, because he understands the mechanics of corporate governance and securities laws."

Mr. Breeden, 57, declined to comment for this article.

He has not only has a new professional life, but a new personal one as well. Last year, Mr. Breeden married a trust administrator of the Bennett Funding Group, which he had overseen as the court-appointed monitor. (He and his first wife, Holly, were divorced in 2005 after 27 years of marriage.)

Mr. Breeden is now perhaps the most senior former government official ever to run a hedge fund. Mr. Breeden oversaw the Securities and Exchange Commission from 1989 to 1993.

He then ran one of the world's largest accounting firms, Coopers & Lybrand, before establishing his private firm, Richard C. Breeden & Company, in Greenwich, Conn., to advise companies hobbled by ethics and governance problems.

In recent years, he has served as the high-profile outside monitor for scandal-plagued firms like WorldCom, which filed for bankruptcy in 2002 and Conrad Black's former company, Hollinger International. It was when he was overseeing the bankruptcy of WorldCom, later MCI, that Mr. Breeden first began thinking about starting a hedge fund, according to friends and associates. Seeing the roles played by the Mexican tycoon Carlos Slim Helú and Mark Neporent of the hedge fund Cerberus Capital as investors in MCI, he asked Mr. Harris, "I'm thinking of starting a hedge fund — what do you think?"

Mr. Harris, who recalled the conversation, said Mr. Breeden told him, "The one thing I don't want to do is fail."

Mr. Breeden's right-hand man at Breeden Partners is his friend Steven J. Quamme, a one-time mergers-and-acquisitions lawyer with whom Mr. Breeden once worked at Baker Botts, the Washington law firm.

When asked who was running the hedge fund — in other words, picking companies in which to invest, Mr. Harris replied, "I don't think you can actually separate Richard and Steve — they're joined at the hip."

Mr. Quamme did not return calls requesting comment.

An entrepreneur as well as an investor, Mr. Quamme has picked some winners in his past jobs, including a chain of video stores that was sold to Blockbuster Video early last decade and a chunk of the Einstein Brothers Bagels franchises.

Mr. Quamme, whom Mr. Breeden also nominated to serve on the Applebee's board, has also endured some setbacks. His 50 percent stake in Boston Chicken, through Mayfair Partners, an investing partnership that he ran in the mid-1990s, went stale in 1998 when the restaurant and the partnership both filed for bankruptcy.

It is, of course, far too early to tell whether Mr. Breeden's knowledge and experience will make his hedge fund, whose philosophy is to invest in American companies with fixable problems in policy and governance, a winner.

Some analysts do not see his fund making an impact on Applebee's.

"We do not see a dramatic shift near-term in the company's strategic direction that would lead to the 'value creating' programs proposed by the activist," Andrew Barish, an analyst with Banc of America Securities wrote earlier this month.

Applebee's declined to comment on Mr. Breeden's proposals.

The fund sought to raise $1.25 billion but has so far brought in only around $500 million, including $400 million from Calpers, the California pension fund. The hedge fund earned 7.73 percent in the third quarter of 2006, according to the most recent available data from Calpers.

To some, Mr. Breeden's leap into the hedge fund business on the heels of serving as a court-appointed monitor for so many large companies raises questions.

DOJ_NMG_0118860

"It's an appearances problem, and it bothers me," said Michael Feiner, an ethics professor at Columbia Business School, adding that he thought government officials should be required to wait two years before working at hedge funds or lobbying groups. "I'm disappointed that he is doing this."

Mr. Breeden's spokesmen declined to answer questions on whether Breeden Partners would prohibit itself from investing in companies for which Mr. Breeden had served as a court-appointed monitor.

And the transparency that Mr. Breeden championed at the troubled companies he has overseen may go by the wayside with his new venture. Like many hedge funds, Breeden Partners has affiliated entities registered in the Cayman Islands, to take advantage of generous offshore tax benefits.

Ex-CVS Officers Are Indicted (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

PROVIDENCE, R.I. -- Two former executives at drugstore chain CVS Corp. were charged in a probe into influence peddling at the Rhode Island statehouse.

John R. "Jack" Kramer, former senior vice president for corporate affairs and government relations, and Carlos Ortiz, former vice president of government affairs, were charged with one count each of conspiracy and bribery and 21 counts each of fraud for allegedly paying former state Sen. John Celona to kill legislation CVS opposed or sponsor bills the company supported.

Mr. Celona, who resigned from the General Assembly in 2004, pleaded guilty to federal mail-fraud charges the following year and has been cooperating with the government.

Messrs. Kramer and Ortiz have been on leaves of absence from Woonsocket, R.I.-based CVS since 2004. They couldn't be reached to comment.

U.S. Attorney Robert Clark Corrente said the probe into statehouse corruption was continuing. CVS, which hasn't been charged, said it has fully cooperated with the probe.

CVS paid Mr. Celona $1,000 a month under a consulting contract -- $45,000 total, the indictment said, and he got benefits including sports tickets and trips.

CRIMINAL LAW:

U.S. Attorney General To Study Milwaukee Crime (MJS)

By Audrey Hoffer

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, January 19, 2007

Kohl asks Gonzales to look at trend, funding

Washington - Sen. Herb Kohl elicited a promise Thursday from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to look at the rise in violent crime in Milwaukee and tell him whether federal funding could be provided to bolster the police.

Gonzales testified at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing that covered issues from domestic surveillance to Internet pornography, all of which are under the jurisdiction of the U.S. Justice Department.

Kohl, a senior committee member, first raised the trend of increases in robberies and assaults in Milwaukee at a Judiciary Committee hearing last month. He asked FBI Director Robert Mueller, who was testifying at the time, to go to Milwaukee to study the problem first-hand and to give the city more federal resources in the form of additional federal agents. Mueller said he would "take a specific look at Milwaukee" but did not commit to travel there.

At the December hearing, Kohl also criticized the bureau for taking money earmarked for violent crime prevention and reallocating it to investigate terrorism.

In Thursday's hearing, Kohl repeated the charge, saying the FBI used almost 2,200 "fewer agents in 2004 on traditional crime matters than it did in 2000 due to the essential focus on terrorism."

In addition, he said, the Milwaukee Police Department received $1 million in federal money specifically for police in 2002 but last year didn't receive any. As a result, the police force was reduced by 55 officers and fewer police are on the streets.

Gonzales acknowledged that "keeping our communities and citizens safe from violent crime is a top priority for law enforcement at all levels," but most of the work is done by local police.

Kohl said local enforcement officials are bearing the burden of decreased federal funding and, therefore, cannot effectively fight the increase in crime. "We are not giving our states and localities the help that they so desperately need."

Later during the hearing, Sen. Russ Feingold, also a member of the Judiciary Committee, reminded Gonzales of his agreement with Kohl to "take a real look" at Milwaukee's crime problem and to consider awarding the city a $2.5 million grant to study ways to fight crime as part of the 18-city Safe Communities Initiative. "I hope Milwaukee is next in line for that kind of money," Feingold said.

Prosecutor Fights To Keep Bush Critics In Jury Pool For Cheney Aide's Trial (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 19, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The prosecutor sparred with defense attorneys Thursday over several potential jurors and their opinions of the Bush administration, a debate that further slowed jury selection in the trial of a former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton had hoped to have a jury seated by Thursday afternoon, but legal wrangling slowed the process. Attorneys for former I. Lewis Libby have weeded out of the jury pool the most outspoken critics of the Bush administration.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald told Walton that defense attorneys had crossed the line when they told jurors the case was political and about war policies.

"The jury will not be asked to render a verdict on the war or what they think of the war," Fitzgerald said.

Libby is accused of lying to investigators about what he told reporters regarding outed CIA operative Valerie Plame in 2003. Because Plame's husband was among the administration's most outspoken critics, the trial is set to the backdrop of the war in Iraq and politics.

Plame's identity was leaked to reporters after a newspaper article by her husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, suggested that the Bush administration intentionally misused intelligence to build up a reason for going to war against Saddam Hussein's Iraq.

The leak touched off a political scandal and an FBI investigation that Libby is accused of obstructing. Attorneys for both sides want to know how closely potential jurors have been following the case.

The composition of the jury pool is a critical pretrial issue. Libby plans to tell jurors that despite what prosecutors say, he did not lie to investigators. He says he was bogged down by national security issues and simply did not remember the conversations about Plame correctly.

If jurors come to the trial already skeptical about the credibility of Libby or Cheney, his former boss, attorneys say Libby will not get a fair trial.

Walton considered seven jurors and dismissed five people who said they could not be fair to the Bush administration or who were unsure.

"My personal feeling is the Iraq war was a tremendous, terrible mistake. It's quite a horrendous thing," said one potential juror, a management consultant. "Whether any one person or the administration is responsible for that is quite a complex question."

Only one juror had been accepted into the potential jury pool Thursday by early afternoon, and attorneys were debating whether to accept a woman who works for the CIA. Walton had hoped to have 36 qualified jurors by the end of the day. Only 25 have been approved since selection began Tuesday.

Attorneys for both sides can then eliminate jurors for any reason until 12 jurors and four alternates are seated.

Opening arguments are scheduled for Monday in a case expected to last four to six weeks.

Jury Selection In Libby Trial Moves Slowly Because Of Bias (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — The task of seating a jury for the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. did not get easier Thursday when a majority of the candidates interviewed were disqualified, mainly because they expressed deep distrust of the Bush administration and the Iraq war.

Mr. Libby, also known as Scooter, is facing five felony counts for his role in an investigation of who leaked to journalists the identity of a C.I.A. operative in July 2003 and why. The indictment charges him with lying to agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and a grand jury about whether he spoke to journalists about Valerie Wilson, the Central Intelligence Agency officer.

Mr. Libby is the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, who will be a featured witness for the defense. The attitudes of many potential jurors to Mr. Cheney and the Iraq war have upset the judge's schedule for the trial, which envisioned opening arguments Monday.

At the end of the day Thursday, the judge, Reggie M. Walton, lamented the slow pace of getting enough potential jurors for a pool to be winnowed down to 12 jurors and four alternates. So far, only 30 people have qualified; the pool must have at least 36 people to account for the number that lawyers for both sides can exclude without giving a reason.

"It took us all day to get six jurors qualified," Judge Walton said.

It was a day consumed with unexpectedly long bouts of questioning, largely from Mr. Libby's lawyers, who are trying to exclude anyone with a bias against the administration.

Of the 10 jurors who were dismissed Thursday, the views of some were quickly apparent; others came out only under detailed questioning.

In the morning, a woman who said she was an economist, told the court that she believed the war was "a terrible mistake, a horrendous mistake and a betrayal" of the country. She eventually acknowledged that such hard feelings could affect how she views testimony from Mr. Cheney and other officials.

President Bush Should Go Ahead And Pardon Libby (SCRIPPS)

By DAN K. THOMASSON, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard, January 19, 2007

If George W. Bush really wants to strike a blow for justice he should pardon I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby now before his prosecution costs the taxpayers one dime more. It is really time to put an end to one of the most bizarre and disruptive politically inspired cases in recent memory.

Libby, as most Americans know, is the scapegoat for a non- crime that involved the public identification of a one-time undercover operative of the CIA, Valerie Plame, the wife of a small time diplomat, Joseph Wilson, who tweaked the White House over its claims that Saddam Hussein was seeking nuclear material in Africa. Plame, the White House claims, had a hand in the agency's assigning her husband to investigate the claims, which were among those contentions used to justify the invasion of Iraq. Wilson found the claims unsubstantiated.

In the backlash over Wilson's report, Plame's identity as a CIA employee and her role in her husband's selection was leaked to a national columnist, Robert Novak. The CIA demanded an investigation into whether the disclosure violated an obscure law prohibiting the outing of an undercover agent. A special prosecutor, Patrick Fitzgerald, was named by the Justice Department. Fitzgerald knew the source of the leak about Plame from the outset and determined rather rapidly the law had not been violated. The original source of Plame's identification, by the way, was not Libby but Undersecretary of State Richard Armitage.

Now we are at the beginning of a senseless, albeit sensational trial brought about by Fitzgerald's decision to find someone in the White House to bring to ground despite his own discovery that no crime had been committed. He settled on Libby, an aide to Vice President Richard Cheney, whom he charged with lying to the FBI and a grand jury and obstructing justice in the pursuit of answers he (Fitzgerald) already had. Libby said he first heard about Plame from a television personality, Tim Russert, but Russert denies the claim even as he concedes he talked to Libby.

Libby says his naming Russert as a source was a mistake brought about by a busy schedule that made it difficult to remember from whom he received what. Under normal circumstances, a prosecutor might be willing to accept this explanation, particularly since Libby is a lawyer of proven merit who would understand the consequences of deliberately lying to a grand jury. It is almost inconceivable that he would lie, particularly since he knew his statement could be checked easily. But Fitzgerald, known as the Boy Scout of federal prosecutors, was as relentless as if he had just read "Les Miserables" and was a fan of the French police inspector.

There is some indication that he really wanted to nail the president's chief political advisor, Carl Rove, but settled finally on Libby, who is not known as an ideologue or even wildly political. His wife, who also is a lawyer, is in fact on the other side of most political issues, according to reports.

The effort to choose a jury this trial already has shown signs of being more a debate on Bush's Iraq policy than an effort to find justice. Those facing empanelment have been asked their feelings about the president and several have been dismissed for voicing their animosity. Shades of things to come as the testimony of everyone from Cheney to a handful of prominent journalists and TV stars begins in earnest.

This is the inside the Beltway kind of circus this town loves. It is a travesty with some long-lasting consequences from which no one emerges unscathed _ not the press, the prosecutor, the White House, the CIA, Wilson and Plame (the darlings of the Georgetown dining out set) and certainly not Libby, whose reputation as a tough, quiet but decent person already has been severely maligned. There is no constitutional crisis in this _ nothing of great national import took place. No harm was done by the disclosure that Plame, who hadn't been undercover for years, worked for the CIA.

Severe damage, however, has been done to the First Amendment by an over zealous prosecutor who, among other things, insisted on jailing a reporter for not revealing her source for a story she never wrote, undercutting a policy and tradition that has been a bulwark of press freedom since the beginning of the nation. The result is a chilling impact on the role of the Fourth Estate as the watchdog of democracy.

So, Mr. President, it is time you exercised your own constitutional prerogatives and ended this nonsense immediately. Even if an impartial jury could be selected, which is highly doubtful in this venue, the trial is an injustice.

Contractor Proves Key In Two Federal Probes (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

A key figure in the case against former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham has become a focus of the federal investigation of another Republican from California, Rep. Jerry Lewis.

The person who has emerged in both probes is Brent Wilkes, a Poway, Calif., entrepreneur, said people with knowledge of the investigation. His firm received defense and intelligence contracts with congressional help from Mr. Cunningham. The former lawmaker pleaded guilty in November to charges that included soliciting bribes from Mr. Wilkes and was sentenced to more than eight years in prison.

ETHICS QUESTIONS

· The News: A defense contractor emerges as a key figure in two federal investigations.

· The Debate: Prosecutors are looking into whether a lawmaker improperly helped companies to secure government contracts.

· What's Next: The probes are renewing attention to congressional earmarks and, more broadly, ethics reform.

Prosecutors in Los Angeles are examining whether Mr. Lewis may have improperly helped Mr. Wilkes's companies obtain government contracts. A spokeswoman for Mr. Lewis declined to comment on the investigation.

Mr. Lewis is under investigation for possible improper conduct in obtaining "earmarks," or legislative language that steers federal funds to specific recipients. The continuing investigation into his actions is significant because the new House Republican leadership decided to keep Mr. Lewis, of California, on the Appropriations Committee as the top minority member, despite the probe. He had been chairman until Democrats took control of the House this month.

Mr. Lewis has represented California's 41st district since 1979. He was chairman of an appropriations subcommittee on armed services before moving up to become chairman of the Appropriations Committee in January 2005.

The inquiry promises to sustain the debate over congressional earmarks, which has been at the center of this year's attempt to enact new ethics rules for Congress. The House has passed a bill imposing major restrictions although a vote yesterday cast doubt on whether a similar bill will be approved by the Senate.

Prosecutors designated Mr. Wilkes an unindicted co-conspirator in the charges against Mr. Cunningham. Mr. Wilkes himself has been under investigation separately, by the same federal prosecutors in San Diego who investigated the Cunningham case. People with knowledge of that investigation said prosecutors are bringing in last-minute witnesses before a grand jury and expect Mr. Wilkes will be indicted early next month. These people said Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney in San Diego who has been asked to resign by the Justice Department, requested that prosecutors on the case wrap up the investigation and bring charges before she officially steps down Feb. 15. The Justice Department has confirmed that several U.S. attorneys were asked to step down for reasons it said were related to performance but has declined to give details.

Mark Geragos, one of Mr. Wilkes's lawyers, said, "We're comfortable that everything Brent Wilkes did was above board and legal and we don't think that there is any cause for anyone to question it, let alone indict him."

Rep. Lewis' close relationship with a Washington lobbying firm, Copeland Lowery Jacquez Denton & White, is a subject of the probe. The firm was founded by former congressman Bill Lowery, a friend of Mr. Lewis.

Copeland Lowery flourished by signing up corporate and local government clients, which subsequently won earmarks pushed through with Mr. Lewis' help. One Copeland Lowery client, the Lake Arrowhead Community Services District in California, disclosed that the lobbying firm helped obtain for it federal grants totaling $680,000. After the University of Redlands hired Copeland Lowery, it obtained Mr. Lewis's help in securing $21.5 million in federal money for research and a new science center.

One matter under investigation is the tens of millions of dollars in earmarks Mr. Lewis obtained for clients of the firm, which since has split up. Prosecutors also are focusing on campaign contributions Mr. Wilkes and his associates made to Mr. Lewis, and contracts Mr. Wilkes's companies obtained after hiring Copeland Lowery. Among other things, they are looking for possible evidence that Mr. Lewis directed Mr. Wilkes to hire Copeland Lowery as the price for getting earmarks passed, said the people with knowledge of the case.

Barbara Comstock, a spokeswoman for Mr. Lewis, said she wouldn't have any comment on possible links between Messrs. Lewis and Wilkes.

Prosecutors have cast a wide net, some months ago subpoenaing voluminous records from county and local governments in Southern California and companies, all of which hired Copeland Lowery to lobby for them. Many received federal money for local projects with Mr. Lewis's help. People close to the case said prosecutors have focused heavily on contracts awarded to Mr. Wilkes's companies and large campaign contributions he made.

Records on file with the House clerk show Copeland Lowery lobbied on behalf of one Wilkes company, ADCS Inc., from 1998 to 2000, and from 2002 to 2005. ADCS, or Automated Document Conversion Systems, specialized in converting military documents on paper into computerized records. Beginning in 1997, with help from members of the appropriations committee, including Mr. Cunningham, the Poway, Calif., company began winning multimillion-dollar military contracts. Copeland Lowery disclosed receiving about $160,000 for the work. After Mr. Wilkes' name surfaced publicly last year in connection with the corruption investigations, Copeland Lowery revised its disclosure reports to state that it received more than $340,000 from ADCS. A lawyer for Copeland Lowery said the error was inadvertent.

The Project on Government Oversight, a nonpartisan organization that focuses on exposing government corruption, last year found a travel report showing that Mr. Lewis traveled from Washington to visit ADCS headquarters in 1998, shortly before ADCS received a government contract. Mr. Lewis' office confirmed that in the early 1990s, he traveled to Belize on a trip sponsored by Mr. Lowery that included Mr. Wilkes, among others.

Federal campaign records also show Mr. Wilkes and five employees or relatives donated on the same date in 1999 a total of $11,000 to Mr. Lewis's campaign fund. Mr. Wilkes and related individuals also contributed $7,000 in early 1998.

On Sept. 18, 2002, Mr. Wilkes, his wife, nephew and two employees donated $10,000 to Mr. Lewis's Future Leaders Political Action Committee. In 2003, Mr. Wilkes donated another $2,000 to the fund. Mr. Lewis, as with many congressional leaders, maintained the PAC to collect funds that then could be doled out to help fellow Republican lawmakers who faced re-election fights. That largess was credited with helping Mr. Lewis get the Republican leadership's backing to become appropriations chairman.

Mr. Wilkes and people associated with him donated in total about $60,000 to Mr. Lewis' campaign fund or political-action committee. (Mr. Cunningham received campaign donations of $84,500 from Mr. Wilkes and associates.)

It is illegal for a congressman to support legislation as a direct quid pro quo for campaign contributions, but direct links between contributions and actions are difficult to prove. The government must show that the lawmaker took official action only because of the donation. The Constitution's "speech and debate" clause also prevents prosecutors from using evidence from congressional debates, and limits their access to records or testimony about meetings lawmakers held to discuss legislation.

The Los Angeles prosecutors examining Mr. Lewis' actions are looking for a possible direct link, the people with knowledge of the investigation said.

In January 2003, longtime Lewis aide Letitia White left his staff to become a Copeland Lowery partner. Another top aide to Mr. Lewis, Jeffrey Shockey, left the congressman's staff in 1999 to work for the firm. He then returned to become the appropriations committee's deputy staff director when Mr. Lewis became chairman.

Through a spokesman, Copeland Lowery principals have denied any wrongdoing. A spokesman for the principals said "the firm's work is consistent with the laws, rules and regulations that govern federal lobbying." He declined to comment further.

The Cunningham case involved soliciting direct bribes for personal use. According to Mr. Cunningham's plea agreement, Mr. Wilkes paid $636,000 in bribes, including $525,000 to pay off a mortgage on Mr. Cunningham's home.

Man, 26, Admits His Role In Fatal Fight (BOS)

The Boston Globe, January 19, 2007

SOMERVILLE

A 26-year-old Somerville man pleaded guilty yesterday to second-degree murder in Middlesex Superior Court in Lowell, admitting that he helped another man kill Ryan Sullivan, 16, in Somerville during a fight on Warwick Street in July 2004. Van Gustave was sentenced to life in prison with the possibility of parole after 15 years, the Middlesex district attorney's office reported. Prosecutors said Gustave and Joseph Spinucci, who was convicted last year of first-degree murder, got into an argument with a friend of Sullivan's that escalated into the murder.

CAMBRIDGE

R.J. Reynolds responds to nicotine report Responding to a Harvard study on nicotine levels, cigarette maker R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. said in a statement yesterday that the company "does not have a program to systematically increase the nicotine content or smoke nicotine yields of its products." Researchers from the Harvard School of Public Health issued a report yesterday that examined industry-supplied data on the nicotine content of cigarettes as well as other factors in cigarettes that can affect nicotine delivery. The Harvard researchers confirmed an earlier Massachusetts Department of Public Health study that showed an upward trend in inhalable nicotine levels. The Harvard report also found that actual nicotine content in the tobacco used in cigarettes increased from 1997 to 2005.

MIAMI

Retired FBI agent's murder trial delayed A Miami judge agreed yesterday to a defense request to delay the murder trial of retired FBI special agent John J. Connolly Jr. until Oct. 22 to give lawyers more time to prepare. Connolly was indicted in May 2005 on state murder charges in allegedly helping longtime informants James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi orchestrate a 1982 gangland slaying in Florida. The victim, John B. Callahan, a Winchester financier , was killed allegedly because the gangsters feared he would tell the FBI they were involved in the slaying of Tulsa businessman Roger Wheeler, who owned World Jai Alai. Connolly, 66, is serving a 10-year prison term for his 2002 conviction on federal racketeering and obstruction of justice charges for protecting Bulger and Flemmi from prosecution.

Teachers OK English High as pilot school Teachers in Boston's English High School agreed yesterday to turn the troubled school into a Commonwealth pilot school, converting the 1,300-student school into a smaller college preparatory school starting in September. Under the school's proposal, which 81 percent of teachers approved, the school will set tougher graduation requirements, require daily courses focused on getting students into college, and institute a longer school day. The school will be divided into two communities of 400 students each. In November, the state Board of Education offered English High and three other schools a chance to fix themselves by becoming pilot schools, which gives teachers and principals more flexibility in budgets, schedules, and curriculum.

Suffolk names new law school dean A former Indiana University law school dean will replace Robert Smith as dean of Suffolk University Law School on July 1, the school announced yesterday. Alfred Aman Jr. is now director of the Institute for Advanced Study and a law professor at Indiana University, and he has also worked at Cornell Law School and in England, France, and Italy. During Smith's eight-year tenure, Suffolk opened graduate and international programs at Suffolk. After a sabbatical, he will return to teaching. The school enrolls about 1,600 students.

DA wants Worthington evidence sealed Prosecutors have filed a motion to seal permanently the graphic photographs and video used in the trial of a trash collector convicted of killing former fashion writer Christa Worthington. Cape and Islands District Attorney Michael O'Keefe filed the motion in Barnstable Superior Court on Tuesday after a CBS television request earlier this month to gain access to pictures and video from the trial. Christopher M. McCowen was convicted in November of murdering and raping Worthington in her Truro home in 2002. Evidence during the five-week trial included horrific crime scene photos and police video of Worthington's body. The images should be kept from the public because of their "personal nature" and "to protect the privacy of Worthington's family and estate," the district attorney's motion said. (AP)

Ney's Friends, Foes Speak Out Before His Sentencing Friday (GANNETT)

By Malia Rulon, Gannett News Service

Gannett, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — The federal judge who will sentence disgraced former Rep. Bob Ney to prison Friday has received a barrage of opinions about how much prison time he should get, according to documents filed Thursday.

Most of the 75 letters sent to the judge came from supporters, including a handwritten note from Ney's parents, and letters from childhood friends, his doctor, local officials, including Dover Mayor Richard P. Homrighausen, and several former staff members and campaign workers.

"Frankly, we are all disappointed with the activities in which he engaged that led to his conviction, however, I want to assure you that he has many other admirable traits that we believe are worthy of your consideration," wrote Brook A. Cheney, who was a classmate of Ney's at Ohio State University.

Ney, of Heath, pleaded guilty in October to two felony charges of conspiracy to commit fraud and making false statements. The charges stem from a series of free trips, meals and gifts Ney accepted from convicted former Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff and others in exchange for official favors.

His actions carry a maximum sentence of 10 years and a $500,000 fine, but Justice Department prosecutors have agreed as part of Ney's plea deal to ask for a little over two years in prison and between $5,000 and $60,000 in fines.

DOJ_NMG_0118866

Nine letters came from people who want U.S. District Judge Ellen Huvelle to sentence Ney to the maximum amount of time possible.

"If the punishment really fit the crime, he'd have been shot at sunrise," Ben Alvin Walker wrote. "Throw the book at him; throw two books at him."

The former six-term congressman has been undergoing treatment for alcohol abuse since September, and in court papers, his lawyers have asked Huvelle to allow him to continue his treatment while incarcerated.

Several letters also included requests that Ney continue his treatment.

"Bob was a functioning alcoholic who could rarely make it through the day without drinking and would often begin drinking beers as early as 7:30 a.m., " wrote Matt Parker, Ney's former campaign manager.

Parker wrote that Ney has been attending recovery meetings sometimes as early as 7 a.m. and often three times a day.

"I am pleading for Bob to be able to continue with rehabilitation programs while he is incarcerated," Parker wrote.

Charges Filed In Killing Of Beaumont Boy (LAT)

By Maeve Reston, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

A drifter who murdered and abducted members of an Idaho family is accused in the long-unsolved case of Anthony Martinez.

INDIO — A drifter who brutally murdered at least three members of an Idaho family in 2005 and kidnapped two of their young children was charged Thursday with the decade-old slaying of a 10-year-old Beaumont boy abducted at knifepoint near his backyard.

The 1997 killing of Anthony Martinez weighed heavily on the town of Beaumont, where billboards pleading for information about Anthony's disappearance remained for years.

Joseph Edward Duncan III, 43, was named as a suspect in Anthony's death in 2005 after he reportedly told FBI agents he was involved in the slaying. Investigators also said Duncan's fingerprint was discovered near Anthony's body, which was found nude and bound with duct tape on a remote canyon road north of Indio.

Riverside County Dist. Atty. Rod Pacheco on Thursday announced that Duncan had been charged with first-degree murder, and the newly elected prosecutor vowed to seek the death penalty.

Duncan, a convicted sex offender, pleaded guilty in October to three murder and three kidnapping charges in Idaho and is awaiting his final sentence for those crimes.

During that rampage, Duncan bludgeoned to death Brenda Groene; her fiance, Mark McKenzie; and her 13-year-old son, Slade Groene, inside their home near Coeur d'Alene. He then kidnapped the other two children in the house, 8-year-old Shasta Groene and her 9-year-old brother, Dylan.

A Coeur d'Alene waitress ended the nationwide hunt for Duncan when she recognized Shasta Groene, whose face was on "missing" fliers around town, at a Denny's in July 2005. Dylan Groene was later found dead at a Montana campsite.

On Thursday, just hours after Pacheco's news conference, a federal grand jury in Idaho indicted Duncan in the killings of Dylan Groene and the kidnapping of the two Groene children, which may make it more difficult for Riverside County authorities to extradite Duncan to California any time soon.

To prevent California from prosecuting Duncan first, federal officials in Idaho scrambled over the weekend to file a complaint against Duncan in federal court for taking a stolen Jeep across state lines.

"We've been aware that a number of places had an interest" in Duncan, said Jean McNeil, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Idaho. "We just wanted to make sure that he has to stand trial for these charges and he has to do that soon."

State prosecutors in Idaho have said they would seek the death penalty for the three killings in the house if Duncan escapes it in his federal trial for the kidnapping of the two remaining Groene children, the killing of Dylan Groene and the sexual assault of both. Duncan was sentenced to three consecutive life terms at the state level without parole for kidnapping.

The announcement of the Riverside County murder charges in the Anthony Martinez case marked the end of a long and often frustrating investigation by state, county and federal officials, who chased down about 15,000 leads before they found their suspect eight years later.

In the same press conference Thursday in Indio, Riverside County Sheriff Bob Doyle spoke directly to Anthony's mother, Diane Gonzales, who held back tears.

"While we cannot bring Anthony back to you, we can bring his killer to justice," Doyle said.

Anthony was playing outside with his brothers and friends in April 1997 when a man approached in a white sedan asking for help looking for his cat.

DOJ_NMG_0118867

He jumped out of his car, pulled a knife from his waistband and grabbed Anthony, who struggled as he was dragged into the car.

Hundreds of law officers descended on Riverside County, combing the remote canyons and surrounding areas on horseback, on foot and in helicopters. Fifteen days later, a federal Bureau of Land Management employee on patrol spotted Anthony's body.

Mitch White, a lead investigator on the case with the Beaumont police, said investigators struggled for years as one lead after another fell through.

"I thought sooner or later, given the nature of this guy, he would get caught on some other crime," said White, a retired lieutenant. "We believed that he was not going to stop, that this was not an isolated thing."

Pacheco said prosecutors decided to seek the death penalty because of the vulnerability of the victim, the brutality of the crime and Duncan's record. Investigators believe Anthony was killed by blunt force against a rock, and he was sexually assaulted.

Duncan first served time for the 1980 rapes of a 14-year-old boy in Washington state. He told psychiatrists at a state mental hospital that he had raped other boys, as young as 12.

Anthony's mother said her family had wrestled with the death penalty question.

"We came up with the conclusion that we would stand by whatever the district attorney decided to do in the case of Joseph Duncan — provided that Joseph Duncan never see the light of day again, whether that be through death or incarceration for the rest of his life," Gonzales said. "We believe justice will prevail whether it be through the courts or through the eyes of God."

RETHINKING REHAB Treatment For Prisoners Draws Fire Over Scientology (WSJ)

By Lauren Etter

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. -- Last November, in a cedar sauna cranked up to 160 degrees, a crowd of sweaty men read books and chatted amid mariachi music. They emerged to nibble from a tray of raw vegetables or take shots of olive oil.

This is not a spa. This is Second Chance, one of the country's most unusual alternatives to the nation's prison systems. Founded by a Scientologist and former real-estate developer -- and funded partly by federal tax dollars -- Second Chance is a treatment program for nonviolent prisoners with substance-abuse problems.

It is based on principles of L. Ron Hubbard, founder of the Scientology religion, who argued that toxins from drugs and pesticides accumulate in the body's fatty tissues, making it difficult for addicts to kick their habit. Saunas and vitamins are intended to purge these residues. Facing few options for successful long-term ways to treat criminal defendants with serious drug problems, 24 of New Mexico's 84 district judges have sentenced more than 50 prisoners to terms at Second Chance.

Even before it opened its doors to inmates last September, Second Chance and its unconventional methods had ignited a controversy in New Mexico's legal community. At the center of the debate are two former friends and sometime adversaries. William Lang, chief district judge in the area that includes Albuquerque, doesn't want his colleagues to sentence inmates to Second Chance. On the other side is Judge Lang's predecessor, W. John Brennan, who was hired by Second Chance to convince judges to do just that.

"There's a dire need for a secure residential facility for defendants with substance-abuse problems," says District Judge Ross Sanchez. He has sent three inmates to Second Chance, where the minimum stay is six months.

'Highly Suspicious'

But Judge Lang says he is "highly suspicious" of the program. "If it is connected to Scientology, just say so," he says. Second Chance officials and a spokeswoman for the Church of Scientology say there are no ties.

For most of his 25-year career, Mr. Brennan was a highly respected member of the legal community. He and Judge Lang were close; Mr. Brennan presided over Judge Lang's wedding 18 years ago. But the men had a falling out in 2002, when Judge Lang unsuccessfully attempted to gather enough votes from judges to unseat Judge Brennan.

Then, late one night in May 2004, Judge Brennan was arrested. Within four months he had resigned as judge and pleaded guilty to drunk driving and cocaine possession. He was sentenced to a year's probation. Judge Lang assumed Mr. Brennan's post as chief judge of New Mexico's Second Judicial District.

Now a consultant for Second Chance, Mr. Brennan believes that Judge Lang is cool toward the program because of his personal grudges. "I think it has to do with me," says Mr. Brennan, who lobbies judges to send convicts to Second Chance. "I don't think it has to do with the program." He adds Judge Lang's own battle with alcoholism makes him skeptical of unorthodox treatment programs.

DOJ_NMG_0118868

Judge Lang, who attends Alcoholics Anonymous meetings, says personal grudges have nothing to do with his skepticism about Second Chance. Judge Lang says he believes funding for treatment should go to existing programs that have a track record.

Now the $350,000 in federal funds granted to Second Chance is running out. Last month Mr. Brennan appeared with one state representative before New Mexico's Legislative Finance Committee and asked for $3.6 million for the program.

Second Chance is the brainchild of Rick Pendery, a former real-estate developer who says he has spent decades studying world religions with a focus on the writings of Mr. Hubbard.

In 1995 Mr. Pendery opened the first Second Chance program in Ensenada, Mexico, using his own money and funds from the Mexican government. His first attempts to open a program in the U.S. failed.

Then in 2002, Mr. Pendery gave a presentation on Second Chance to a conference of women legislators in San Diego and took about 60 of them to Ensenada. Anna Crook, a Republican state legislator from New Mexico, came away impressed, she says.

Ms. Crook asked New Mexico's Department of Corrections to work with Second Chance to establish a pilot project. The department declined because Second Chance isn't a "good fit," according to a spokeswoman. Undeterred, Ms. Crook says she then went to Washington and secured $350,000 for Second Chance from the 2004 appropriations bill.

With federal funds approved, Mr. Pendery says the "overwhelming majority" of the remaining $300,000 needed to start Second Chance came from businessman Randall Suggs, a Scientologist who owns a stake in the Arizona Diamondbacks baseball team. The state of New Mexico later allocated $300,000. Mr. Suggs didn't return phone calls.

Another Challenge

Second Chance's next challenge was to persuade judges to send addicts convicted of either misdemeanors or felonies to the program. In September 2005, Mr. Pendery approached Mr. Brennan, who had recently returned from two months of rehabilitation at the Betty Ford Center. Mr. Brennan wanted to get back into the criminal-justice field, but says he initially wasn't sure what Scientology was. After trying some of the Second Chance treatments himself, Mr. Brennan was sold and signed on.

"In the back of my mind I thought five years down the line, if this works, I'll have some sort of public redemption," he says.

In August 2006, Mr. Brennan was scheduled to make a presentation about Second Chance to a panel of New Mexico criminal judges. Judge Lang made his opposition clear. "I suggested it would probably not be a good idea" for Mr. Brennan to give the presentation, says Mr. Lang. "The whole pall that [the arrest] cast over the court, and the great cloud of suspicion, had not completely lifted."

Ultimately, Mr. Brennan didn't make the presentation. He says he was told Judge Lang didn't want him entering the courthouse, an account Judge Lang disputes.

Last summer, Judge Lang cautioned many of New Mexico's district judges and Kari Brandenburg, district attorney for the Second Judicial District, about the program, he says. Ms. Brandenburg argues any kind of treatment -- however unusual -- is better than no treatment at all. "We need to have an open mind," she says. "If it doesn't work we'll get rid of it."

The center received its first inmate in September. Currently, about half of the inmates who are qualified to go to Second Chance ultimately go to the program, Mr. Brennan says.

Still, some judges are balking. "I'm not ordering or sentencing anybody to that program at this time," said Judge Denise Barela Shepherd at a Nov. 8 hearing where she sentenced a probation violator to prison instead. In an interview, Ms. Shepherd said there isn't enough evidence for her to conclude the program works.

Mr. Hubbard's principles have been taken to prisons before. For many years a program called Criminon, also based on Mr. Hubbard's teachings, has operated drug-intervention programs in jails. But Second Chance represents the first time in the U.S. that an incarceration facility has been designed around Mr. Hubbard's methods, which involve not just behavioral treatments but saunas and specific diets as well.

Located on a tumbleweed-strewn patch of desert, Second Chance's cement structure is ringed by a chain-link fence topped with barbed wire. Inside, linoleum hallways give way to an open dormitory. A nearby room houses the sauna, which is used by every inmate for a four-week period, five hours a day.

Inmates eat organic beef. They choose from an array of vitamins to ingest, including potassium pills if they're feeling dizzy, or bioplasma pills to offset salt depletion. Inmates addicted to heroin can get a massage, called a "nerve assist," from another inmate. Scientologists believe nerve assists help drugs depart the body.

In addition to saunas and specific diets, Second Chance focuses on helping inmates communicate more effectively, on the belief that better communication skills will reduce offenders' need to act out in negative ways.

One recent morning, Vincent Gutierrez, 29 years old, who has been in and out of jail for drug use since age 13, sat with a group of other inmates working on a series of communication drills that are also based on techniques developed by Mr. Hubbard.

Bull-Baiting

One drill, called bull-baiting, is designed to help participants learn how to tolerate verbal assaults. Mr. Gutierrez stared into the eyes of another inmate stationed three feet away. As his partner yelled scripted statements at him like "You look like a frog!" Mr. Gutierrez was supposed to remain impassive. Another drill has inmates sit opposite each other, look each other in the eye and read lines from Lewis Carroll's Alice in Wonderland.

Mr. Gutierrez says the drills have helped him "figure it out the positive way instead of using my knuckles."

Mr. Pendery says that by addressing the root causes of drug abuse, his program reduces the number of inmates who return to jail after being released. He says a study shows that the Second Chance program in Ensenada resulted in a drop in recidivism rates to 10% from 83% over a six-year period. The Mexico program recently closed its doors after losing its government funding, he says.

Advocates say Second Chance also saves money because it doesn't require maximum-security guards and doesn't administer pharmaceutical drugs. It costs about $55 a day for one inmate in the Second Chance program, compared with about $70 a day for an inmate at the county jail.

Bill Miller, an addiction expert and a retired professor of psychiatry at the University of New Mexico, reviewed Second Chance at the request of the city of Albuquerque. "There's a lot of use of sauna with the idea that you sweat out toxins in the system. I don't know of any scientific basis for that," he says. "It wasn't clear to me what sort of scientific basis there was even for the conception of the program to begin with."

Does it work? "Basically we just don't know," he says.

Teen Says He Was 'Terrified' Of Captor (WP)

By Kari Lydersen

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Michael J. Devlin, the suburban St. Louis man accused of abducting two boys and holding one for four years, pleaded not guilty yesterday in Franklin County, Mo., court to one count of kidnapping in last week's abduction of William "Ben" Ownby, 13.

Devlin was also charged with felony kidnapping and felony armed criminal action in nearby Washington County, Mo., on Wednesday in the 2002 abduction of Shawn Hornbeck, 15. Prosecutor John D. Rupp Jr. has alleged that Devlin, 41, initially brandished a handgun to control Shawn, then 11 years old.

Shawn told Oprah Winfrey during an interview aired yesterday that he did not try to flee from Devlin because he was "terrified," even though he would regularly ride his bike alone and had access to a cellphone and a computer. He confirmed that he posted a message signed "Shawn Devlin" on the Web site that his parents, Pam and Craig Akers, set up to search for him and other missing children. The post, which asked how long the Akerses planned to look for their son, was an effort to send a signal, he told Winfrey.

The Akerses told Winfrey they thought Shawn had been sexually abused during his time with Devlin, though they said they had not asked him directly.

Hornbeck and Ownby were found last week after police recognized Devlin's white pickup truck while serving a warrant to another resident at the apartment complex where he lived.

Sharon Cooper, a forensic pediatrician at the University of North Carolina and a consultant for the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, said it would not be hard for someone such as Devlin to make an 11-year-old afraid to leave.

"At that age, it's very easy to convince them of anything once you have removed them from their support system," she said. "He was in such isolation, deprived of his family, deprived of school and normal social contact, he was in a circumstance without other outlets to help him make a decision. He's totally helpless and having to rely almost totally on an offender for his basic needs -- food, clothing, shelter. He is dependent on that individual for his own survival."

Devlin's relatives, locally well known, did not know until the arrest that he had children living with him. For security reasons, he made his not-guilty plea via closed-circuit television, and he declined to make a statement.

The Franklin County prosecutor's office, which would not comment further, said Devlin's first hearing will be March 15. His attorneys are asking for a change of venue for the trial. Devlin is being held in isolation in the Franklin County Jail in lieu of $1 million bail, and his bail is set at $3 million in Washington County.

The U.S. attorney's office in St. Louis has been working with local prosecutors, but no federal charges have been filed, said local Justice spokeswoman Jan Diltz. An FBI spokesman in St. Louis said federal charges will be considered.

Detectives in Lincoln County, Mo., an hour's drive from St. Louis, are looking for clues that might link Devlin to the disappearance of Charles Arlin Henderson, who was 11 when he vanished while riding his bike in 1991, or to the case of Bianca Piper, who disappeared from a rural road in March 2005, when she was 13. Police in nearby St. Charles are also investigating whether Devlin could be linked to the disappearance 19 years ago of Scott Kleeschulte, then 9.

DOJ_NMG_0118870

"When you look at Ben, Shawn and Arlin, there are some striking similarities, both physically and in the way they disappeared," said Lt. Rick Harrell, spokesman for the Lincoln County sheriff's department. "Like Shawn, Arlin was on his bike in a rural area. And Bianca is female, but we can't automatically discount her case either. When you have Ben and Shawn found alive, you have a glimmer of hope that we'll find our missing kids and get them back in their parents' arms."

Faith-based Initiative (WT)

By Deborah Simmons

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

Every year, 600,000 or so prisoners are given their walking papers to return to a neighborhood near you. The odds of their walking the straight and narrow are overwhelmingly against them, with an estimated two-thirds likely to be rearrested within three years of their release. The annual tab is staggering because American taxpayers spend $60 billion to keep criminals behind bars (compared with the $34 billion we spent on the Department of Homeland Security's budget last fiscal year). Our wallets are wedged between a rock and a very hard place.

Sometimes, we pay upward of $40,000 per prisoner. Either we can allow policies to continue as they have been and throw good money after ornery lawmaking, or we can change course slightly and experiment. President Bush said as much in his 2004 State of the Union address: "a plan to harness the resources and experience of faith-based and community organizations in dealing with the challenges of helping returning inmates contribute to society."

Whether we like it or not, the ex-offenders are coming back, many to homes with no hearth. When they return in such large numbers, they put a strain on our police and sheriff's departments, which are responsible for keeping track of ex-offenders. Some neighborhoods are overwhelmed by the sheer number of ex-offenders, with local and county governments establishing halfway houses and group homes, and court-intervention and counseling sites in traditional residential neighborhoods — often depressing housing values in the process.

The Second Chance Act, federal legislation that has bipartisan support, offers a different course. While the bill, which failed to get through the 109th Congress, muddles some of the taut lines that ordinarily distinguish law-and-order hard-liners from progressive Democrats, it fits comfortably into the mold of compassionate conservatism with a faith-based component. In fact, the Second Chance Act helps explain why "blue states" in the Northeast are willing participants in the Bush administration's faith-based initiative when compared to "red states" and other regions, according to a 2006 study by the Joint Center for Political Studies.

Ex-offenders often return home with no family support, no job skills and no means to support themselves, circumstances that swing wide the revolving door to recidivism. Sometimes, faith is all an ex-con has.

Demetrius Davis walks in faith. Boxing since he was of school-age, he wears his Christian faith as comfortably as he does his boxing gloves. But that wasn't always so. Demetrius grew up in the ring. His father is renowned former Golden Gloves champ-turned-trainer Adrian Davis and, his mom, Brenda, is the longtime "go-to-man" for the regional Golden Gloves. (The Davises are proprietors of Round 1 Gym.) In a way, Demetrius has been punching his way through life since he was a tot.

In a recent interview, Demetrius, now 38 years old, chose his words carefully, reluctant to tell this stranger the details of why he landed himself in prison. So I let Demetrius' sleeping demons lie and allowed his explanation of becoming "a follower not a leader" speak for itself.

A lover of sports, he played football and basketball as a teen and accepted the fact that boxing is literally in his veins. He's been ranked by the International Boxing Federation, World Boxing Association, World Boxing Council and International Boxing Organization, and points out that his "dad taught me everything I know. ... He will always be my trainer."

Understand, the list of boys and men with whom Demetrius has had to share his dad is quite lengthy — Hasim Rahman, Sharmba Mitchell and William Joppy, to name a few — and they all made long green following Mr. Davis' lead. Such a list easily could shake the faith of the proudest man-child, but Demetrius doesn't flinch. "I thank the Lord for him every day," he says.

Sensing that Demetrius had become a bit more comfortable with this stranger, I turned the conversation to leadership, asking him what advice he had for boys and men who are looking in all the wrong places for leadership. "Get to know God," Demetrius replied without hesitation regarding his personal faith-based initiative. "I'm not supposed to be here talking to you right now....Get them in the gym.... They need more people who care about them around them. ... Most people don't understand. ... [They are] glorifying the bling-bling. ... [After prison] they revert back to the same environment."

"The same environment." Violent crime. Drug wars. Gangs. Gun control. Rampant substance abuse.

It costs on the front end. It costs on the back end. We pay as individuals for the consequences of our actions and as a society for the consequences of our inaction. Sometimes, we have to walk on faith and give a person a second chance.

CIVIL LAW:

Justice Dept. Tries To Block Wage Payout (BUFFNEWS)

By Matt Gryta, News Staff Reporter

Buffalo News, January 19, 2007

The U.S. Justice Department renewed efforts Wednesday to block a state court from approving payment of wages owed to 85 former employees of the government-closed St. Augustine Center.

A week ago, State Supreme Court Justice John A. Michalek refused to permit the Internal Revenue Service to intervene in the court case, which is aimed at closing the human services center's financial books and paying the back wages.

Wednesday, the Justice Department asked U.S. District Judge John V. Elfvin to quash that case, claiming that it "threatens to impair the ability of the U.S. to enforce its tax liens."

In its latest legal effort, the Justice Department has filed a federal civil action against State Supreme Court in Erie County, the state Labor Department and Adam W. Perry, the Buffalo attorney Michalek named last year to serve as receiver to close the books on the center.

"I'm very disappointed that the government is attempting to deny the employees wages that they earned" in closing down the center and ensuring all its clients were properly placed with other Buffalo-area human services agencies, Perry said.

Last February, Michalek ordered the shutdown of the debt-plagued nonprofit agency, which for decades had served Buffalo's black community.

Study On Nicotine Levels Stirs Calls For New Controls (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — A Harvard study concluding that cigarette makers have for years deliberately increased nicotine levels in cigarettes to make them more addictive led to renewed calls Thursday for greater federal oversight of the industry.

“Given the harm that tobacco causes, it shouldn’t be a game of cat-and-mouse to figure out what the industry is doing to cigarettes,” said Dr. Josh Sharfstein, commissioner of health for the City of Baltimore.

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who is now chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, promised to reintroduce within weeks a bill that would allow the Food and Drug Administration to regulate cigarettes.

Mr. Kennedy said the Harvard study, which was released this week, “is dramatic new proof that Big Tobacco is addicted to addicting millions of young smokers.”

Mr. Kennedy’s bill passed the Senate in 2004 but failed in the House. With Democrats now in control of both houses, public health advocates said they had new hope that the legislation — debated for more than a decade — could pass.

Philip Morris, the nation’s largest cigarette maker, released a statement Wednesday taking issue with the Harvard study but saying the company supported Mr. Kennedy’s bill.

The company, which is owned by the Altria Group, said its own reports showed that nicotine yields for its top-selling Marlboro brand were the same in 2006 as they were in 1997. Changes between those years, it said, “reflect that there are random variations in cigarette nicotine yields.”

The Harvard researchers analyzed data only through 2005, although they promised to include 2006 figures in future analyses.

Dr. Gregory Connolly, a professor at the Harvard School of Public Health who was a leader of the study, said there was nothing random about the growth in nicotine yields, which occurred across all cigarette brands and makers.

“We know from our data that there are intentional design changes that result in more nicotine in smoke that increases the capacity for the cigarette to cause and maintain addiction,” Dr. Connolly said.

Company representatives at Lorillard Tobacco, owned by Loews, and R. J. Reynolds Tobacco, owned by Reynolds American, did not respond to phone messages.

Cigarette makers have for decades denounced scientific efforts to measure the byproducts and effects of cigarette smoking. And for decades, experts have been arguing over the best ways to measure smoke from smoking.

One common way has been to use machines to mimic smoking. For years, these tests were done at the Federal Trade Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0118872

In recent years, however, government regulators have asked cigarette makers to do these machine tests themselves. And beginning in 1997, Massachusetts regulations required cigarette makers to file an annual report with health regulators on the results of these tests.

In August, the Massachusetts Department of Public Health issued a study showing that according to the industry's own reports, the amount of nicotine that could be inhaled from cigarettes had increased an average of 10 percent from 1998 through 2004. The report was immediately criticized by cigarette makers.

So Dr. Connolly and colleagues decided to undertake a far more sophisticated analysis of the underlying data provided by cigarette makers. The Harvard group found that nicotine yields from smoking had increased each year from 1998 through 2005, by about 11 percent altogether.

A sophisticated mathematical analysis of the data demonstrated that the increase could not be due to random variations, Dr. Connolly said.

In August, in a racketeering suit brought by the Justice Department against the tobacco industry, a federal judge found that tobacco companies had for decades "manipulated the use of nicotine so as to increase and perpetuate addiction."

In ordering strict new limitations on tobacco marketing, the judge, Gladys Kessler of Federal District Court for the District of Columbia, also said that for decades, tobacco companies had "lied, misrepresented and deceived the American public."

Julie Brill, an assistant attorney general in Vermont, said she did not think the latest study would do anything to alter a deal reached in 1998 in which the tobacco industry agreed to pay states $246 billion. The money was to settle lawsuits seeking to recover expenses related to the treatment of tobacco-related illnesses.

Ms. Brill said she was "disappointed but not surprised" by the Harvard study.

"It leads one to question how long this industry can continue to be as unregulated as it is," she said.

Dr. Richard Hurt, director of the Mayo Clinic's nicotine dependence program, said he had reviewed the Harvard analysis and found it credible. And Dr. Hurt said documents disclosed in litigation against the industry showed that cigarette makers closely controlled the nicotine content of their products.

"If anyone thinks that tobacco companies have changed for the better and are now reformed, I have some beachfront property in Nebraska I'd like to sell them," he said.

Dr. David Kessler, who as commissioner of the F.D.A. during the Clinton administration sought to impose regulatory authority over cigarette makers, said cigarette makers had been manipulating nicotine levels for decades.

"Tobacco makers still have not answered some fundamental questions about why this is happening," said Dr. Kessler, now dean of the University of California, San Francisco, School of Medicine.

Regulate Tobacco, Finally (WP)

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

FOR YEARS, the federal government has tried, ineffectively, to litigate away the effects of smoking on people and the public purse, pursuing expensive lawsuits against an industry that nevertheless continues to produce a needlessly dangerous product. Then, in 2004, it seemed that Congress might opt for a better strategy by giving the Food and Drug Administration -- which already scrutinized everything from aspirin to Alpo -- the authority to regulate tobacco products. To make the measure palatable, its sponsors attached it to a proposal that handed tobacco farmers a $10 billion buyout package. Even so, the proposal died in conference at the hands of a hostile Republican House leadership and an indifferent White House.

Now the new Democratic majority has a chance to finally pass this needed reform. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) plans to reintroduce the 2004 legislation before the end of the month, and his office foresees holding hearings on the matter shortly after. This is a good idea that has languished for too long. We hope Mr. Kennedy can stick to this timetable and that the 110th Congress quickly passes the bill.

Proponents of the legislation point out that the FDA would be able to crack down on tobacco advertising, especially that which targets children; require that packs carry much larger warning labels with much more explicit messages; and provide authoritative information about the contents of cigarettes and their dangers. Even more significant, the FDA would have the power to require reasonable changes in the composition of the product so that it would be less dangerous to smokers and those around them. As it stands, tobacco companies are generally loath to alter their products, especially if doing so is merely to protect the health of their customers.

Yesterday, yet another study was released concluding that, unregulated, tobacco companies are going precisely in the wrong direction. The Harvard School of Public Health found that the amount of nicotine delivered to smokers' lungs increased by an average of 11 percent between 1998 and 2005, reflecting an increase in cigarettes' addictive potency. Tobacco companies accomplished this not only by changing ingredients but by modifying cigarette design to encourage smokers to take more puffs from each cigarette. As common-sense policies such as high cigarette excise taxes and smoking bans reduce the prevalence of smoking nationwide, the FDA should be allowed to do the same to tobacco's harmful effects.

Truck Driver Sentenced To Life In Prison In Deadliest U.S. Human Smuggling Attempt (AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 19, 2007

(AP) - HOUSTON-A truck driver was sentenced to life in prison Thursday, avoiding a death sentence for his role in the United States' deadliest human smuggling attempt in which 19 illegal immigrants died from dehydration and suffocation inside an overheated tractor-trailer.

Tyrone Williams, 36, was convicted last month on 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting immigrants.

A jury deliberated for 5 1/2 days before sentencing Williams, himself an immigrant from Jamaica.

Williams was sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole for each of the 19 counts of transporting the illegal immigrants who died. U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal will sentence Williams on Aug. 23 for the remaining 38 counts of harboring and transporting immigrants and for the conspiracy count. The maximum sentence for the conspiracy count is life in prison.

Williams looked down as the verdict was read and gave no visible reaction. His attorney, former U.S. Rep. Craig Washington, wept and wiped his eyes with a tissue.

Later, Washington said he was crying tears of joy.

"We're grateful to God and to the jury for saving Tyrone's life," Washington said.

Prosecutor Daniel Rodriguez looked grim after the sentence was announced as his boss, U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle, spoke to reporters.

"We did everything we could to impose a sentence of death. Nineteen life sentences is not something to be disappointed about," DeGabrielle said. "One human being had the chance to let those people out. That was Tyrone Williams."

In May 2003, Williams tractor-trailer was packed with more than 70 immigrants from Mexico, Central America and the Dominican Republic. As temperatures skyrocketed inside the airtight refrigerator truck, the immigrants kicked walls, clawed at insulation, broke out taillights and screamed for help.

Nineteen of the immigrants died from dehydration, overheating and suffocation during the smuggling attempt from South Texas to Houston. Williams abandoned the trailer at a truck stop near Victoria, Texas, about 100 miles (160 kilometers) southwest of Houston.

"Justice is served from today's sentencing," Assistant Homeland Security Secretary Julie Myers said in a written statement. "We hope this significant sentence will help dissuade potential alien smugglers away from this dangerous, dehumanizing and illegal business."

Jurors, who spoke to reporters on condition of anonymity, said they began each day of deliberations with 19 seconds of silence in memory of Williams' victims.

"It will probably be a very long time before any of us passes an 18-wheeler on the freeway without looking at it twice," said juror No. 9, a teacher.

Williams' attorneys argued he never intended for the immigrants to die and did not know they were succumbing to the deadly heat until it was too late. They blamed the deaths on other members of the smuggling ring who overstuffed the trailer.

Williams' family, including his mother and father, begged the jury to spare his life during emotional testimony presented at the retrial's punishment phase.

Prosecutors said Williams deserved a death sentence because he intentionally caused the immigrants' deaths by not freeing them when he knew their lives were in danger. They also noted he failed to take life-saving measures, like turning on the trailer's air conditioning, although some survivors testified they thought it had been turned on.

Washington said Thursday that jurors told him after the sentencing that he did not spend enough time during the trial proving that Williams had turned on the air conditioning.

Relatives of the 19 victims also testified, demanding justice and telling jurors their loved ones did not deserve to die the way they did.

Williams, who lived in Schenectady, New York, was the only one of 14 people charged in the case who faced the death penalty.

This was the second time Williams was tried for the smuggling deaths.

DOJ_NMG_0118874

In 2005, a jury convicted Williams on 38 transporting counts, but he avoided a death sentence because the jury could not agree on his role in the smuggling attempt. The jury deadlocked on the 20 other counts.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the verdict, saying the jury failed to specify his role in the crime.

Jury Spares Driver In Smuggling Deaths Case (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

HOUSTON, Jan. 18 — The truck driver who carried 19 illegal immigrants to their deaths in his suffocating trailer in 2003 was spared execution on Thursday and sentenced instead to life in prison without parole.

In a punishment verdict after five days of deliberations, the federal jury that last month convicted the driver, Tyrone M. Williams, on all charges in the nation's deadliest human smuggling case rejected the government's calls for the death penalty but meted out the stiffest possible life sentence.

Mr. Williams, who turned 36 on Thursday, reacted with impassivity but was hugged by his lawyers. His lead counsel, Craig Washington, wept — "tears of joy," he later said.

The foreman of the jury of seven women and five men said outside court that the death penalty had not been a close call.

"We felt as a consensus, as a jury, he didn't deserve it," said the foreman, an airline worker and one of three jurors who agreed to be interviewed afterward but insisted that their names not be disclosed.

The United States attorney in Houston, Don DeGabrielle, said prosecutors respected the verdict.

"We did everything we could to encourage them to impose a sentence of death," Mr. DeGabrielle said, adding that "19 sentences of life imprisonment were not something to be disappointed about."

On one count of conspiracy, the jury left it up to Judge Lee H. Rosenthal to impose sentence. She set Aug. 23 for a sentencing hearing.

The lead prosecutor, Daniel C. Rodriguez, presented anguished testimony of survivors and argued that Mr. Williams was the only one who could have saved the victims. But Mr. Washington repeatedly questioned why Mr. Williams, the only major African-American defendant among the ring of human smugglers, should be singled out for execution when co-conspirators made deals to testify for the government.

Mr. Williams was convicted on Dec. 4 of all 58 counts of human smuggling. Mr. Washington said he would appeal.

A first trial ended in March 2005 with the jury's finding of guilty on 38 counts but deadlocking on 20 others, including some eligible for death. The incomplete verdict was thrown out by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

Evidence in both trials showed that Mr. Williams, a milk trucker and small-time drug dealer from Schenectady, N.Y., was recruited to transport at least 73 illegal immigrants from Harlingen past a Border Patrol checkpoint, where they were to be transferred to a van and a pickup. But the other vehicles were blocked, and Mr. Williams was told to drive toward Houston.

With the passengers punching air holes in the sweltering trailer, Mr. Williams halted in Victoria, about 100 miles southwest of Houston, where he opened the trailer's doors, provided bottles of water and fled.

Along with the bodies of 19 victims, two of whom died later in the hospital, rescuers found 54 survivors. Some others may have escaped.

In his final prosecution arguments in the sentencing phase, Mr. Rodriguez said Mr. Williams had committed "acts of violence" by using what he called "in essence an unplugged refrigerator to transport these people." He said Mr. Williams had been motivated by "the oldest reason in the world, greed."

Mr. Washington, in his closing arguments, portrayed Mr. Williams as concerned about his riders once he realized their plight.

"I think the question is intent," he said, arguing that the government had not proved "that Tyrone intended to kill these poor souls."

And he said of the smuggling ringleaders: "Why aren't they facing the death penalty? They're all part of the conspiracy."

Jurors said they began each session of deliberations with 19 seconds of silence — one for each victim.

Brown's Attorney Closely Questions Expert In Federal Trial (AP)

By Ross Dellenger

AP, January 19, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - Attorneys for Noxubee County Democratic Party official Ike Brown continued a rigorous cross-examination of a government witness on Thursday in an attempt to find flaws in the witness' testimony.

DOJ_NMG_0118875

Theodore Arrington, a University of North Carolina political science professor testifying for the U.S. Justice Department, examined the politics of Noxubee County and found that Brown and the county's Democratic Executive Committee are disenfranchising white voters.

He took the witness stand early Wednesday morning and finished at 4 p.m. Thursday after sometimes heated exchanges with Brown's defense attorney.

"I think we destroyed the expert," Brown said after testimony concluded.

The department accuses Brown of violating the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which was written to protect racial minorities when Mississippi and other Southern states strictly enforced segregation.

It is the first use of the act to allege discrimination against whites. Noxubee County is a rural area along the Alabama line with a majority black population.

While on the stand, Arrington said the government pays him $150 an hour during his investigations. Over the last five years, he has made hundreds of thousands of dollars, he said.

"The weight of the government and their resources are against us," said Brown, whose attorney is working for free.

Arrington testified Wednesday that Brown, the county Democratic Executive Committee's chairman, and others used racial slurs to alienate blacks who support white candidates. He also referred to six lawsuits prompted by complaints of voter irregularity in Noxubee County.

Brown's attorney, Wil Colom, closely questioned Arrington on Thursday about his earlier testimony and his investigative documents. Of the six election complaints cited by Arrington, five were overturned. The one upheld was the only election that took place under Brown's supervision as head of the executive committee.

Colom asked Arrington, the former vice chairman of the Republican Party in Charlotte, N.C., to give specific proof of ballot fraud and that coercion took place at the polls. A clearly frustrated Arrington could not.

Colom took each one of Arrington's studies and analyzed it for flaws.

Arrington interviewed a group of white women who wanted to assist in the Democratic primary, but were not allowed. Colom inferred that it was possibly because of their ages - they were all in their 70s - and not their race.

Arrington said Brown "chased" a candidate from a precinct and allowed others to stay, but when Colom asked Arrington to identify others who were allowed to stay at the precinct, Arrington couldn't identify any.

Colom also proved that Arrington did not interview Democratic poll workers. He also said that in one of Arrington's studies he interviewed 21 people, yet only five were black.

"And you think that your report is fair and balanced?" Colom asked.

Persecutors later proved that Arrington did try to interview blacks. They also pointed out that he has testified for blacks in several other trials and donated money to Democrat John Kerry's presidential campaign.

The trial resumes Friday and is expected to last another two weeks.

Brown is a former tax preparer who served 21 months in prison in the 1990s on a felony conviction of preparing fraudulent federal income-tax returns. He also was indicted in 1979 for absentee ballot fraud.

Whites once controlled politics in Noxubee County, but now there are only two white countywide office holders because Brown manipulates election, the U.S. Justice Department says.

He faces no jail time or fines, but would be forced to cease fraudulent activities if convicted, prosecutors said.

Witness: Dems Discriminated, Didn't Break Law (JCL)

By Jimmie E. Gates

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, January 19, 2007

Ike Brown mobilizing black voters in Noxubee County isn't illegal. It's admirable, a government expert testified Thursday on cross-examination.

But University of North Carolina Political Science chairman Theodore Arrington reiterated earlier testimony that he believes evidence shows Brown and his associates have engaged in a pattern of racial activities that discriminate against white voters in the majority-black county.

In the first lawsuit of its kind in the United States, the Department of Justice is accusing black political leaders in Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters.

Arrington testified Wednesday for the Justice Department in federal court in Jackson that Brown, chairman of the Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee, uses race to get his way and bully people who don't agree with the candidates he supports.

Also, Arrington said Brown and his associates had formed racial intent and discriminated against white voters in their actions.

But Thursday, Arrington said he couldn't identify any black person given preferential treatment over a white person at a Noxubee County polling place.

Wil Colom, attorney for the Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee and for Brown, its chairman, grilled Arrington for about five hours. "All I see is conclusion by you but no facts," he told Arrington.

Arrington had suggested a high number of absentee ballots cast in a 2003 race in the county may indicate fraudulent ballots.

"Do you have one single ballot where Ike Brown notarized?" Colom asked Arrington.

"No," Arrington replied.

He said he interviewed a group of white women who wanted to assist in the Democratic primary but were not allowed. Colom inferred it may have been because of their ages - all in their 70s - and not their race.

Arrington said Brown "chased" a candidate from a precinct and allowed others to stay, but when Colom asked to identify others allowed to stay, Arrington couldn't.

Colom also showed Arrington did not interview Democratic poll workers. He also said that in one of Arrington's studies he interviewed 21 people, but only five were black.

"And you think that your report is fair and balanced?" Colom asked.

Prosecutors later showed Arrington tried to interview black poll workers and pointed out he has testified for black plaintiffs in several other trials and donated money to Democrat John Kerry's presidential campaign.

Complaints from white candidates and voters prompted a federal investigation, leading to the civil action.

The lawsuit, filed in February 2005, seeks preliminary and permanent injunctions to stop the defendants from coercing, threatening or intimidating anyone voting or attempting to vote. The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Bush Open To Idea Of Pardon For Former Border Patrol Agents (AP)

By Suzanne Gamboa, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush on Thursday left open the possibility of a pardon for two Border Patrol agents serving federal prison sentences for shooting a Mexican drug dealer as he fled and covering up the crime.

Bush said "there's a process for pardons" and the case has to work its way through the system. In an interview with KFOX-TV in El Paso, Bush said the White House will review the case, and he urged people to "take a sober look at the case."

"People need to take a tough look at the facts, the evidence a jury looked at, as well as the judge. And I will do the same thing," he said.

Several lawmakers have urged the president to pardon former Border Patrol agents Jose Alonso Compean and Ignacio Ramos for the shooting of Osvaldo Aldrete Davila, who retreated to Mexico after he was shot and later admitted he was transporting marijuana while in the country illegally.

The agents began serving their sentences Wednesday — 11 years and one day for Ramos and 12 years for Compean. Both were fired after their convictions on several charges, including assault with a deadly weapon, obstruction of justice, and a civil rights violation.

Rancor over the convictions and sentencing of the agents has been simmering for months, and the two have become a cause celebre among conservatives and on talk shows. Their supporters have said they were defending themselves and have called them heroes. The agents' prosecution occurred as the issue of illegal immigration was being debated in Congress and amid campaigns for last November's midterm elections.

Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., introduced a bill Thursday calling for a congressional pardon of the agents. Congress has never issued pardons to anyone convicted of a crime, said Joe Kasper, Hunter's spokesman. But Kasper said Hunter believes there's enough ambiguity in the law on pardons to give it a try.

"Agents Compean and Ramos fulfilled their responsibilities as Border Patrol agents and rightfully pursued a suspected and fleeing drug smuggler. It is irresponsible to punish them with jail time," he said in a news release.

U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton took the unusual step of issuing a five-page document of the "myth vs. reality" of the case as the agents began serving their sentences.

The document covered everything from the claims that the former agents were just doing their jobs to reports that the shooting was at night when it actually happened about 1 p.m. on Feb. 17, 2005.

White House spokesman Tony Snow also seemed to support the agents' conviction, listing details of the case in a briefing with reporters Thursday. He said an officer hit Aldrete in the chest with a gun after he got out of his car and that "a lot of the allegations about a scuffle and discovering drugs at the scene and all that, they're simply not supported by the fact record of the case."

Texas Sen. John Cornyn said the Justice Department should have the chance to explain why the agents were prosecuted. Cornyn sent a letter to Vermont Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, asking for a hearing.

"I understand that the Justice Department believes all the facts have not come out on this prosecution and would welcome the opportunity to explain its decisions. I believe such a public explanation and opportunity for questioning is necessary," Cornyn wrote.

Cornyn said he and Sen. Arlen Specter, who chaired the committee last year, investigated the case and that his office personally interviewed Sutton.

Justice Inquiry Demanded On Duke Rape Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

Did a North Carolina prosecutor, members of his staff, Durham police and a DNA testing laboratory conspire to violate the civil rights of three Duke University lacrosse players in bringing high-profile rape charges against them?

That is what Rep. Peter T. King, New York Republican and former chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, wants to know, calling on Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales this week to assign Justice Department attorneys and the FBI to find out.

"I have been following with great interest and deepening concern the prosecution by Durham County District Attorney Michael B. Nifong," Mr. King said in a terse letter to Mr. Gonzales. "I have done so not only because members of Collin Finerty's family are my constituents but because I have been accorded the privilege of representing all the citizens in this country and their interest in guaranteeing not only the appearance of justice but its actual implementation."

Mr. King said a review he conducted of documents and summaries of Mr. Nifong's investigation, along with discussions with other members of Congress, led to his call for the Justice Department probe.

"I am deeply disappointed by your apparent decision to defer a decision whether to investigate Mr. Nifong's prosecution of this case," Mr. King said, referring to rejections last week of probe requests by Reps. Walter B. Jones, North Carolina Republican, and Carolyn McCarthy, New York Democrat.

"I urge you to reconsider your decision."

Mr. King said the Justice Department probe should target Mr. Nifong and members of his staff, including investigator Lindell Wilson; the Durham Police Department, including Officers Mark Gottlieb and Benjamin Himan; and DNA Security Inc., including its director, Brian Meehan.

He said the investigation should determine whether "these and other individuals conspired to violate and violated the constitutionally guaranteed civil rights of Collin and his two former teammates." In addition to Mr. Finnerty, 20, of Garden City, N.Y., Reade W. Seligmann, of Essex Fells, N.J.; and David F. Evans, 23, of Annapolis, are charged.

Mr. Nifong was not available for comment. Durham Police Department spokesman Cpl. David Addison referred inquiries yesterday to the district attorney's office. Justice Department officials have said it would be premature to initiate an investigation while criminal charges are pending.

The prosecutor has come under intense public scrutiny over his handling of the case. He was named Dec. 28 by the North Carolina State Bar in an ethics complaint, accused of "dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation" in his public comments about the case. The complaint said Mr. Nifong "knew or reasonably should have known" the statements "would have a substantial likelihood of materially prejudicing" the case.

Last week, Mr. Nifong asked to be removed from the case and North Carolina State Attorney General Roy A. Cooper has since taken it over. His review has begun, but it was not clear whether he would be ready for a pending Feb. 5 hearing.

"We accept the case with our eyes wide open to the evidence, but with blinders on for all other distractions," Mr. Cooper said.

Mr. Nifong handed over the case after two major revelations:

·A Dec. 21 interview of the 28-year-old black woman who accused the three white players of raping her after she had been hired as a stripper to perform at their dorm house, during which she said she was not certain Mr. Seligmann had taken part in the assault and was not sure whether she had been penetrated during the attack, a necessary element of the crime of rape under North Carolina law.

·A Dec. 15 hearing at which Mr. Meehan said he shared tests results with Mr. Nifong but a summary report given to the defense did not contain the information that semen found inside the accuser did not match any of the Duke players. He said the decision not to give the defense the material was "an intentional limitation" at which he and Mr. Nifong arrived.

Sen. Ben Cardin Wants The Investigation To Look Into Election Fraud Around The Country. (DCEX)

By Daniel Fowler, The Examiner

DC Examiner, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON - U.S. Sen. Ben Cardin is calling on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to investigate instances of voter intimidation and election fraud the senator says occurred in Maryland before the November election.

Cardin, D-Md., made the request Thursday during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing.

The accusations involve former Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich and then Lt. Gov. Michael Steele. Ehrlich was seeking re-election, while Steele was competing with Cardin for an open Senate seat. Both candidates lost.

Democrats blasted Ehrlich and Steele on Election Day after their campaigns sent out a last-minute voter guide titled "Ehrlich-Steele Democrats" that targeted black voters.

Called an "Official Voter Guide" for "Ehrlich-Steele Democrats," the Ehrlich and Steele campaigns mailed a "Democratic Sample Ballot" to residents, encouraging them to vote for Ehrlich, Steele and a variety of Democrats, including state attorney general candidate Douglas Gansler and comptroller candidate Peter Franchot.

Cardin told The Examiner Thursday said he wants Gonzales to look at the situation in Maryland and around the country.

"I would like to see election officials know and candidates know that there is a price to pay if they do not conduct their responsibilities as election officials properly, and as candidates there is a limit to what you can do," Cardin said.

In predominantly black Prince George's County, the sample ballot cover featured pictures of three black Democrats — former U.S. Rep. Kweisi Mfume, former Prince George's County Executive Wayne Curry and Prince George's County Executive Jack Johnson.

The Ehrlich and Steele campaigns also distributed the sample ballots in Prince George's on Election Day.

The literature also was mailed and distributed in black communities in Baltimore City and Baltimore County, Cardin said.

In November, Ehrlich spokeswoman Shareese DeLeaver said the sample ballot was not meant to be misleading.

Research Sparks Federal Scrutiny Of Elections (YAKHR)

By Pat Muir, YAKIMA HERALD-REPUBLIC

Yakima (WA) Herald-Republic, January 19, 2007

SUNNYSIDE -- The U.S. Justice Department is looking into the way this city elects its leaders after a recent Whitman College report said the city's system violates the Voting Rights Act and keeps Hispanics from being elected.

Four people -- including a former city councilwoman and a community activist -- say they've been in contact with a Washington D.C. attorney from the department's civil rights division about the study.

In December, Whitman College released a report by Ian Warner, an undergraduate, showing that Sunnyside's at-large council elections create barriers to more equitable representation, a violation of the federal Voting Rights Act. Under the 1964 Act, a violation can be proven if there is a discrepancy in representation and there is racially polarized voting -- if people of one race vote predominantly for candidates of the same race.

Warner says he proved this by comparing thousands of voting records against a Hispanic surname list that showed Hispanic candidates got more votes in precincts with high Hispanic populations.

Warner and the professor who oversaw the research both say the Justice Department attorney, Sean O'Donnell, contacted them after an article about the study was published in the Yakima Herald-Republic.

"He's obviously taking it seriously and thinks there are some legal implications," said Paul Apostolidis, chairman of Whitman's politics department and the professor for whom Warner wrote the report.

Former Sunnyside Councilwoman Bengie Aguilar and local Hispanic activist Hector Franco say they too have talked about Warner's study with O'Donnell. The attorney was in Yakima County last month to talk with them about bilingual voting materials when the article was published. O'Donnell took an interest in the story, Aguilar and Franco said.

O'Donnell declined to comment for this story. A spokeswoman for the Justice Department said it's the agency's policy not to comment on such matters.

Like several Yakima County cities, Sunnyside has a much higher percentage of Hispanics in the general population than it does on the City Council.

According to 2000 Census data, 73.1 percent of Sunnyside is Hispanic, compared with one of seven City Council members, or 14.3 percent.

Cities such as Watsonville and Salinas in California have revised their elections from at-large to district voting because of legal challenges under the Voting Rights Act based on similar circumstances.

Joaquin Avila, former president and general counsel of the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund (MALDEF) and the attorney who filed the lawsuit against the city of Watsonville, served as a mentor for Warner in his Sunnyside research.

DOJ_NMG_0118879

Aguilar and Franco said O'Donnell told them he would need help getting statistics furthering research in the Whitman College report. According to O'Donnell, they said, the Justice Department will provide support in a legal effort to change Sunnyside's election system, but only if the local community does the initial legwork. For one thing, the Justice Department would need information about how the city could geographically define voting districts that would be primarily Hispanic.

The Chicano-Latino Coalition, an informal group of leaders from Yakima Valley groups, plans to start that effort by the end of January, Franco said. He sought to publicize the study's findings to the Spanish-speaking community by bringing Warner onto his show as a guest on Radio KDNA earlier this month.

The coalition plans to circulate petitions urging cities in which Hispanics are underrepresented to voluntarily change to district voting. It also plans to extend Warner's research by identifying areas from which largely Hispanic districts might be drawn in cities.

"It really rests on us to provide the research and the statistics they (the Justice Department) need. É Why Ian's work is so important is it brought up the discussion," Franco said.

The city of Sunnyside made Warner's report available to council members at the request of Paul Garcia, the only Hispanic on the City Council.

Sunnyside City Manager Bob Stockwell, who has criticized Warner's methodology as "flawed" and his conclusions as "bogus," said he has not heard from the Justice Department.

"The only discussions we've had (on the study) is the result of reporters calling and asking us questions," he said.

While he does not agree with Warner that a change in voting systems is needed, Garcia said he believes the issue of Hispanic underrepresentation needs to be discussed.

"The issue is certainly a true one, the question of why don't we have more Hispanic representation on councils É But to draw the conclusion it's just because of the way we're structuring our voting, I just can't come to that same conclusion," Garcia said.

Stockwell echoed that sentiment: "The issue of whether or not Hispanics are participating in the local election process has nothing to do with whether they are in a district or whether the council is elected at large."

He says many residents are struggling economically and are not yet involved in local government, but he expects Hispanic voter participation to improve when their children reach voting age.

Warner, who is planning to write his senior thesis about elections in Yakima County, believes it's up to government to ensure there are no barriers to participation. And he sees the interest from the Justice Department as validation.

"That's exactly what I was looking for," he said. "When you start writing something like that, you hope it somehow has an impact."

Fed Retirements Make Rates Harder To Predict (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

Regional bank turnover clouds forecasting of Fed stance.

Minehan's retirement from the Boston Fed and the expected retirement of Chicago's Moskow mean nine of 12 banks will have changed presidents since 2003. Changes make it harder to predict rates and Fed rhetoric.

Local bank boards, search firms and Washington governors juggle differing priorities for management, economics and regional experience. A noneconomist may fill Atlanta presidency, vacant more than three months. Boston and Chicago's proximity to top universities favors academic economists or internal candidates.

Another opening: Fed's top monetary policy staff job in Washington, as veteran Vincent Reinhart retires in September.

Democrats jump-start administration proposals to shrink tax gap.

To finance small-business tax breaks in a minimum wage bill, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Baucus embraces two Bush ideas that languished under Republican control. One would make it easier for the Internal Revenue Service to collect from employers who don't make payroll tax payments; another intensifies scrutiny of firms that "lease" employees to others.

Senate Republicans may not fight Democrats' revenue raisers that pay for small-business tax breaks. Lawmakers from both parties promise to raise the issue of small-business health coverage during floor debate.

Front-runners face unexpected early 2008 headwinds.

One Republican veteran warns "no one's in charge" of McCain's campaign, as strategist John Weaver, 2000 manager Rick Davis, Senate chief of staff Mark Salter, and ex-Bush hand Terry Nelson all play major roles. All have "unique assignments," a McCain adviser responds, noting that Nelson has "hiring and firing authority."

War woes jeopardize the Arizona senator's appeal to wary conservatives: as Republican best-positioned to beat Hillary Clinton. An unaffiliated Democratic strategist notes Obama's entry has dented Clinton's aura of inevitability, too.

"If she runs," adviser Howard Wolfson says, "we know she will have to earn it and she will."

LOWERING EXPECTATIONS? As the Roe v. Wade decision reaches 34-year anniversary, abortion-rights activists press the Democratic Congress for enhanced access to emergency contraception for rape and incest victims, and parity in health-plan contraception coverage. Robert E. Lee, Version 200 (WP)

By Brigid Schulte

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Today, the United Daughters of the Confederacy plan to fly a Confederate flag on Washington Street in Alexandria, on the statue of a rebel soldier who faces South. The Virginia Sons of Confederate Veterans will gather for dinner in Richmond to honor the man they hail as "one of the greatest Americans."

It's the 200th birthday of Robert E. Lee, the Confederate general who is revered by some and reviled by others. Commemorations and protests are planned across Virginia and other Southern states, proving that more than 140 years after the end of the Civil War, Lee is still a pivotal, controversial and complicated figure in American history and continuing race and culture wars.

In Virginia, where Lee was born, fought in the Civil War and died -- no matter whether he's viewed as a hero who fought brilliantly and valiantly for state's rights or as a traitor bent on protecting his state's right to own slaves -- his legacy looms large. Lee highways crisscross the state, including in the Washington region, Lee bridges cross rivers, high schools are named for him and the phone book lists hundreds of Robert E. Lees.

But beyond the heat and noise created by Lee's 21st-century defenders and detractors, there is a new move to reevaluate Lee and his legacy.

The premise of the new look is perhaps as controversial as Lee's image: As the South has become more racially and ethnically diverse and has prospered economically, perhaps the South doesn't need Lee so much anymore. Or at least not in the same way. Perhaps it is time to let him pass from marble icon and touchstone of white Southern identity into the annals of history as a charismatic and important human figure.

"Now there are all sorts of other ways in which Southerners identify themselves -- Salvadorans, Mexicans, Asians -- [and] the politics and economics of the region are no longer based on white supremacy," said W. Fitzhugh Brundage, a historian at the University of North Carolina and a member of the Society of the Lees of Virginia. "It makes all the sense in the world that for more and more Southerners, Robert E. Lee is just a footnote."

At Arlington House at Arlington National Cemetery -- the old Lee mansion and plantation where Union officers began burying the Civil War dead -- Lee's bicentennial was commemorated with a symposium, "Does Lee Matter?"

DOJ_NMG_0118881

And at Washington and Lee University, where Lee became president after the Civil War, the bicentennial is being marked with "Re-visioning Lee," an art exhibit exploring how Lee's image has been exploited for various causes. A big draw was the discussion "What Lee Means Today," led by two history professors, one white and one African American.

Not too far from Lee Chapel, where Lee is buried and which boasts a marble statue of him reclining with his hand on his sword, ready for battle, Theodore Carter DeLaney, the black professor, passed out a 1928 essay on Lee by African American writer W.E.B. DuBois. "It is ridiculous to seek to excuse Robert Lee" because he "led a bloody war to perpetuate human slavery," DuBois wrote.

"At Washington and Lee, all things are on the table for debate and discussion, including Robert E. Lee," Delaney said. "Nothing's too sacred. And that's an important change."

The white professor, J. Holt Merchant, remembers growing up in Virginia when few people questioned Lee's heroic stature as the "Last Gentle Knight."

"But the days when William Faulkner could say that any Southern boy, any time he wanted to, could conjure up images of Pickett's Charge at Gettysburg and relive it for himself, are gone. Life's not like that anymore, and it's probably just as well," Merchant said. "Changes in demography, geography, wealth and sophistication have led us to pay attention to other things. As life has gotten better for Southerners, they've been able to look to the present and the future and not hang on to the past quite so passionately."

Robert E. Lee was born Jan. 19, 1807, at Stratford Plantation on the Northern Neck of Virginia and was the fifth child of Revolutionary War hero Henry "Light Horse Harry" Lee. He attended West Point and never received a demerit. By all accounts enormously handsome, tall, charismatic and humble, he had a long and illustrious career in the U.S. Army. In 1861, as Southern states contemplated secession, Lee privately ridiculed the idea. Still, when he was offered command of the Union Army, he turned it down once Virginia -- his "country" -- seceded.

During the Civil War, Lee's troops were often vastly outnumbered but managed to win or fight to a stalemate for years. Once the war ended, Lee resisted calls to continue the fight in the hills as a guerrilla and instead encouraged his soldiers to go home and begin rebuilding the nation. He retired to what was then Washington College, where he set about innovating the offerings, including the first classes in the country in business and journalism.

In other countries, leaders of failed civil rebellions are often reviled. But a strange thing happened to Lee after he died. He became beloved by many. Over the years, he has been praised by the likes of Theodore Roosevelt, Winston Churchill, Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Dwight D. Eisenhower, who had a picture of Lee hanging in his office.

Northerners, seizing on Lee's early ambivalence about the war, his gentlemanly sense of honor and duty, and his distaste of slavery -- he once wrote that it was a "moral and political evil" -- embraced the Confederate general as a way to foster reconciliation, said John Coski, a historian at the Museum of the Confederacy in Richmond. In 1901, he was one of only 29 Americans inducted into New York University's Hall of Fame. Julia Ward Howe, who wrote the lyrics for the Battle Hymn of the Republic, composed a poem in Lee's honor.

At the same time, his former generals wrote of him as so perfect and his cause so noble that Lee became fixed as the tragic hero of a romantic "Lost Cause" and that cause became synonymous with white Southern identity.

"There's an old saw in the South of a little girl asking, 'Mommy, is Robert E. Lee from the Old Testament or the New?' " Coski said. "Lee has been so praised and distorted that they made him more than human, and in so doing, made him less than human. He's a complex figure. If we want to understand history in its complexity, we have to understand Robert E. Lee."

The loud and public culture war continues. A Richmond-area Boy Scout troop created a furor over "craven surrendering to political correctness" when it decided recently to strip Lee from its name and logo. The NAACP has protested the use of almost $500,000 in state funds to refurbish the towering Lee statue on Richmond's Monument Avenue. And when the Virginia General Assembly created a special commission last year to plan a year of events to commemorate the Lee bicentennial, the panel wanted Lee license plates and more lessons about Lee in the public schools. Instead, after intensely emotional debate -- one African American delegate said Lee's likeness reduced him to tears -- all that was given was a $5,000 grant to publish a tourist brochure on Lee-related events in the state.

FBI Raids Offices Of 2 Area Citrus Companies (TCPALM)

By Jim Turner

Treasure Coast (FL) Palm, January 19, 2007

FORT PIERCE — FBI agents served warrants and inspected computer records at citrus businesses on the Treasure Coast at the request of the antitrust division of the U.S. Department of Justice.

DNE World Fruit Sales in Fort Pierce and Seald Sweet International in Vero Beach are alleged to have colluded to set prices, according to Richard Carnell, general counsel for fruit importer DNE.

Carnell dismissed the allegations. They "ultimately will be seen to be meritless and have no substance to it," he said.

Federal officials weren't talking about the charges.

Justice spokeswoman Gina Talamona said Thursday evening that she could not confirm the nature of the warrants, and agents for the FBI in Miami and Atlanta deferred comment to the department.

Carnell said he knew little of the claims, but that it appears the investigation is the result of a disgruntled competitor in the citrus industry.

"Frankly, it's a pretty litigious society and people try to air their grievances by filing claims," he said. "The investigators came in this morning and are looking at records, primarily involving the import programs from South Africa and Australia."

With offices in Visalia, Calif., and North Brunswick, N.J., DNE has loading and shipping locations in Arizona, California, Florida, New Jersey and Texas.

Coralee Penabad, general counsel for another fruit importer, Seald Sweet International in Vero Beach, said his company had also been contacted by federal authorities.

"Seald Sweet has received a request for information regarding an investigation by the Department of Justice," she said. "Sealed Sweet is cooperating regarding the investigation and request."

Microsoft Wants To Question Class-action Plaintiffs (DMR)

Des Moines Register, January 19, 2007

The focus of the Microsoft trial in Polk County District Court shifted Thursday to the named plaintiffs and their relationship to Des Moines lawyer Roxanne Conlin, who is one of the attorneys representing the four individually named plaintiffs, as well as all other Iowans who purchased certain Microsoft products between 1994 and 2006.

With no jury present, lawyers for Microsoft renewed an earlier request that they be allowed to ask the individual plaintiffs about their connections with Conlin. The earlier request was turned down last year by Judge Scott Rosenberg, who indicated he might rule on the new request as early as Friday.

Conlin was visibly angered by the request and acknowledged that some of the four named plaintiffs were friends of hers before the case began. She said the request was unfair and a “propaganda move” by Microsoft.

“Microsoft is trying to show that the people with the most to gain are the lawyers, and that is not proper in this law suit or any law suit,” Conlin said.

Conlin and Minneapolis attorney Richard Hagstrom are co-lead counsels in the class-action, antitrust suit which is seeking as much as $330 million in damages from Microsoft for Iowa consumers.

In a similar case in Minnesota in 2004, in which Conlin and Hagstrom were the lead counsels, Microsoft settled the case, after a jury trial had begun, for about $175 million, which was less than half what the plaintiffs were seeking in that case.

In the Minnesota case, plaintiffs lawyers fees totaling nearly $60 million were paid by Microsoft, according to news reports. There will be no determination of lawyers fees in the Polk County case, until the case is completed.

Microsoft lawyer David Tulchin told Judge Rosenberg that Conlin and Hagstrom had opened the door for questions about the named plaintiffs personal relationships with Conlin during jury selection and opening statements.

Conlin and Hagstrom had portrayed their clients as “just regular people.”

“It was an attempt to plant the idea that these people were doing a public service,” Tulchin said, indicating that he suspected all four had been recruited by Conlin and Hagstrom.

One of the plaintiffs, Patricia Anne Larsen supported Conlin when she ran for governor in 1982 and was later represented by Conlin in a discrimination lawsuit against her employer, Eaton Corp., Tulchin said.

A second plaintiff, Joe Comes, “has been best friends since high school with Ms. Conlin’s son,” Tulchin said.

DOJ_NMG_0118883

In an unrelated move, Conlin and Hagstrom told Judge Rosenberg on Wednesday that they had discovered evidence that Microsoft is in violation of a 2002 federal court consent degree.

The judge gave the lawyers permission to notify the justice department and Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller of the violation, but said they could not publicly disclose the information.

Microsoft did not oppose the effort to notify the government agencies. The company's associate general counsel, Rich Wallis, said Microsoft is monitored by independent experts to insure compliance with the consent degree. He said he doubts that Conlin and Hagstrom have information that would surprise the government or the independent monitors.

Delta Pilots Seek Seat At D.C. Merger Hearing ALPA Fighting To Block US Airways Deal Through Political Pressure (AJC)

By Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 19, 2007

Delta Air Lines' pilots union is angling to put its objections to US Airways' hostile takeover bid in the national spotlight next week at a Senate hearing on airline mergers.

Lee Moak, chairman of the Delta unit of the Air Line Pilots Association, said Thursday that the union has asked to testify on the at the Senate commerce committee hearing scheduled for Wednesday.

We're not leaving this to chance. ...We will not stop until this [deal] is dead.'

The union, which opposes US Airways' $10 billion-plus bid for Delta, last week announced that it temporarily moved its officers to Washington D.C. and budgeted $15 million for its lobbying, legal and public relations fight against the deal.

"We're going senator to senator explaining that this is the wrong merger at the wrong time," said Moak.

Delta's unsecured creditors committee, which will have a large say in whether Delta is acquired or emerges from bankruptcy this spring as an independent carrier, has remained mum since US Airways boosted its bid last week by 20 percent. The pilots union is a major creditor on the committee.

"I'm confident that reasonable minds will prevail related to the creditors committee and US Airways," said Moak. Still, he added that the union also planned Thursday to picket the New York offices of an investment banking firm that is working with a group of hedge funds and other Delta creditors that wants Delta to seriously consider US Airways' proposal.

"It's not about billions of dollars to us. It's about having a viable airline," said Moak. "For a bondholder, he's just wanting to monetize his claims."

While creditors mostly weigh the financial aspects of a buyout, they must also consider the chances that a Delta-US Airways merger would be approved by the U.S. Justice Department, and political sentiment could play a role in that calculation.

GE's Deal With Abbott Labs Displays Immelt's New Strategy (WSJ)

By Kathryn Kranhold And Avery Johnson

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

General Electric Co.'s $8.13 billion deal with Abbott Laboratories is the latest step in GE Chairman Jeffrey Immelt's strategy to redouble investment in the conglomerate's market-leading businesses, from aviation to health care.

The companies confirmed that GE had agreed to acquire Abbott's laboratory-testing unit and a smaller blood-analysis division. The deal, which needs regulatory approval, is expected to close in the first half of the year.

GE 'In Vitro'

The acquisition would mark GE's entry into what is known as "in vitro" diagnostics, or laboratory testing, while Abbott sheds a unit growing more slowly than other parts of its business.

"In vitro" diagnostics generally test blood or urine for diseases from cancer to HIV. Germany's Siemens AG, a GE rival in medical equipment, entered the market last year by paying $5.3 billion for Bayer AG's diagnostic unit.

DOJ_NMG_0118884

The Abbott unit had sales of roughly $2.5 billion last year. GE would also acquire Abbott's smaller point-of-care diagnostic group, which makes testing tools used at the bedside in hospitals, among other diagnostic tools.

Deals Science

The proposed deal is comparable to one of Mr. Immelt's boldest moves since taking over in 2001 -- the $9 billion-plus acquisition of Britain's Amersham PLC, which took GE into bioscience and molecular diagnostics. Most of GE's $17 billion in annual health-care sales stems from diagnostic equipment such as sophisticated X-ray machines, ultrasounds and MRI.

Mr. Immelt said the Abbott deal would give GE a "pretty complete" health-care business, which also includes information-technology systems.

Mr. Immelt, who once ran GE's health-care unit, said he had been looking at entering the market for some time; he started talking to Abbott Chairman and Chief Executive Miles White about six to eight months ago.

The health-care deal is also another sign that Mr. Immelt is looking to increase business where the conglomerate already has a strong presence. "As we allocate capital, we wanted to allocate capital back into big markets where we thought we had a very strong competitive advantage," he said in an interview.

On Monday, GE agreed to buy Smiths Group PLC's aerospace unit for $4.8 billion, aiming to expand its aviation business beyond engines and into electronic instrumentation.

Last week, GE, of Fairfield, Conn., announced a deal to acquire oil-and-gas-equipment maker Vetco Gray for $1.9 billion, bulking up a GE unit that has grown in recent years with higher oil prices.

Abbott's decision to sell the slower-growth portions of its diagnostics business fits squarely into Mr. White's strategy to move the company into higher-return businesses. Abbott, of Abbott Park, Ill., will keep its faster-growing but smaller diagnostics businesses for glucose monitoring and molecular diagnostics.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Firms Press Washington On Climate (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A new coalition of environmental groups and major corporations such as Alcoa Inc., General Electric Co., DuPont Co. and Duke Energy Corp. will boost pressure on Congress and President Bush next week to address climate change more rapidly.

The informal coalition plans a news conference Monday to publicize its recommendations, ahead of Tuesday's State of the Union address, according to a person familiar with the situation. It will suggest that Congress and the administration move quickly to address global warming through steps such as capping greenhouse-gas emissions and discouraging construction of conventional coal-burning power plants, which are a big source of carbon-dioxide emissions.

While the U.S. rejected the Kyoto accord that created greenhouse-gas caps and an emissions-credit trading system for developed countries in Europe and elsewhere, some U.S. executives believe such regulation is inevitable here. They want more certainty about the future, as they plan for capital investments.

Many of the big-name corporations involved in the effort already have emerged as advocates of addressing climate change more rapidly.

A spokesman for Duke Energy confirmed Duke is part of the effort and said its report would be released this month. Spokesmen for members of the group generally either declined to comment or couldn't be reached.

The group's formation shows the unity that is emerging on climate change between some of the country's biggest manufacturers and its most influential environmental groups, such as the Natural Resources Defense Council.

In his State of the Union address, President Bush is expected to highlight climate change but stop short of embracing an economywide cap-and-trade system, White House officials say. Instead, he will point to the greenhouse-gas benefits of using renewable fuels.

Administration officials have been mulling sector-by-sector measures to address climate-change concerns, particularly for the auto industry. The administration is likely to renew its push for more control over automobile fuel efficiency and could suggest higher fuel-efficiency goals, and possibly even a new system aimed at maximizing the industry's improvement.

Newly empowered Democrats in Congress are showing signs of moving more rapidly than the administration. Yesterday, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi announced creation of a select committee on climate change. The move was quickly denounced by Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell of Michigan, a close ally of the Detroit auto makers and a fellow Democrat. Ms. Pelosi is expected to release more details today. The chairman of the new committee is likely to be Rep. Ed Markey of Massachusetts, a longtime environmental advocate.

A Coalition For Firm Limit On Emissions (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — Ten major companies with operations across the economy — utilities, manufacturing, petroleum, chemicals and financial services — have banded together with leading environmental groups to call for a firm nationwide limit on carbon dioxide emissions that would lead to reductions of 10 to 30 percent over the next 15 years.

Introduction of this group, which includes industry giants like General Electric, DuPont and Alcoa, is aimed at adding to the recent impetus for Congressional action on emissions controls and the creation of a market in which allowances to emit carbon dioxide could be traded in a way that achieves the greatest reduction at the lowest cost.

The diversity of the coalition — some members had already come out for other forms of emissions control, like a carbon tax or voluntary controls, but others had been silent on climate-change issues until now — could send a strong signal that businesses want to get ahead of the increasing political momentum for federal emissions controls, in part to ensure that their long-term interests are protected.

Many energy producers and manufacturers have expressed concern that various state efforts, if not coordinated, could lead to a scattershot system of regulation. Others worry that harsher measures, like a stiff tax on fossil fuels, the biggest contributor to global-warming gases, could be imposed if they do not reach a consensus on a legislative approach.

The group's formal announcement is scheduled for Monday, the day before President Bush is to deliver his State of the Union address and offer the administration's newest basket of proposals to promote energy security and combat global warming.

Aside from General Electric and Alcoa, Caterpillar is the leading manufacturing company among the group, which also includes four utilities — Duke Energy, based in North Carolina; PG&E of California; the FPL Group of Florida; and PNM Resources of New Mexico. The group counts the multinational oil company BP and Lehman Brothers as members as well.

Jonathan Lash, the president of the World Resources Institute, said Thursday that "this signals that the differences in the interests between these sectors and within these sectors can be resolved."

Peter A. Darbee, chief executive of PG&E, said, "My hope and expectation is that Congress, the White House and the public will look at these chief executives" and note that companies with a motive to oppose emissions controls are nonetheless saying, "Here's a serious problem; it needs to be dealt with, and it needs to be dealt with now."

The negotiations, conducted primarily by the chief executives of the companies, did not produce a model piece of legislation, but rather a detailed set of principles that they suggest as a guide to any legislation. In the Senate, there are already four Democratic proposals for limiting carbon emissions and creating a market-based system, under which the government gives or sells permits to businesses, allowing them a certain level of emissions.

Once established, such a system would allow better-performing companies to sell or trade unneeded credits, and all companies involved would be able to determine whether it would be more efficient for them to clean up their own emissions or buy credits from others.

The group's principles include recommending a range of emissions levels — from 100 to 105 percent of current levels within five years, then down to 90 to 100 percent of current levels in 10 years, and 70 to 90 percent of current levels in 15 years. In addition, the chief executives agreed after some discussion, to "strongly discourage further construction of stationary sources that cannot easily capture" carbon dioxide.

This comes close to a rejection of almost all new coal-fired power plants on the drawing boards, including the 11 plants recently proposed by TXU, a Texas utility. The technology that would isolate carbon dioxide emissions and bury them is still in the earliest phases of development, so this near-repudiation of existing coal technology would have a disproportionate impact on utilities that depend largely on coal, like TXU and the Southern Company.

But Jeff Sterba, the chief executive of PNM Resources, whose company gets about two-thirds of its power from coal and is a member of the coalition, explained why he supports such an approach. "The most important thing for us is to have a viable, diverse portfolio of resources, and coal has got to be part of that mix," he said. "Today, the biggest problem coal has is uncertainty about carbon."

The group, called the United States Climate Action Partnership, had its origin in conversations last spring among Mr. Lash; Fred Krupp, the president of Environmental Defense; and Jeffrey R. Immelt, the chief executive of General Electric. Mr. Lash had worked with Mr. Immelt on the rollout of GE's Ecomagination program in 2005 — which combined pledges of emissions reductions with a new emphasis on energy-efficient and climate-friendly technologies.

Mr. Sterba and the leaders of the other environmental groups, which also includes Frances Beinecke of the Natural Resources Defense Council and Eileen Claussen of the Pew Center on Global Climate Change, said that an efficient, flexible cap-and-trade system would stimulate the development of new technologies to cut energy use and provide renewable energy.

General Electric claims significant advances in these areas already. According to Peter O'Toole, a company spokesman, "Revenues from the sale of energy-efficient and environmentally advanced products and services hit $10 billion in 2005," up from $6.2 billion in 2004.

The chief executives in the group met for the first time in July. During the meeting, Mr. Krupp said, "it became clear that cap-and-trade is an element of the deal that is good for everybody."

"It's good for the environmental community," he said, "because a hard cap guarantees the integrity of the environment" and "industry likes it because it's so efficient."

Timing also played a role in the executives' thinking. As Mr. Darbee said, "We have the opportunity to construct something more pragmatic and realistic while President Bush is in office." A future political climate, after 2008, he said, might produce "solutions less sensitive to the needs of business."

Pelosi Puts Climate Change On The Agenda (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, January 19, 2007

Nancy Pelosi, the House speaker, on Thursday vowed to make energy independence and climate change legislation the next focus of Democrats' congressional agenda, as the clock stopped on the first 100 legislative hours of the new Congress.

Flanked by giant posters detailing the legislation passed during the first 100 hours of the Democratic- controlled Congress, including minimum wage legislation, Ms Pelosi said she would create a new select committee to focus attention on energy independence and global warming. "I want a package of legislation through the committees by July 4 towards fully declaring our energy independence."

In the clearest sign the White House is responding to international and domestic pressure to act on climate change, Tony Snow, White House spokesman, on Thursday said that in the president's State of the Union on Tuesday Mr Bush would seek to "balance the needs of security and, at the same time, also the environment. And you can expect him to make that linkage in the speech."

Making a more explicit link between energy security and the environment would be a significant step for the administration, which has been criticised for its doubts about climate change science and has shunned imposing mandatory caps on carbon emissions. It accepts there is some human component to climate change.

Ms Pelosi's comments came as the House voted 264-163 to approve the last piece of the Democrats' 100-hour agenda, the Clean Energy Act. The act would rescind a 2004 tax break worth $8bn for oil companies and require full royalties for drilling leases granted in 1998 and 1999 in the Gulf of Mexico, which could generate $6bn in income.

Republicans said the bill would impose $6.5bn in new taxes on US energy producers. Red Cavaney, chairman of the American Petroleum Institute, warned undoing the tax provisions would discourage capital investment. "Imposing new costs, whether in the form of taxes, fees, or royalties is contrary to the goal of providing stable and affordable energy supplies for American consumers."

Critics of the 100-hour agenda have said that it focused on easy issues rather than more difficult problems, such as Iraq. Ms Pelosi on Thursday pledged that House Democrats would support a Senate resolution on Iraq calling on Mr Bush not to send more troops.

John Boehner, House minority leader, dismissed the 100-hour agenda, and said the bills were flawed because they had been passed without the opportunity to offer amendments.

High Prices Prod Developed World To Curb Oil Use (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree

Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

Mild winter weather has something to do with it. So does heavy selling by financial funds. But a largely overlooked factor in the recent plunge in oil prices may portend an end to the multiyear rise in crude: For the first time in years, the developed world is burning less of it.

Fresh data from the International Energy Agency show oil consumption in the 30 member countries of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development fell 0.6% in 2006. Though the decline appears small, it marks the first annual drop in more than 20 years among the OECD countries, which drain close to 60% of the 84.4 million barrels of oil used globally each day. Industrialized nations' demand tiptoed into negative territory in 2002, but the dip was so slight that it registered as flat.

DOJ_NMG_0118887

Yesterday, U.S. benchmark oil for February delivery settled at $50.48 a barrel, down $1.76, or 3.4%, on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Earlier in the day, futures fell below $50 a barrel for the first time since May 2005, hitting a fresh 20-month low after the Energy Department said U.S. crude-oil stockpiles rose the most in more than four years. Oil has been sliding since peaking above $77 in July. This year, prices have fallen 17%.

The tipping point where oil prices begin to erode demand was reached last summer, several industry analysts said.

The fall in oil use by the industrialized world is a sign that the reactions to higher oil prices by businesses and consumers from the U.S. to Germany to Japan may be adding up to a cycle-turning downdraft in demand. The resulting shift in global cash flows could mean a big boost for oil consumers' economies at the expense of producers and exporters.

Other signals, both economic and psychological, have been popping up for some time: Demand for gas-guzzling sport-utility vehicles has been falling, while investment in and sales of alternative fuels such as ethanol are booming. Even the Bush administration is vowing to reduce America's dependence on crude.

Gasoline prices in the U.S. are also falling, both because of swelling inventories and the slide in crude-oil prices, which can take four to eight weeks to fully pass down to retail pumps.

Yesterday, the AAA automobile club reported regular-grade gasoline below $2 a gallon in Michigan, and at $2 a gallon in Missouri and Oklahoma. The Energy Information Administration of the Energy department said the national average price of a gallon of gasoline was $2.23 as of Jan. 15. The national average may continue to fall in coming weeks, the EIA said in a weekly review published yesterday; it said prices could get close to $2 a gallon by the end of this month or early in February, noting the possibility that the national average could fall below that level.

To be sure, global oil demand grew 0.9% in 2006, owing to steady growth in China and the Middle East. But that was down from growth of 3.9% in 2004 and 1.5% in 2005. And the price fluctuations highlight the role played by expectations, rather than simple supply and demand, in determining the price of oil on world markets.

Many analysts are just starting to review, and lower, their price forecasts for this year, though a fair number still expect crude to rebound to $60 a barrel or even higher. So do some investors who have placed big bets with their own money, including Texas oilman T. Boone Pickens. For some, this stems in part from a belief that $60 is the price the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries aims to defend, though the cartel's de-facto leader, Saudi Oil Minister Ali Naimi, seemed to cast doubt on that notion this week when he said he saw no reason to support further output cuts. But a few analysts say oil's four-year surge could be ending.

"The bubble is bursting," said Frederic Lasserre, head of commodity research at Société Générale in Paris. "The sentiment has changed, and for the first time since January 2002, the hedge funds are going short at the start of the year."

News of the oil-demand drop comes as the debate over how to curb energy consumption is reaching a fever pitch in the U.S., the world's biggest oil consumer. Next week, President Bush is expected in his State of the Union address to expand on a call he issued last year for the country to end its "addiction" to oil. In Congress, bills are circulating to impose cap-and-trade programs, which amount to putting a price on global-warming emissions produced by the combustion of fossil fuels. While this government debate goes on, the OECD data suggest, the market itself is having an effect: When energy prices go up, people consume less energy.

A lasting downdraft in oil prices would trigger a profound redistribution of wealth around the world, putting more money in the pockets of consumers in the West and ending the bonanza enjoyed by oil-company investors and by petro-states such as Venezuela and Iran.

Currencies of some bigger oil exporters, including the Mexican peso, have faced downward pressure in line with falling oil prices. Airlines -- including British Airways PLC and Cathay Pacific Airways Ltd. -- have begun removing fuel surcharges imposed on passengers. Nations with significant oil industries -- including Saudi Arabia, Russia and the U.S., the top-three producers -- stand to take a hit to employment, profit and tax receipts in their oil sectors.

The signs of waning demand for oil began bubbling up early last year. Saudi Arabia began to quietly cut back its output in April because it couldn't find buyers for all its crude. Iran, OPEC's second-largest producer after Saudi Arabia, was forced to store unsold oil in tankers last summer.

Yet oil prices were sending contrary signals, peaking on July 14 at $77.03 a barrel because of fears that geopolitics or natural disasters were bound to reduce supplies. At the time, supplies were perceived to be tight, with little spare production capacity available globally to offset sudden losses. Since then, oil prices have fallen by 34% despite supply cuts by OPEC to shore up prices.

Mr. Lasserre's take on the situation is that prices of close to $70 a barrel -- they averaged $66.22 a barrel for 2006 -- marked a turning point. "People wanted to know the point at which oil prices would affect demand; now they have the answer," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0118888

One factor that could insulate the world from a big price rebound, paradoxically, is OPEC's recent output cuts. By trimming production, the cartel has swelled the world's volume of spare oil-pumping capacity, particularly in Saudi Arabia, thus easing fears of a supply disruption in some part of the vast global oil chain.

In remarks to reporters in New Delhi this week, Mr. Naimi said the kingdom's spare-capacity cushion would expand to three million barrels a day by Feb. 1, when the second round of output cuts agreed to by OPEC take effect. That is a half-million barrels a day more than is exported by Iran, whose nuclear-research standoff with the U.S. has stirred jitters about supply disruptions in the Persian Gulf.

Oil buyers are watching for signs of OPEC's next move. Some OPEC members, such as Venezuela and Iran, were clamoring for further production cuts, though Mr. Naimi shot down that idea this week.

Some analysts see larger, game-changing forces in motion. One is the rise of nonoil transport fuels. "Last year was a tipping point in a lot of ways," says Philip Verleger Jr., an oil economist who heads PK Verleger LLC. "Biofuels will take bigger and bigger bites out of petroleum demand," Mr. Verleger said, noting climate-change and security concerns relating to the supply and use of petroleum. "Alternate fuels will take up all the growth, leaving petroleum demand static in the next two or three years."

Forecasts by the IEA suggest biofuels output could rise to the equivalent of more than five million barrels of crude oil a day by 2011, close to triple output of such fuels in 2005. Global oil demand last year rose by 780,000 barrels a day to 84.4 million barrels a day, the latest IEA data show.

"Virtually every day, there is a new biofuels plant announced somewhere in the world," says Lawrence Eagles, head of the IEA's oil-industry and markets division.

Mr. Eagles said that in 2005, world output of biofuels was some 650,000 barrels a day, the equivalent of 1.95 million barrels of conventional Middle Eastern crude oil. Biofuel output could rise to as much as 1.7 million barrels a day, or the equivalent of 5.1 million barrels of conventional crude, by 2011, if capacity-expansion plans are taken into account.

According to data published yesterday by the IEA, oil demand last year fell in all three major OECD regions -- North America, Europe and the Pacific. The latter two regions have from time to time had weak oil demand when economic growth was weak. But growth in U.S. oil demand had typically offset this weakness for the OECD as a whole.

But last year, the picture changed more noticeably. "Maybe they started to use less when we hit $3-a-gallon gasoline," Adam Sieminski, an oil analyst at Deutsche Bank, said of U.S. consumers. "Perhaps, toward the middle of 2006 we hit a tipping point."

But Mr. Sieminski questions whether people will forget the pain because oil prices have dropped -- and oil use will again start to increase.

Global Warming Emerges As 2008 Election Issue (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

Presidential candidates for 2008 mostly agree that global warming is a problem that merits government action, a signal that debate on the issue will be more practical than conceptual.

Democrats actively seeking the nomination or thought to be considering White House bids say climate change is real and promise plans to curb carbon emissions, a view shared by several Republican hopefuls.

"I would anticipate that both the Republican and the Democratic nominee will be arguing over who is best to solve the problem of global warming," said Sen. Barbara Boxer, California Democrat and chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee. "We're going to need a president who gets it."

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, are co-authors of a bill aimed at drastically reducing greenhouse gas emissions. The senators, who have formed presidential exploratory committees, say the Senate must pursue a solution to climate change.

"I am confident that given our will and what's at stake, America can and must assume its proper leadership role in addressing the pre-eminent environmental issue of our time, the consequences of which so directly affect our national interests," Mr. McCain said.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat and likely 2008 candidate, has said climate change is a pressing problem.

"Given the scientific evidence that we have and the potential consequences of continued warming, I strongly believe this nation needs to take sensible first steps to slow and ultimately reduce emissions of carbon dioxide and other gases that contribute to climate change," Mrs. Clinton says on her Web site, noting that New York would be affected by any coastal flooding caused by serious climate change.

DOJ_NMG_0118889

Mr. Obama alluded to the issue in his announcement of a presidential exploratory committee Tuesday, saying, "Our continued dependence on oil has put our security and our very planet at risk."

"I think it's going to be a very significant issue, no question about it," said Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 Democratic nominee who has been mentioned as a 2008 candidate.

Mr. Kerry soon will introduce his own bill to "quantify the cost of carbon in some way."

Highlighting the issue are former Vice President Al Gore's film, "An Inconvenient Truth," and news that 2006 was the warmest year on record. Mr. Gore, a Democrat who ran for president in 2000, has not ruled out running in 2008.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, this week introduced a resolution calling on the United States to negotiate to join the Kyoto Protocol treaty to limit greenhouse gas emissions.

"The climate has changed," said Mr. Biden, who has said he will run for president. "It has changed outside, where the year just concluded was the warmest on record in the United States. And the climate has changed in halls of the Senate, where the causes and consequences of global warming, and how we should respond, will be a major concern of this new Congress."

All but one senator weighing a White House run voted in June 2005 for a nonbinding "sense of the Senate" measure supporting mandatory action on global warming. Fifty-three senators voted for it, and of the known potential candidates, only Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, opposed it.

Mr. Brownback told the Wichita Eagle last year: "Climate change is happening and I believe it is a problem."

The League of Conservation Voters Education Fund has created a campaign to keep the focus on climate change in the 2008 races.

"The next president needs to be a leader on this issue," said Navin Nayak, director of the environmental group's "The Heat Is On" campaign.

"You have more and more candidates who without even being prompted are talking about global warming and the need to address the issue," Mr. Nayak said.

The project's Web site (www.heatison.org) lists the positions of White House candidates, including former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

"Everyone accepts the fact that [global warming is] happening and it has an impact," the Republican is quoted as saying in June.

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, won praise for his administration's Climate Protection Plan to reduce greenhouse gases.

A Warning From The Garden (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

Well, so much for our daffodils! They all bloomed in our front yard last week. They now form a nice bright yellow cluster at the bottom of our driveway. Temperatures of 65 degrees in Washington in January will do that. Frankly, daffodils in January do brighten up the lawn. Maybe next year we'll try for roses in February.

Don't know about you, but when I see things in nature that I've never seen in my life, like daffodils blooming in January, it starts to feel creepy, like a "Twilight Zone" segment. I half expect to wake one day and find Rod Serling mowing my lawn — in shorts.

Why not? Last December was the fourth warmest on record, and 2006 was the hottest year in America since 1895. It was declared the hottest in Britain since 1659.

Even the White House seems to have noticed. Al Hubbard, the president's economic adviser, says Mr. Bush will soon unveil an energy independence strategy that will produce "headlines above the fold that will knock your socks off." Since everything the president has done on energy up to now has left my socks firmly in place, I will be eager to hear what Mr. Bush says.

Neither the White House nor the Democratic Party seems to grasp that the public and business community are miles ahead of them on this energy/environment issue. The presidential candidate who finally figures that out, though — and comes up with a compelling energy/environment agenda — is going to have a real leg up in 2008.

What would be compelling? I used to think it would be a "Manhattan Project" on energy. I don't any longer. I've learned that there is no magic bullet for reducing our dependence on oil and emissions of greenhouse gases — and politicians who call for one are usually just trying to avoid asking for sacrifice today.

The right rallying call is for a "Green New Deal." The New Deal was not built on a magic bullet, but on a broad range of programs and industrial projects to revitalize America. Ditto for an energy New Deal. If we are to turn the tide on climate change and end our oil addiction, we need more of everything: solar, wind, hydro, ethanol, biodiesel, clean coal and nuclear power — and conservation.

It takes a Green New Deal because to nurture all of these technologies to a point that they really scale would be a huge industrial project. If you have put a windmill in your yard or some solar panels on your roof, bless your heart. But we will only green the world when we change the very nature of the electricity grid — moving it away from dirty coal or oil to clean coal and renewables. And that is a huge industrial project — much bigger than anyone has told you. Finally, like the New Deal, if we undertake the green version, it has the potential to create a whole new clean power industry to spur our economy into the 21st century.

To spark a Green New Deal today requires getting two things right: government regulations and prices. Look at California. By setting steadily higher standards for the energy efficiency of buildings and appliances — and creating incentives for utilities to work with consumers to use less power — California has held its per-capita electricity use constant for 30 years, while the rest of the nation has seen per- capita electricity use increase by nearly 50 percent, according to the Natural Resources Defense Council. That has saved California from building 24 giant power plants.

Had Ronald Reagan not rolled back the higher fuel efficiency standards imposed on Detroit, we might need no Middle East oil today. High standards force innovation, and innovation leads to conservation at scale.

But prices also matter. I don't care whether it is a federal gasoline tax, carbon tax, B.T.U. tax or cap-and-trade system, power utilities, factories and car owners have to be required to pay the real and full cost to society of the carbon they put into the atmosphere. And higher costs for fossil fuels make more costly clean alternatives more competitive.

"The regulated utilities are the most important consumers from the perspective of long-term investment, and if they are not required to value carbon reduction then they will under-invest in energy efficiency and renewable energy," Peter Darbee, chairman of Pacific Gas and Electric, said to me.

This isn't rocket science. Government standards matter. They drive innovation and efficiency. And prices matter. They drive more and cleaner energy choices. So when the president unveils his energy proposals, if they don't call for higher efficiency standards and higher prices for fossil fuels — take your socks off yourself. It's going to get hot around here.

House OKs Pursuit Of Lost Oil Royalties (WT)

By Brian Debose, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

The House yesterday passed an energy policy aimed at getting back more than $10 billion in federal royalty payments and eliminating tax relief and other subsidies that oil companies have enjoyed for the past decade.

The Clean Energy Act, which passed on a 264-123 vote, would create a fund called the Strategic Energy Efficiency and Renewables Reserve using the recouped oil dollars. The reserve also would be used to fund more investment in renewable ethanol, wind, hydrogen and biofuels technologies, as well as energy conservation programs.

The energy bill represented the fulfillment of Democrats' promise to pass a package of six bills in the first 100 legislative hours of Congress.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said her party wasn't finished and announced that she would create a Select Committee on Energy Independence and Global Warming.

"I have also instructed my committee chairs to hold hearings so that, by July 4, we will have a package of bills that will truly get us to energy independence in 10 years."

Democrats for years have targeted oil companies that bought and signed federal land leases in 1998 and 1999. Because of a congressional oversight, these companies did not have to pay the royalty fee for oil when its price went above $34.73 a barrel or natural gas when its price rose higher than $4.34 for every million thermal units.

The prices for both oil and natural gas have been well above the royalty thresholds for years, with the loss of more than $10 billion in fees. Democrats say their energy bill will recoup those dollars.

"The American people are owed a fair value for the resources they own. Yet when the government gives tax breaks in the form of royalty relief to Big Oil and fails to accurately monitor its oil leasing programs, it is the American people who are footing the bill," said Rep. Nick J. Rahall II, West Virginia Democrat.

The White House was not pleased with oil and gas incentives that Congress enacted as part of the 2005 Energy Policy Act, calling them unnecessary.

It also opposed mandatory royalty relief and prohibitions on drilling-related user fees and tax incentives allowing some oil firms an almost automatic write-off of certain geological and geophysical expenditures.

The White House, however, is against the provision to renegotiate the 1998 and 1999 leases that Democrats seek.

DOJ_NMG_0118891

The House bill limits the executive's discretionary power to modify royalties by stripping that authority from the secretary of the interior.

A report by the Interior Department's inspector general said the department had not been performing the proper oversight to track oil royalty payments to the federal Treasury and had not engaged in due diligence to ensure oil companies were paying them.

"In the compliance reviews, the Interior Department relies on the information given to them by the oil companies," Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney, New York Democrat, said in response to the report. "This is incompetence, cronyism and it could be corrupt."

The Justice Department has begun an investigation into the matter.

Republicans leaders attempted to block the House bill's passage with motions to adjourn, recommitting the legislation with instructions striking most of the provisions and arguing that passing it by a majority instead of two-thirds vote violated House rules.

"This bill will hurt domestic production and increase the price of oil and gas in this country," said House Minority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican. "If you take away the oil industry's incentives to invest in domestic production, you increase our dependence on foreign oil."

Indian Tribes Bet On Big Firms (LAW)

By Zusha Elinson, The Recorder

California Recorder, January 19, 2007

When the Pojoaque Pueblo in New Mexico decided to go ahead with a huge $245 million casino, resort and infrastructure development last year, they turned to the capital markets for financing instead of the bank loans or government grants traditionally used by tribes.

They also turned to mega law firm Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe for legal advice on the financing instead of a more traditional legal resource -- Indian law boutiques.

"When I started, it was a practice area that only a few boutique firms were involved in," said Townsend Hyatt, who advised on the Pojoaque financing and, a decade after entering the practice, now heads Orrick's tribal finance group. "As tribes have expanded economically, politically, numerically -- and certainly, as their socio-economic status has risen -- they have the economic means to hire law firms that they would not have hired before."

To serve this need, larger firms are increasingly organizing formal Indian law practice groups. Holland & Knight, Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, Dorsey & Whitney and Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman are some of the other Am Law 100 firms with similar practice groups, most of which range from 10 to 30 lawyers.

Those lawyers are kept busy. Tribes have to deal with federal law, state and local laws, large business partners such as Las Vegas casino operators and major financial institutions.

"They need the same type of legal representation as any Fortune 500 company would need," said Dan Casas, general counsel for the Table Mountain Rancheria Band of Mission Indians near Fresno, Calif., who uses Sonnenschein Nath & Rosenthal for the tribe's litigation matters.

Casas hired Sonnenschein in 1999 when he decided that the boutique firm handling a dispute with a terminated gaming contractor lacked the expertise.

Sonnenschein partner Paula Yost, a civil litigator in San Francisco, was quickly thrust into the complexities of federal Indian law.

"It was one of the hardest cases I worked on and one of the most rewarding," Yost said.

The tribe was being sued by a Las Vegas management company, American Vantage Cos., that the tribe believed had exerted illegal control over its casino, violating federal law. The litigation, American Vantage Companies, Inc. v. Table Mountain Rancheria, was dismissed in both state and federal courts in part on the grounds of sovereign immunity, with the final ruling coming in 2003.

Since then, Yost has continued to represent the tribe and co-founded the firm's Indian law practice group, which was formalized in 2005 and encompasses more than 25 lawyers across the country. And while Casas still turns to smaller firms for some of the tribe's work, the more difficult cases go to Sonnenschein.

Another tribe, the Shingle Springs Band of Miwok Indians, also hired the firm for a complicated court battle. The firm has nearly wrapped up a five-year slog through state and federal courts against a set of challenges by California's El Dorado County and others to the tribe's plans for a casino.

TRIBAL TRANSACTIONS

Litigation that ends up in a federal court is complex enough, but transactional lawyers face an added challenge -- they often have to learn the particular laws governing each tribe. Any detail of a proposed transaction may be governed by a unique tribal regulation.

"It is in the approval process, the ability to enter into contracts, the ability to pledge certain assets, the election of which law to apply, the election of which means to settle a dispute -- all of that is something each tribe has control over," said Orrick's Hyatt, whose practice group was formalized in 2003 and includes 18 lawyers. "It's something that varies from tribe to tribe."

In 2006, the Portland, Ore.-based Hyatt dealt with several sets of laws, advising tribes and underwriters like JP Morgan Chase on financing deals across California, Arizona and New Mexico. Many of these tribes, like the Pojoaque Pueblo, turned to bond financing last year. Bonds can raise big money, but they require a good credit rating. And until recently, most tribes didn't have a rating at all.

"Many more tribes want to have more financing options, and they're getting rated," Hyatt said. "Five years ago, you could count on one hand the number of tribes that had credit ratings. Now it's a lot more common."

Attorneys say many tribes are now on the financial scale to use the same business tools and investment strategies as major corporations.

"This is going to be an increasing phenomenon going forward," said Blaine Green, co-chairman of Pillsbury's Indian law practice team, which was formalized eight months ago and consists of about 15 lawyers. "[Tribes are] moving beyond entertainment venues to financial services, insurance and real estate development."

The trend doesn't just mean more business for the tribes' lawyers. Large companies and financiers are increasingly interested in doing business with the tribes, said Green, a partner in Pillsbury's San Francisco office.

"As the rest of the country becomes more aware of the business success the tribes have had, and more aware of how tribes are diversifying, companies that previously wouldn't have thought of investing with these tribes are interested in learning about Indian law to invest or partner with them," he said.

KNOWING THE CLIENT

Despite the money, the construction deals and high-stakes litigation, an Indian tribe is not just another corporate entity. Firms serving tribes have to deal with the complexities of sovereign nations that have had long and often bitter relationships with the government and its laws.

"There's a lot of things law firms need to do [to work successfully with tribes], and the most effective way to do that is hire Native American attorneys," said Heather Dawn Thompson, a Cheyenne River Sioux and president-elect of the National Native American Bar Association.

The trouble is, there aren't a great number of American Indians at big law firms. Neither Sonnenschein nor Orrick has any in its Indian law practice groups, though the firms say they'd like to recruit them.

"Indian attorneys have historically gone back to work for their tribes. They haven't been so interested in big law firms," said Thompson, a former Patton Boggs attorney. "Unlike any other practice of law, Indian law is really about the preservation of nationhood."

The importance of this issue to tribes plays out in many ways, one of which is a broader sense of what constitutes a conflict. A case involving an entirely unrelated tribe may still offend a client who sees that other case as attacking the basic concept of tribal independence.

"Just because a case doesn't have your tribal client as a party, if it's anti-sovereignty it hurts all tribes," Thompson said, "and law firms must take that into account."

Sovereignty is a matter not only of sensitivity and legal nuance but can be the crux of a dispute.

The California Supreme Court recently ruled in Agua Caliente Band of Cahuilla Indians v. Superior Court (Fair Political Practices Commission), 06 C.D.O.S. 11719, that tribes can be sued for violating state campaign disclosure laws, even though they enjoy sovereign immunity under federal law.

Despite the additional complexities, Jeffry Butler, another co-founder of Sonnenschein's Indian law group, said there are also intangible rewards to helping a tribe navigate the legal system.

"It's easy to help large companies like a lot of law firms do," said Butler, a partner in the firm's San Francisco office. "It's more satisfying to represent a client like Shingle Springs because they were treated poorly -- historically and not so historically."

Sioux To Illini: Return Regalia (CHIT)

By Jodi S. Cohen And Michelle S. Keller

Chicago Tribune, January 19, 2007

In a 1982 halftime ceremony at Memorial Stadium, a 93-year-old Oglala Sioux chief and medicine man presented the University of Illinois with tribal regalia for use by the university's mascot, Chief Illiniwek.

DOJ_NMG_0118893

The university paid $3,500 for the moccasins, blanket, peace pipe pouch, breastplate and war bonnet with 90 eagle feathers, all owned by Sioux Chief Frank Fools Crow, according to the university's archives.

On Thursday, Oglala Sioux tribal members, including Fools Crow's grandson, asked for it all back.

The tribe's demands are the latest in a growing campaign by students, faculty, Native American groups and the National Collegiate Athletic Association—which has already penalized the U. of I.—to dump the mascot.

A resolution passed Thursday by the Oglala Sioux asks the university to stop using the mascot and return the attire, including the original feathers.

Eagle feathers were replaced on the mascot's headdress with painted turkey feathers by 1990, according to the school's sports media guide. Where the original eagle feathers now are is unclear, both with the university and with tribal headquarters on the Pine Ridge Reservation in South Dakota.

University officials, already mulling the future of Chief Illiniwek, first learned of the demand at a trustees meeting Thursday.

"The university is going to review the resolution that was presented and take it under advisement," said U. of I. spokesman Tom Hardy.

The resolution, passed by three of the tribe's five-member executive committee, points out that Chief Illiniwek, intended to honor Illinois-based tribes, does not belong in Oglala clothing in the first place, because that tribe is not from Illinois.

"The antics of persons playing 'Chief Illiniwek' perpetuate a degrading racial stereotype that reflects negatively on all American Indian people," according to the resolution.

Debate over the mascot, a barefoot student who performs at football and basketball games in the buckskin costume and feather headdress, has raged for years. This episode comes as a U. of I. student faces possible expulsion over a comment on a pro-Chief Web site threatening to hurt a student who opposed the mascot.

Some university students and Native Americans have asked university trustees to end the Chief tradition, saying it is humiliating and creates a hostile environment on campus.

Supporters say the Chief respects Native American culture and is a revered tradition that dates to 1926.

Lawrence Eppley, chairman of the U. of I. board of trustees, said Thursday that the board should decide this year about the future of the Chief, citing a ruling by the NCAA that prohibits the university from hosting postseason competition as long as the Illiniwek tradition continues.

Last year the school lost an appeal, and men's tennis and women's soccer teams were unable to host postseason play.

"It is also time to ... bring to a conclusion the matter of Chief Illiniwek, so that the university can be removed from the list of NCAA policy violators, move our institution forward and allow our student athletes to compete at the highest levels and free of sanctions," Eppley said at Thursday's board meeting.

Critics hopes' grow

Faculty and staff members in American Indian studies at the Native American House at the U. of I. said they hoped the resolution would finally push university administrators to end use of the mascot.

"This is a moment for them to actually get out from under the whole controversy," said Debbie Reese, assistant professor of American Indian studies. "It is an important moment for native people across the country who are asking that mascots like this be retired."

Reese said she disagreed with the argument that the Chief respects Native American tradition by using authentic regalia.

"Here they have a situation where they have a native tribe asking for that back. If they honor and respect native people, they will give it back," Reese said.

Fools Crow's grandson, Mel Lone Hill, said in a telephone interview Thursday that he was upset when his grandfather handed over the clothing because he thought it would be passed down to him.

"It's more of a family heirloom. It is a special costume that he wore. It was given to me by him, and then he borrowed and took it with him," said Lone Hill, the tribe's ceremonial chief. He said the regalia probably was made a year or two before it was turned over.

Fools Crow, who traveled with Buffalo Bill Cody's Wild West Show, died in 1989.

A former Illiniwek surprised

One former Chief Illiniwek, Steve Raquel, said Thursday that he was surprised by the demand because he thought the university and the tribe had a good relationship.

"To hear this request come back just kind of saddened me and saddens a lot of the chiefs," said Raquel, of Naperville, a member of the Council of Chiefs, a group of 27 alumni who portrayed Illiniwek. Raquel was Chief from 1992 to 1993.

"We did purchase it," said Raquel, referring to the university. "The ceremony that we had was a presentation of gratitude. It was an exchange. The uniform is a very significant part of the tradition."

DOJ_NMG_0118894

University spokeswoman Robin Kaler said there is a second costume, used from 1967 to 1982, before the purchase from Fools Crow. She said there are now two Chiefs; one performs at men's basketball and football games wearing the Oglala Sioux regalia and the other performs at women's games in the older costume.

An even older outfit was displayed until last year in the university's Sousa Archives: Center for American Music, Kaler said.

Deward Walker, an anthropology and ethnic studies professor at the University of Colorado, said the Oglala Sioux clothing could be considered sacred, depending on how it was used by the tribe.

"It depends on who wore it, it depends on the significance to the people from whom it came. ... It is up to the tribe to decide if it is to be regarded as culturally significant," said Walker, an expert in Native American artifacts. "Sometimes they are made with the intended purpose of gifting them to someone outside the tribe. At other times, headdresses worn by famous tribal leaders have been given over, much to the embarrassment and chagrin of the tribes."

FBI Joins L.A. Policing Effort In War On Gang Crime (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy And Richard Winton, Times Staff Writers
The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

Director Mueller stands with city and county leaders, saying DEA and ATF agents also will be enlisted in the fight.

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III joined local law enforcement officials Thursday as they announced a campaign for the "strategic dismantling" of two street gangs after the killing last month of 14-year-old Cheryl Green in the Harbor Gateway area.

In addition, Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee Baca said he plans to keep convicted gang members in jail for their full sentences, exempting them from an early release program underway to relieve overcrowding.

Mueller was in Los Angeles to pledge FBI assistance in the city's battle against gangs after a 14% increase in gang violence last year, including a hike of nearly 25% in South L.A.

The arrest of two members of the 204th Street gang in the shooting death of Green sparked outrage after police said they believed the Latinos targeted the girl because she was African American.

The FBI director stood with Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, Police Chief William J. Bratton, Baca and others in front of a market in the tiny gang-plagued neighborhood as officials outlined their multi-agency attack on the 204th Street group and an affiliate, the Eastside Torrance gang.

"No one should have to fear for their life because of the color of their skin; not in our city, not in our country and certainly not in this neighborhood," Villaraigosa said. "We have a message for these gang leaders: We are coming with everything we have. We are coming with services and suppression, and we are putting you out of business."

The news conference was held in front of a market on Harvard Boulevard, just north of 204th Street, that some African Americans are afraid to patronize because of the area's predominantly Latino gangs.

Authorities will use search warrants, hate crime investigations and graffiti, trespassing, narcotics, truancy and curfew laws to go after the gangs, Los Angeles Police Department officials said.

The 204th Street gang has 120 members and is accused of terrorizing African American residents of a nearly 2-square-mile area that it considers its turf. The Eastside Torrance gang is associated with the 204th Street group but is smaller.

Police are already planning to ask judges to approve "stay-away" orders for gang members to keep them out of the neighborhood. And starting today, LAPD officers and sheriff's deputies will share patrol cars while driving through the area.

Because 17 members of the 204th Street gang live in Torrance, and have crossed city boundaries to escape Los Angeles police, the crackdown will include cooperation with the Torrance Police Department and regular county parole officers as well as the joint patrols.

"It allows for the sharing of intelligence and getting the message to these characters that the boundaries they go across so freely don't matter," Bratton said.

The LAPD-led initiative will gather intelligence on the gangs, including the identity of members, in hopes of obtaining an injunction to limit their ability to gather on streets, the mayor said.

The federal Drug Enforcement Administration will target drug crimes, and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives will go after guns.

DOJ_NMG_0118895

Federal agents will provide electronic surveillance of gang activity and operate observation posts in the neighborhood; the U.S. attorney may use federal hate crime and civil rights laws to put violators in federal prison, where sentences are longer, officials said.

"We will be working shoulder to shoulder with police officers in these areas," Mueller said.

Baca's decision to exclude gang members from the jail's early release program removes a big hurdle to the success of any crackdown, officials said.

An increase in gang crime citywide has Bratton drawing up a list of the 10 to 20 worst gangs in the city for similar targeting.

The Harbor Gateway area has experienced racial tensions for more than a decade as African Americans have moved from a nearby housing project to the predominantly Latino neighborhood, the officials said.

In 1997, a black youth was killed in the area, followed by three racially motivated homicides including the killing of Green, city officials said.

The stepped-up enforcement effort was denounced by some community activists, including Aqeela Sherrills, who for years headed the Community Self Determination Institute.

Sherrills questioned why the city is not doing enough to provide youth programs and after-school services, and he noted that Najee Ali, director of Project Islamic Hope, a local civil rights organization, has announced that gang members had agreed to a truce earlier this week.

"They are going to spend millions of dollars even though Najee Ali already brought about a peace treaty," Sherrills said.

Earlier in the day, Mueller told about 100 members of the Los Angeles Area Chamber of Commerce that increases in gang violence were being seen across the nation but that the problem was a special challenge in Southern California.

"Los Angeles, for better or worse, is ground zero for modern gang activities," Mueller said.

"Here in Los Angeles the ratio of gang members to police officers is overwhelming," he added. "This is where we in the FBI can help."

204th Street Gang Focus Of Crackdown (LADN)

By RICK ORLOV And TROY ANDERSON, Staff Writers

Los Angeles Daily News, January 19, 2007

Some fear wrong message sent

Even as a South Los Angeles gang agreed to a truce in a troubled neighborhood where two youths were killed, city officials vowed further action against the gang believed to be responsible for a recent increase in violence.

Joined by a squadron of law enforcement officers from city, county and federal agencies, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa said the city will target the 204th Street gang that has terrorized the Harbor Gateway area.

"What I want to do is develop a plan to have a strategic dismantling of this gang," Villaraigosa said. "I support the idea of a gang truce, but it's no good unless we can guarantee peace for this community."

Villaraigosa said the effort will be headed by the Los Angeles Police Department, but will also draw on the the county Sheriff's Department, the FBI, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, state Department of Corrections and the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Federal Bureau of Investigation Director Robert Mueller on Thursday pledged to work with local and state law enforcement agencies to crack down on gangs and use federal resources, intelligence and laws to crush gang leadership.

"Taking apart a gang is much like demolishing a building," Mueller said. "Hacking away at individual walls and beams only does so much. But using federal drug and racketeering statutes is akin to dynamiting the foundation. Once the gang's leadership infrastructure implodes, all members are weakened. It becomes more difficult for the gang to operate, and eventually it crumbles."

Mueller, speaking at a Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce luncheon, told LAPD Chief William Bratton that his 700 agents in Los Angeles would work more closely with the LAPD, the Sheriff's Department and other agencies.

Traditionally, the FBI targets the leaders of organized gangs using federal racketeering charges and stiff federal prison sentences to dismantle gangs, sometimes crippling the entire organization.

Mueller also plans to use emerging technologies to investigate gangs, including databases that show the geographic locations of gang members, their bench warrants, shootings and those overstaying their visas.

Connie Rice, co-director of The Advancement Project, said smart law enforcement techniques are only part of the solution to reducing gang violence.

"They will arrest all the kingpins and half a generation later they will be replaced," Rice said. "That's why after spending $85 billion in the last 25 years on getting rid of gangs, we have six times as many gangs. So law enforcement can't do it alone.

"The best research shows that gangs do not exist in a vacuum. They have to have conditions to brood in. If you don't get rid of those conditions, the gang will simply perpetrate."

Officials said efforts will focus on finding individual gang members who have been responsible for much of the violence and getting them off the streets.

The city also will expand its effort with the county Probation Department - similar to a plan announced earlier this week for the San Fernando Valley - to identify and work with individual gang members.

The crackdown also calls for expanded use of gang injunctions, stay-away orders for individual gang members and stepped-up enforcement of everything from vandalism and trespassing to curfews and truancy.

But Najee Ali of Project Islamic Hope said he is concerned the stepped-up crackdown sends the wrong message.

"This gang injunction is no more than a Band-Aid," said Ali, who brokered the gang truce. "The LAPD and the mayor are only reacting to the problem. To eradicate gangs, we must get to the roots of why young people join gangs."

"Where is the mayor's plan to support and maintain intervention strategies to interrupt the recruitment of gang members? The city needs to hear ... positive alternatives, not this lock them up and throw away the key solution."

Harbor Gateway has become a symbol for much of the city's gang problem in recent days with two shootings by gangs.

On Dec. 5, immigrant Arturo Ponce, 34, was shot and killed in the neighborhood and 10 days later, 14-year-old Cheryl Green was shot when she was believed to have crossed a gang line.

Since then, residents have tried to unite against the gang violence, holding a rally where more than 200 people turned out to decry the violence.

L.A. Officials Launch Crackdown On Gang Suspected In Girl's Slaying (SDUT/AP)

By Jeremiah Marquez, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 19, 2007

LOS ANGELES – Authorities announced Thursday an offensive against the Hispanic gang allegedly behind the racially charged shooting death of a 14-year-old black girl, the first part of what they said will be a major crackdown on street gangs this year.

“We have a message to the gang leaders,” Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa said at a news conference in the South Los Angeles neighborhood where Cheryl Green was killed.

“We're coming with everything we have ... and we're putting you out of business.”

Green was shot Dec. 15, allegedly by a Hispanic gang bent on killing blacks following a confrontation between the gang members and a black men.

Police described the attack as a hate crime. Two reputed Hispanic gang members have been arrested in the slaying.

Gang crime increased by 14 percent last year at a time when overall violent crime was down. The spike has come amid ongoing conflict between black and Hispanic gangs.

Officials said the 204th Street gang is the first to be targeted in a citywide effort to suppress gang violence.

Police Chief William Bratton said police were putting together a list identifying the top 10 to 20 worst gangs involved in violent crimes, bias-related attacks and assaults on officers. Also under consideration are more gang injunctions and “stay away” probation orders to prevent gang member released from prison from returning to their neighborhoods.

The effort would involve federal and local law enforcement agencies.

“Our intention is ... to look at each gang individually to determine who we can best attack them,” said Bratton, who was joined by FBI Director Robert Mueller and other law enforcement officials.

Mueller, who earlier in the day called Los Angeles “ground zero for modern gang activity, “ said he would bring to bear the federal government's resources in gang investigations. Aside from manpower and intelligence, that includes federal statutes such as racketeering that help demolish a gang's hierarchy.

Mueller said there were more than 30,000 gangs and 800,000 members nationwide.

“Like a cancer,” he said earlier in the day, “gangs are spreading across America.”

Officials Say They’ll Break Up Latino Gang In Los Angeles (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 18 — The authorities said Thursday that they would dismantle a Latino gang that has been accused of racially motivated violence, including the shooting death last month of a 14-year-old black girl.

DOJ_NMG_0118897

The announcement was made in the heart of the gang's territory, in the Harbor Gateway neighborhood, by Mayor Antonio R. Villaraigosa; Chief William Bratton of the Los Angeles police; the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Robert S. Mueller III; and city and county prosecutors.

Two members of the gang, known as 204th Street, have been charged with murder in the death of the girl, Cheryl Green, who was shot as she talked with friends near an unofficial boundary separating blacks and Latinos.

The district attorney has submitted a filing that the killing, part of years of tension in the neighborhood, was motivated by hate, making the defendants eligible for the death penalty.

The killing has raised concern about racial strife among gangs elsewhere in the city, though the Harbor Gateway problem has been called particularly serious because of Cheryl's killing.

The crackdown is to include an infusion of police officers and federal agents to step up electronic surveillance of the gang and make arrests even for relatively mundane infractions like curfew violations, truancy and trespassing.

The city attorney will seek an injunction barring gang members from congregating at certain places and times, a tactic that the police say has proved successful in other areas.

Gang crackdowns have in the past yielded mixed results at best. Typically, the violence subsides until the police pull back as pressure to patrol other areas increases.

"It's like a ship passing in water," said Wes McBride, executive director of the California Gang Investigators Association. "As soon as the ship passes, the wake fills in. It's too manpower intensive."

Injunction To Be Filed Against 204th Street Gang (KNBC)

KNBC-TV, January 19, 2007

HARBOR GATEWAY, Calif. -- An injunction will be filed against 120 documented members of a Harbor Gateway gang implicated in the racially motivated shooting death of a 14-year-old black girl in the racially divided South Bay community, authorities announce Thursday.

Video

A truce that activists said they brokered with the 204th Street Gang appeared to be too little, too late, as city, county, and federal law enforcement agencies agreed to collaborate on efforts to dismantle the violent gang.

The crackdown on the 204th Street gang comes after two of its members allegedly shot and killed Cheryl Green and wounded three of the teenager's friends on Dec. 15.

Cheryl and a total of seven friends were standing at the intersection of Harvard Boulevard and 204th Street when the gunfire erupted, about an hour after they got out of Stephen M. White Middle School for winter recess.

Authorities said the eighth-grader was not involved with gangs and was targeted solely because of the color of her skin.

Latino gang members Ernesto Alcarez, 20, and Jonathan Fajardo, 18, have each been charged with one count of premeditated murder and six counts of attempted premeditated murder in connection with the shooting.

Under the enforcement program against the 204th Street Gang, to involve federal, state and local agencies:

The Los Angeles Police Department will serve as the lead agency in all investigations.

The county sheriff's department will head up arrests for curfew, truancy and other violations of the proposed injunction.

The FBI and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms will conduct electronic surveillance of gang activity and monitor the area from a series of observation posts.

The city attorney's, district attorney's and U.S. attorney's offices will coordinate civil, criminal and federal prosecution of crimes committed by the gang.

The Los Angeles Unified School District police force will patrol the gang's territory and coordinate gang prevention and intervention programs at neighborhood schools

If deemed successful, the joint effort, which also involves the California Department of Corrections, could be enforced in other gang-plagued neighborhoods across the city, officials said.

Harbor Gateway's racial tensions date back to the mid-1990s, when blacks began moving into the predominantly Latino neighborhood, according to the mayor's office.

Since then, Latino gang members have threatened violence toward black residents of the South Bay community if they cross south of 206th Street, the so-called "forbidden line" that divides Latinos to the north and blacks to the south.

Before Cheryl was killed, at least three other racially-motivated homicides have been reported in Harbor Gateway since 1997, according to the mayor's office.

Earlier Thursday, the girl's mother, Charlene Lovett, hugged a Latino mom as they joined other residents in signing the so-called peace truce brokered by community activist Najee Ali of Project Islamic HOPE

DOJ_NMG_0118898

"We are all human beings. We all are the same," Lovett said, adding that residents were "looking forward to being able to move about this community every way we all choose to without fearing for our lives and fearing for our kids' lives."

But no gang members showed up, as Ali had hoped.

They stayed away for fear of being singled out by police, he said, "but we have met and they have agreed to spread the peace. They're also aware that their days are numbered, anyway."

Spike In Gang Murders Prods L.A. Toward Action (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

The Christian Science Monitor, January 19, 2007

from the January 19, 2007 edition - http://www.csmonitor.com/2007/0119/p01s04-ussc.html Spike in gang murders prods L.A. toward action The hope is that key players – schools, community leaders, and police – will unite to defuse racial tensions.

By Daniel B. Wood | Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

LOS ANGELES

At Lucy Florence Coffeehouse in the city's South Central district, neighborhood residents gather for a grief-and-anger ritual that has become as common as the growing wave of gang violence that spawned it. In a small gallery space, parents of gang-related murder victims step to the microphones to express outrage, sorrow and calls-to-action to assembled civic leaders and reporters.

"This wicked evil has to stop," says Charlene Lovett, mother of 14-year-old daughter Cheryl Green, killed in December. Cheryl, a black girl, was playing with friends on the wrong side of town when she was shot by a Latino gang member, according to police. It was one of 269 gang-related murders citywide in 2006. Overall, crime is down but black leaders say a new level of Hispanic versus black hate crimes has erupted – a claim that police say is not showing up in statistics.

Neither side disputes that violent gang battles have spiraled out of control in recent months – from prisons to schools to the streets – producing a "climate of fear higher than any time in the history of this world capital of gangs," in the words of Najee Ali, a local black activist. That happened as Hispanics numbers have grown, pushing into neighborhoods that were predominately black.

If any city in the US has the know-how to attack the plague of gang violence, it would be L.A., which tried many approaches during the urban warfare that rocked this city in the 1980s. There is hope that it will not have to reinvent the wheel, but rather that key players – city leaders, the schools, the police, the courts, churches, and community activists – are poised to spring into collective action to try to defuse the tensions underlying the violence.

Some call it an antigang "Marshall Plan," a reference to the US tactic after World War II of a massive investment in what was formerly enemy terrain. A shocking 14 percent jump of violent gang crime in 2006 – even as the city as a whole has seen overall crime drop for five straight years – is what is spurring all to act now.

New category of hate crime

Recent killings of blacks by Hispanics is a new category of hate crime, says Earl Ofari Hutchinson, a political analyst and author of several books on the black image in America. Riots fanned by tensions between blacks and Hispanics in L.A. jails last year and in inner city high schools reflect a new competitiveness for jobs, services, parks, and other public spaces, he says.

"There is a spiral of violence over turf, drugs, guns, crime," Mr. Hutchinson says. "Now there is another element of fear for lives and safety that multiplies the tension and the resentment."

Gang violence is contained in pockets of the city, and has been somewhat hidden by the fact that violent-crime rates citywide have, in general, been dropping.

"I never knew [the gang violence] was as strong as it is until this happened," said Ms. Lovett, speaking of her daughter's murder.

Los Angeles police are ratcheting up enforcement with tactics such as "Top Ten" lists – one of "worst gangs" and one of "worst leaders" – to target the most egregious suspected offenders of the city's 720 street gangs and their 40,000 members. They are increasing the use of injunctions to prevent public gathering of gangs and nuisance-abatement lawsuits that target their permanent hangouts.

New collaborations with federal, state, and local agencies will pool money and resources. Among new ideas: better tracking of gang members who reenter neighborhoods after release from prison.

But officials say they have come to realize that the gang epidemic here is largely immune to increased crime crackdowns.

"We have been stuck on 'stupid' in fighting gangs," says Constance Rice, author of a new study and 100 recommendations presented to the L.A. City Council Wednesday.

Police see they "cannot arrest their way out of the gang violence crisis," and are moving to a "comprehensive, neighborhood-based, schools-centered" approach, in the words of the study.

DOJ_NMG_0118899

The City Council in 2005 ordered the multiyear study by the Advancement Project – a national group that seeks to build multiracial democracy – with the intent of implementing it in phases after researching and testing new ideas.

"Over the past three decades the city has spent $50 billion on the problem and now has six times as many gangs and twice the number of gang members," says Rice. The study concludes: "The city needs nothing less than a Marshall Plan to end gang violence."

This means new ideas for job and community development, child development, and education and public health initiatives.

Officials say the broader view is needed to keep the metropolis from reaching a point in which violence spills into affluent and safer communities.

"The proliferation of gangs and their increased violence threatens to undo all that we have achieved in crime reduction all over the city," says Anthony Pacheco, one of a five-member Board of Police Commissioners.

Community leaders working together

Through the years, studies have attempted to fix L.A.'s image as the "capital of gangs," but no approach has been as comprehensive, according to the lead gang-liaison for the mayor's office.

"What is different now is that everyone realizes for the first time that enforcement is only a short-term fix," says Jorja Leap, a social welfare professor at the University of California, Los Angeles, who has studied L.A. gangs for 20 years. She says some recommendations from prior offensives were not implemented due to lack of political will and public attention. That seems to have changed.

"The stars are aligned with everyone on the same page ... a committed police chief, a new mayor, a city council that is truly interested and a community that has had enough," she says. So far, $22 million annually is spread mainly between two programs, one for school-based prevention and the other for community development.

Lack of coordination made the 23 separate antigang programs ineffective even though L.A. was spending $82 million per year on them. The report suggests a single "gang czar" who can "transcend the drag of torpid bureaucracies."

Researchers looked at what has worked in other gang capitals – Chicago, New York, and Alameda County, Calif. – but concluded that Los Angeles is unique in its geography, structure, history, and culture of gangs.

Instead, researchers point out a community model that had been tried in L.A., which they want to emulate. For nine weeks during the summer of 2003, local basketball courts stayed open past midnight for games. Community groups offered computer games and tutoring from 8 p.m. to 3 a.m. – the hours when most violence occurs. Gang intervention workers negotiated with local gangs for no-violence agreements, while a local radio station provided coverage of progress.

"At the end of 14 weeks there was a clear record ... not one shooting or killing or battery or assault," recalls Rice.

New county-city initiative

Just this week, L.A. Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, Supervisor Zev Yaroslavsky, and City Councilman Tony Cardenas announced a county-city initiative for five new parole officers to deal with gang problems in the San Fernando Valley, home to about 1.2 million. The region saw a 42 percent rise in gang violence in 2006. The city council has already committed to 1,000 more police officers over the next five years, increasing the ratio of 1 officer for every 445 residents, less than half the rate in New York.

Some observers worry that momentum for change could stall. The mayor and police chief "will pay lip service to Rice's recommendations, but you won't see a concerted effort ...to seek out the massive resources needed to implement the social service, jobs, and education approach to curbing gang violence," predicts Hutchinson.

For Lovett, the added force is welcome, but only part of the picture. "We need to come together as a community to get to the root of the problem between races here. This has been going on for years, and I've never faced it until it happened to me."

Calls Made To Void Subpoenas For Reporters In Steroid Case (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

The new chairman of the House Judiciary Committee and an influential Republican congressman asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales on Thursday to withdraw grand jury subpoenas to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters facing 18 months in federal prison for refusing to disclose their confidential sources of information about steroid use in professional sports.

In 2004, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams wrote articles quoting closed-door testimony of Barry Bonds of the San Francisco Giants, Jason Giambi of the New York Yankees and sprinter Tim Montgomery about the use of drugs supplied by the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, known as BALCO.

Five defendants, including Victor Conte, BALCO's founder, have pleaded guilty to illegal drug distribution. Another grand jury is investigating whether Bonds committed perjury by denying that he knowingly used steroids.

DOJ_NMG_0118900

"There can be no doubt that the work of" Fainaru-Wada and Williams "has been significant," Rep. John Conyers, D-Michigan, and Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., ranking minority member on the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, wrote to Gonzales.

"This coverage spurred Congress to action ... and forced Major League Baseball, among others, to announce an historic change in their steroid rules and policies," the congressmen added. "The subpoenas issued to those reporters and their newspaper seeking confidential source information are troubling both on the specific facts of their case and because of the great damage they could cause to our nation's press and the First Amendment.

Although a protective order is "an important interest," they said, "this case is significantly different from others involving a breach of national security, terrorism of serious criminal conduct."

In September, U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White in San Francisco sentenced the two reporters to up to 18 months in prison for contempt and imposed a $1,000-a-day fine on the Chronicle. But he suspended those penalties until the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, which is set to hear the matter in March, rules on the case.

In addition to the letter, Conyers made a speech on the issue at the National Press Club in Washington on Thursday, where he called for a federal law that would shield reporters from facing jail time for refusing to divulge the names of confidential sources. A bill on this issue died in the Senate last year. Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, said she expected a bill on the issue to be introduced this year.

Tasia Scolinos, a Justice Department spokeswoman, said the department is reviewing the letter. "As a matter of policy," she said, "the Justice Department issues subpoenas to members of the media only when absolutely necessary."

Feds Asked To Back Off In BALCO Case Chronicle Reporters Get Backing Of Two Congressmen (SFC)

By Zachary Coile, Chronicle Washington Bureau

San Francisco Chronicle, January 19, 2007

Washington -- The new Democratic chairman of the House Judiciary Committee Thursday urged the Justice Department to withdraw its subpoenas for two San Francisco Chronicle reporters, which seek to force them to name their confidential sources for federal grand jury testimony in which top athletes admitted illegal steroid use.

House Judiciary Chairman John Conyers of Michigan and Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., the top Republican on the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, wrote Attorney General Alberto Gonzales criticizing the agency's efforts to jail Chronicle reporters Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada for refusing to comply with the subpoenas.

"The subpoenas issued to those reporters and their newspaper seeking confidential source information are troubling both on the specific facts of their case and because of the great damage they could cause to our nation's press and the First Amendment," the lawmakers wrote.

The Justice Department was still reviewing the letter late Thursday, but a spokeswoman insisted the agency "issues subpoenas to members of the media only when absolutely necessary."

The unusual bipartisan letter showed that Congress is closely watching the case of the two Bay Area journalists, who could be ordered to jail for refusing to comply with a federal judge's order to divulge their sources. Lawmakers and legal experts say it's a crucial test of far the government will be allowed to go to extract information from journalists.

"It sends a message that really goes beyond these two courageous reporters," Conyers said in an interview Thursday. "It sends a message to all reporters that this could happen to you."

The Chronicle case has become Exhibit A for lawmakers pushing a federal shield law that would protect journalists from efforts by the government to force them to name their sources or turn over notes. The measure stalled in the Republican-controlled Congress last year, partly because of Justice Department opposition. Democrats are vowing to revive efforts to pass the law, but it still faces major hurdles.

Some lawmakers believe that if the two reporters are sent to jail, it could actually increase the chances that Congress would approve a media shield bill this year.

"It pains me to think that these two men might have to follow Judith Miller behind bars to make that point," said Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., a chief sponsor of the shield bill who met with the two reporters in his Capitol Hill this week, referring to the former New York Times reporter jailed for 85 days in connection with the investigation into the public disclosure of a CIA agent's name.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams were ruled in contempt of court in September by U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White for refusing to testify to a grand jury investigating leaked transcripts in the steroid distribution case involving the Bay Area Laboratory Co-operative.

DOJ_NMG_0118901

White sentenced Fainaru-Wada and Williams to up to 18 months in prison, and imposed a $1,000-a-day fine on The Chronicle, but suspended those penalties pending an appeal.

A panel of the Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in San Francisco is scheduled to hear the case in March.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams wrote hundreds of articles about steroid use in sports, including several in 2004 that quoted grand jury testimony by San Francisco Giant slugger Barry Bonds, New York Yankees star Jason Giambi, sprinter Tim Montgomery and other athletes describing their use of substances supplied by the lab known as BALCO.

Five defendants, including BALCO founder Victor Conte, have pleaded guilty to illegal drug distribution. A separate grand jury is investigating whether Bonds lied by denying he knowingly used steroids.

Williams and Fainaru-Wada, in Washington this week for a First Amendment summit sponsored by the American Society of Newspaper Editors, have pressed their case with top lawmakers, including House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, California's two senators and members of both parties on the House and Senate judiciary committees.

Pelosi pledged to push the reporters' case at the top levels of the Bush administration, including urging Gonzales to "consider the bipartisan request to withdraw these subpoenas," her spokesman Brendan Daly said.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., had a previously scheduled call with Gonzales on Wednesday, and said she "expressed my concern about jailing two fine reporters who did a major public service by exposing the steroid scandal in sports." But the attorney general gave no hint he would budge from his position, she said.

Pence pledged to write a letter to Gonzales in the next few weeks, adding his voice to those urging him to drop the prosecution of the reporters.

"Justice demands that the attorney general reconsider these subpoenas and prevent this sentence from being carried out against these two noble members of the Fourth Estate," Pence said.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. said Thursday she has asked her staff to investigate whether the Justice Department followed its guidelines when it issued the subpoenas.

"In my view, if the guidelines were, in fact, not followed and criminal laws were not broken, then, this is a case where leniency seems appropriate," Feinstein said.

But Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos insisted the agency went through a long review process and followed all its guidelines.

"This exhaustive and rigorous process is undertaken for a reason - to enable close scrutiny by career prosecutors and to ensure that subpoenas seeking confidential source information are issued only as a matter of last resort," Scolinos said.

Conyers, who appeared at the First Amendment conference Thursday, drew applause from newspaper editors when he said he would press Gonzales to drop the subpoenas.

Conyers also pledged to use his power as chairman to hold hearings this year to build support for a federal shield law. Pelosi has promised to help Conyers get a federal shield law to the House floor.

Phil Bronstein, Chronicle editor and executive vice president, said the comments by lawmakers help support the paper's case that prosecutors have gone too far by seeking to jail the reporters for honoring their confidentiality agreement to sources.

"There is a 'reasonable quotient' -- what is reasonable and appropriate," Bronstein said. "The members of Congress will add another voice ... suggesting to the Justice Department what is a reasonable approach -- and so far they haven't taken it."

Congressman Calls On DOJ To Halt Pursuit Of 'Chronicle' Reporters (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — The new chairman of the House Judiciary Committee on Thursday called on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to stop trying to compel two San Francisco Chronicle reporters to identify the source who leaked confidential grand jury testimony in the steroid abuse investigation.

A federal judge already has ordered reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams jailed until they comply with government subpoenas demanding detailed information about how the reporters received the grand jury testimony of baseball stars Barry Bonds, Jason Giambi and others. The reporters have remained free while the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals considers the case.

"The issuance of these subpoenas appears to run directly counter to the protections afforded to the press under the First Amendment," Conyers, D-Mich. said in a speech at the National Press Club in Washington. "It is not just about a single case. We in the Congress need to examine the effect of these aggressive new prosecutorial tactics."

Conyers sent a letter to Gonzales asking the attorney general to withdraw the subpoenas. Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., also signed the letter.

"Like most Americans, we have watched with great concern as the Department of Justice issued grand jury subpoenas to the reporters and their newspaper to learn the identities of their confidential sources on some of the most significant reporting in the history of professional sports," Conyers and Davis wrote. "We write to you now to express my deep concern over the issuance of these subpoenas and to urge you to withdraw them."

Davis, as chair of the House Government Reform Committee, held a steroids hearing in March 2005, when the witnesses included former baseball players Mark McGwire, Rafael Palmeiro and Jose Canseco. Davis was one of a handful of representatives and senators who sponsored bills proposing to mandate stronger steroid testing and penalties for U.S. pro sports.

A DOJ spokesman didn't return a telephone call. In court filings, prosecutors asked the San Francisco-based appeals court to uphold a judge's contempt order against Fainaru-Wada and Williams, arguing that reporters do not have special privileges that allow them to keep evidence from a grand jury.

The appeals court is expected to hear the reporters' appeal sometime in March, though an exact date hasn't been set.

FBI Sends Citizens Terrorism Alerts By E-Mail (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan

U.S. News and World Report, January 19, 2007

The FBI has sent out 600,000 E-mail alerts to a base of 14,000 subscribers, the bureau tells U.S. News.

The E-mail alert program was launched in October to provide the public, businesses, and law enforcement agencies with timely information on everything from terrorists to fugitives, scammers, and crooks, as well as updated information on terrorist threats. John Miller, FBI chief spokesman, said the system can also be used for crisis communication during a disaster or terrorist attack.

To sign up, one clicks on red envelope icons on the FBI's main website or its 56 field office websites and provides an E-mail address. No personal information is required.

"The new FBI E-mail alert system lets us do several things," Miller says. "It becomes a high-speed information portal for anyone from local law enforcement to the media to the public. As you sign up for it, you can tailor what you want to be notified on based on your interests. It also can be used as a crisis communication tool in the event of a disaster or even a terrorist attack. 7 Weapons Stolen From FBI Vehicle (WP)

By Allan Lengel

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Seven weapons, including two submachine guns, were stolen last weekend from an FBI agent's vehicle in Southwest Washington, the agency said yesterday.

Also taken were ammunition, a police radio, bullet-resistant vests, body armor and photography equipment, the FBI said.

The theft triggered an intensive search for the property and whoever took it. The FBI decided yesterday to seek the public's help by offering a $25,000 reward.

"We understand the seriousness of those weapons in the hands of untrained individuals," said Joseph Persichini Jr., head of the FBI's Washington field office. "We have employed significant resources and have been working on this since Saturday. We are doing everything possible to identify those responsible and recover the property."

The FBI vehicle belongs to a 35-year-old member of a special response team who was authorized to take it home. It was one of about 20 vehicles randomly vandalized in the 800 to 1100 blocks of Water Street between midnight Friday and 3 a.m. Saturday, according to D.C. police and the FBI.

A second bureau-issued car belonging to an agent at the FBI's headquarters also was vandalized, but nothing of importance was taken, authorities said. Both FBI agents live in the area and were issued vehicles to take home because of their assignments.

Persichini said one of the agents stored equipment in his vehicle, an SUV, because he has to be in a "ready position 24-7" as part of a special response team. He said that the vehicle had an alarm and that the equipment was kept in security containers that were broken into.

FBI officials will investigate to determine whether policies or procedures were violated, Persichini said, a step he described as routine.

DOJ_NMG_0118903

FBI investigators are working with D.C. police; the U.S. Park Police; the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; and the U.S. Marshals Service. As part of the inquiry, a security camera was being reviewed, Persichini said.

"We're making some progress," he said.

D.C. police, who were investigating the break-ins and other vandalism, notified the FBI about the theft about 6 a.m. Saturday, authorities said.

According to a police report, someone entered the agent's 2004 Chevy TrailBlazer after punching in the lock on the driver's door. The vehicle was parked in the marina parking lot in the 1000 block of Water Street.

The stolen items included two MP5 machine guns, an MP5 training weapon, two M4 rifles, a .45-caliber semiautomatic weapon, a Remington 870 shotgun, a police radio, bullet-resistant vests, body armor, and a camera and photo lens, according to the police report and the FBI.

Persichini said "technological adjustments" were made so the police radio was no longer functional.

The FBI said that it began investigating the matter Saturday and decided to go public yesterday to announce the $25,000 reward and enlist the public's help.

Other vehicles used by law enforcement officials have been stolen in recent years.

In June 2005, someone swiped the car of Charles H. Ramsey, the police chief at the time, a block from his home in Southwest. "Cars are getting stolen every day," Ramsey said then.

In 2000, an FBI car with weapons was stolen outside a high-rise apartment building in the 800 block of North Pitt Street in Alexandria. In 1997, an ATF agent's car was stolen from a parking lot near Stafford. A gun, two bullet-resistant vests and the agent's credentials were inside.

Guns, Equipment Stolen From FBI Employee's Car (WT)

By Daniel Taylor

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

Guns, ammunition and equipment were stolen from a car registered to the FBI, the bureau announced yesterday.

The car was one of about 20 that were vandalized in a public parking lot in the 1000 block of Water Street Southwest sometime between midnight and 3 a.m. Saturday, the FBI said.

The car belongs to a member of the FBI's Washington field office who lives near the lot, spokeswoman Debbie Weierman said.

The thieves took guns, ammunition and "other FBI technical equipment" from the car, Ms. Weierman said. She would not talk in detail about what the equipment was or what it was used for.

"This employee was a member of a special response team," she said. "He had an operational reason to have all that equipment in there. He's on call 24 hours."

Another car registered to the FBI also was vandalized in the lot, but nothing belonging to the bureau was taken from it.

Ms. Weierman declined to give estimates on the cost of the damage or the value of the stolen guns and equipment.

Police do not know how many people were involved.

"We have some very good leads and we're working on those leads trying to solve this crime as soon as possible," Ms. Weierman said.

She said there was a surveillance camera near the parking lot, but it wasn't operated by the FBI. The Associated Press reported that security cameras captured images of five suspects.

The lot is near the Potomac River waterfront just a few blocks south of the Mall.

The FBI is offering up to $25,000 for information leading to the identification and arrest of the thieves, Ms. Weierman said.

Mitchell Has Strong Words For Baseball Players, Owners (LAT)

By Bill Shaikin, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

He urges them to cooperate with his steroids probe or face the possibility of a new round of Congressional subpoenas

Mark McGwire refused to tell Congress whether he had used steroids. Rafael Palmeiro insisted he never had.

That day in Washington haunts both men, two years later, and the leader of baseball's steroid investigation warned Thursday there could be another day like it. In remarks delivered to club owners and then released publicly, Sen. George Mitchell urged owners and players to cooperate with his probe or face the possibility of a new round of Congressional subpoenas.

"I believe that a report that is not credible and thorough will significantly increase the possibility of action by others, especially if it's the result of a lack of cooperation by the clubs, or by anyone who is or has been involved with baseball," Mitchell said.

DOJ_NMG_0118904

McGwire and Palmeiro joined Jose Canseco, Curt Schilling and Sammy Sosa in testifying before the House Government Relations Committee. The new chairman of that committee, Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Los Angeles), said he would not rule out another hearing.

"The use of steroids in professional sports continues to be an issue the committee is interested in," Waxman said, "and we are looking forward to learning more about the progress Sen. Mitchell has made in his investigation."

Under ridicule from some members of Congress and pressure from President Bush, baseball increased the frequency of drug testing and the penalties for positive tests.

Ten months ago, Commissioner Bud Selig directed Mitchell to investigate the history of steroid use. The tougher regimen of drug tests and penalties has not diminished the need for the probe, Mitchell said, citing the results of the recent Hall of Fame election.

McGwire was overwhelmingly rejected by voters, many of whom cited his refusal to discuss steroids with Congress. Palmeiro tested positive for steroids in 2005, several months after he testified he never had used them, and no team signed him last year.

Sosa sat out last year but is close to a deal with the Texas Rangers, so questions surrounding his alleged steroid use figure to resurface when he reports to spring training next month. And, with Barry Bonds 22 home runs from baseball's all-time record, a San Francisco grand jury is investigating whether he committed perjury by testifying he never had knowingly used steroids.

"Whether you think it fair or not, whether you think it justified or not, Major League Baseball has a cloud over its head, and that cloud will just not go away," Mitchell said.

Mitchell's investigators spoke with club officials and former players last year and plan to talk to active players this year. Mitchell cannot force anyone to speak with his investigators. Union spokesman Greg Bouris declined to comment.

Agent Barry Axelrod said he understands the union and management have agreed on guidelines for active players willing to cooperate, but such guidelines have not been distributed. Axelrod said he represents two former players who were asked to speak with Mitchell's investigators last year; one accepted and one declined.

By publicly releasing the contents of a speech delivered privately to owners, one baseball official said Mitchell and Selig wanted to assure the public the investigation remains a priority after 10 months and no report. Mitchell said his staff has "reviewed tens of thousands of documents and conducted hundreds of interviews" but said some clubs have not cooperated.

"Setting up a commission that lacked subpoena power meant either they were going to get 100% cooperation or they would say, 'Our recourse is to go back to Congress,' " Axelrod said. "I don't think it's unexpected the commission would take the stance that they're frustrated."

But another round of baseball hearings would be "a relatively low priority" for a Congress newly controlled by Democrats, said University of Virginia political scientist Larry Sabato.

Sabato said the publicity value of a hearing could not be discounted — "If you have baseball stars on Capitol Hill, you'll have cameras show up," he said — but cautioned the Democrats have more pressing matters.

"They have much more interest in investigating Iraq and Katrina and 9-11 — and I could list 40 other things — than they would have in baseball," Sabato said.

Mitchell's Remarks (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

Remarks by former Sen. George J. Mitchell at Major League Baseball owners meeting in Phoenix:

The Commissioner asked that I give you an update on our investigation, and I'm pleased to do so.

Nine months ago, in explaining the need for this investigation, the commissioner said that "when it comes to the integrity of this game, an impartial, thorough review is called for and baseball must confront its problems head on."

In the intervening months it's become evident to me that not everyone in baseball agreed with the commissioner's decision.

Some felt that the best course for baseball was to sit tight, to ride it out, to hope that over time interest would decline and the issue would fade away.

Some may still feel that way. But there must be fewer of them this year than there were last year.

If nothing else, the results of the Hall of Fame voting last week, and the reaction to it, offer fresh evidence that this issue will not just fade away.

Whether you think it fair or not, whether you think it justified or not, Major League Baseball has a cloud over its head, and that cloud will not just go away.

It won't go away because the issues are so serious. Since 1990 the use of steroids or other performance-enhancing substances without a valid medical prescription has been a federal crime.

DOJ_NMG_0118905

It also is an egregious form of cheating. The principal victims of that cheating are the majority of players who don't cheat. That reality is too often overlooked in discussions about steroids.

Much has been said and written about the adverse effect on the integrity of the game, on the fans, and on the general public. All are important.

But those who are most harmed, those whose careers and livelihoods are put at risk, are the players who don't cheat.

They rely on their talent, skill, and hard work, as should all players.

And a younger generation of aspiring major league players is affected as well, as they are led to believe that, even though baseball currently has a tough drug policy, they cannot succeed without cheating.

The commissioner was right. Baseball must meet this issue head on. A thorough investigation and a credible report are necessary to regain the confidence of the fans, the press, and the Congress, on this issue.

From the reaction I've received from many of them over the past several months, I can tell you that they're interested and they're concerned; they're watching and they're waiting. Some of them don't trust baseball and are skeptical of me.

They should not be and they will not be satisfied with anything other than a thorough, fair, objective, and credible report.

I was not involved in the decision to conduct this investigation. After the decision was made I was asked by the commissioner to conduct it.

I agreed to do so, provided that I have total independence in conducting the investigation and making the report. The commissioner promised that I would and he's been true to his word.

My goal from the outset has been to conduct a thorough and objective investigation. But it also must be fair to all whose reputations are at stake.

I will insist that those who might be adversely affected by this investigation have an opportunity to be heard.

Before my report is completed, I will provide to any person who might be the subject of that report the opportunity to speak with me personally to respond to any allegations.

We have reached out to many persons associated with the game, past and present. And, as I have made clear from the beginning, my door is open to anyone who wants to speak with me about these matters.

I've led and participated in many investigations, as a state prosecutor, as a federal prosecutor, as a United States Senator, and, more recently as the chairman of independent commissions.

Those investigations have involved many subjects, from a wide range of federal and state crimes, to allegations of impropriety in bidding for the Olympic Games, to violence in the Middle East. There is a time-tested process involved. An investigation of the kind in which we're involved must first cast a wide net. This involves, among other things, a detailed review and analysis of documents, and interviews of many witnesses who may have relevant information.

Then, based upon an evaluation of all that information, the individuals who may be involved must be interviewed, and given an opportunity to respond to the allegations and to comment on the evidence supporting those allegations.

We've followed that approach here. As a result, to date we've reviewed tens of thousands of documents and conducted hundreds of interviews.

As you know, many of those we've interviewed so far are employees of the 30 major league clubs.

I assure you, however, that we also have interviewed a large number of other witnesses, including many formerly associated with baseball. Quite a few of these persons have been extremely helpful. These persons love the game and want to do all they can to remove this cloud.

We will talk with many more, and we will seek to interview active players, a process we intend to begin soon.

I recognize that this investigation has been a burden for each of your clubs, and for everyone involved. I regret that. But I hope you recognize that it's inevitable, once the decision to conduct an investigation was made.

Since beginning our work, we have repeatedly taken action to minimize these burdens.

But an investigation by definition requires the review of relevant documents and the questioning of relevant witnesses. The only way to avoid these burdens is to do nothing.

The commissioner was not prepared to take that course, and he was right.

When I took on this responsibility I said that I would follow the evidence wherever it leads, and that in writing my report I will stick to the evidence and let the chips fall where they may. That's what I'm going to do.

I believe it will be in your best interests, and the best interests of baseball, if I can report that I have received full cooperation from your organizations, and from others, in conducting this investigation.

Many have asked when my report will be completed. The pace of this investigation is dictated by the rate at which information is received.

DOJ_NMG_0118906

As I said when I spoke to you last year, that depends on you, and on others from whom I'm seeking information. I don't have subpoena power. Unlike the Congress, or other federal and state authorities, I cannot compel cooperation. They can, and if they get involved they will.

I've served in the Senate and as a federal and a state prosecutor, and I can tell you from personal experience: If they get involved, they almost certainly will use their subpoena power and everyone will be forced to cooperate.

Of course, I cannot predict what the Congress, or other federal or state authorities, or anyone else, will do.

But based on a review of recent history, and on many discussions I've had over the past several months, I believe that a report that is not credible and thorough will significantly increase the possibility of action by others, especially if it's the result of a lack of cooperation by the clubs, or by anyone who is or has been involved with baseball.

And if that happens, for everyone involved, the burdens, the risks, the time involved and the resources required will be much greater than they are now.

I don't expect my lack of subpoena power to significantly affect the outcome of this investigation. In the end, I believe we're going to get enough information to be able to issue a comprehensive and credible report.

But it does affect the length of the investigation.

You've read my recent statement that cooperation with our requests for information has been good from some, less good from others.

I recognize that many clubs are not accustomed to large-scale document discovery, so for them this is a new and time-consuming process. And there are serious and credible legal issues which can be and must be resolved.

We're working hard to resolve them.

The commissioner's office has done everything humanly possible to minimize any risks and to protect the clubs, as well as to reduce the burden on the clubs.

I ask you to work with me, in an effort to achieve what I hope is our common goal: a thorough, fair, objective and credible report that is published as soon as possible.

I can tell you that no one wants to finish this more than me. We are proceeding diligently and you have my firm commitment that we will conclude as soon as possible.

Thank you for the effort that you and your organizations have put into this matter, and thank you for having me here today.

I'll be happy to answer your questions, although I hope you'll understand that at this stage I'm not able to discuss the specifics of any of the evidence we've gathered.

Baseball Owners Get Warning On Steroids (WP/AP)

By Andrew Bagnato, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

PHOENIX -- Baseball owners heard a clear warning from former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell on Thursday. Mitchell, who is investigating steroid use in the sport, said the chances of government involvement will "significantly increase" if they don't cooperate with him.

Speaking to owners on the final day of baseball's quarterly meetings, Mitchell said he intends to interview active players and raised the possibility that Congress or other government authorities could compel testimony.

"I believe it will be in your best interests, and the best interests of baseball, if I can report that I have received full cooperation from your organizations, and from others, in conducting this investigation," Mitchell said in remarks that were released to reporters.

Mitchell cited last week's Hall of Fame vote to underscore the importance of his investigation. Mark McGwire was picked on 23.5 percent of ballots _ far below the necessary 75 percent needed for induction. The vote was viewed by many as the first referendum on how history will judge an age when bulked-up players came under suspicion of using performance-enhancing drugs. Baseball didn't ban steroids until after the 2002 season.

"If nothing else, the results of the Hall of Fame voting last week, and the reaction to it, offer fresh evidence that this issue will not just fade away," Mitchell said. "Whether you think it fair or not, whether you think it justified or not, Major League Baseball has a cloud over its head, and that cloud will not just go away."

Mitchell cannot compel testimony. He warned the clubs that Congress or other federal or state authorities which do have subpoena power could get involved.

"I believe that a report that is not credible and thorough will significantly increase the possibility of action by others, especially if it's the result of a lack of cooperation by the clubs, or by anyone else who is or has been involved with baseball," Mitchell said.

DOJ_NMG_0118907

The House Oversight and Government Reform Committee held a series of hearings on steroids and pro sports in 2005 and 2006.

"The use of steroids in professional sports continues to be an issue the committee is interested in, and we are looking forward to learning more about the progress Senator Mitchell has made in his investigation," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman, the California Democrat who chairs the committee.

Keith Ausbrook, Republican general counsel for the committee, said he's almost certain Mitchell has not been in contact with the panel recently about this issue.

"We've certainly been very interested in his investigation and what the results are going to be," Ausbrook said. "If he's not getting anywhere, we'll certainly consider whether to re-engage in it."

The players' association declined comment, spokesman Greg Bouris said.

Mitchell did not speak to reporters after addressing owners. He was hired by commissioner Bud Selig last March following more than a year of allegations against Barry Bonds, McGwire and other stars. No timetable was set for Mitchell's report.

Bonds is under investigation by a federal grand jury as to whether he perjured himself when he testified in 2003 in the BALCO steroid distribution case that he hadn't knowingly taken any performance-enhancing drugs.

The San Francisco Giants are negotiating a contract with Bonds, who needs 22 home runs to surpass Hank Aaron's mark of 755. Speaking to reporters at a golf tournament in the Dominican Republic this week, Bonds declined to discuss ongoing negotiations with the Giants, or his reported positive test for amphetamines last year. Giants owner Peter Magowan declined to answer questions about Bonds.

Selig also spoke to the owners about Mitchell's investigation. Asked if he had urged the clubs to cooperate with Mitchell, Selig said, "Urge is probably not strong enough."

"Look, some clubs have been more cooperative than others, but at this stage, I'm not concerned about that," Selig said. "He will have cooperation."

Selig would not say which clubs are lagging in their cooperation. Mitchell acknowledged that teams aren't used to dealing with "large-scale document discovery," which can be time-consuming. But he said his investigation would move faster if clubs cooperated more quickly.

"Many have asked when my report will be completed," he said. "The pace of this investigation is dictated by the rate at which information is received."

Houston owner Drayton McLane said the owners weren't surprised by Mitchell's remarks.

"It's a process that's very complicated, and it's just going to take time to complete," McLane said. "The steroids issues continue to emerge, and the public wants to know. For some reason they want to know more about baseball on steroids than they do football or basketball. So it's certainly focused on this."

During the meeting, Selig also spoke about the free-agent market and singled out the Chicago Cubs and San Francisco Giants, among others, for their spending, one official at the meeting said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the remarks during the session were not intended to be made public. Selig also mentioned the Toronto Blue Jays, the official said.

Selig wouldn't specify what he said to owners about the game's economics.

"We discussed some things, but we do that at every meeting," Selig said.

Tough Talk On Steroids In Baseball (AR)

By Joseph A. Reaves, The Arizona Republic

The Arizona Republic, January 19, 2007

Commissioner orders owners to aid inquiry

Commissioner Bud Selig wrapped up two days of meetings with baseball's owners in Phoenix on Thursday with a fiery call for reluctant clubs to begin cooperating with former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell's nearly yearlong investigation into steroid use in the game.

"The commissioner was very forceful," Houston Astros owner Drayton McLane said with a grin after the final session of the meetings at the Ritz-Carlton in the Camelback Esplanade. "He knew what he needs, and he can be pretty forceful."

Selig's remarks came behind closed doors shortly after Mitchell briefed owners on the status of his slow-moving investigation.

Mitchell told the owners that he and his staff already had reviewed "tens of thousands of documents and conducted hundreds of interviews." But he said the investigation was dragging because "cooperation with our requests for information has been good from some, less good from others."

Mitchell said that if owners don't cooperate, there is a significant chance Congress will step back into the steroid issue.

DOJ_NMG_0118908

"I recognize that many clubs are not accustomed to large-scale document discovery, so for them, this is a new and time-consuming process," Mitchell told the owners in remarks released to the media. "And there are serious and credible legal issues which can be and must be resolved.

"I ask you to work with me in an effort to achieve what I hope is our common goal: a thorough, fair, objective and credible report that is published as soon as possible."

Privacy a concern

National concern about the steroid issue rose after the 2006 release of the well-documented book Game of Shadows, which alleged steroid use by several players. Selig then invited and gave free rein to Mitchell to investigate drugs in baseball.

Several owners have balked at Mitchell's request for detailed records from their trainers and team medical personnel, citing privacy rights.

"If there was a reliable way to redact the documents and satisfy the requests, then I'd be happy to do that," one club's representative to the meetings said. "But, so far, we haven't been able to do that."

One other objection, he said, was that Mitchell is intent on naming names in his report, "so what we'll end up with is a few guys getting caught and who knows how many others going unnamed."

The players union has refused to cooperate with Mitchell's efforts, also citing privacy reasons, and urged any member contacted by investigators to consult not one, but two lawyers: a private attorney and one from the union.

In his published remarks, Mitchell said his investigators plan "to begin soon" seeking to "interview active players."

Congress could act

Mitchell did not speak to reporters after his private briefing but warned in his remarks that unless owners are more cooperative, they run the risk of Congress intervening to subpoena witnesses. As a private investigator, Mitchell does not have subpoena power.

"Unlike the Congress, or other federal and state authorities, I cannot compel cooperation," he said. "(But) they can, and if they get involved, they will.

"I believe a report that is not credible and thorough will significantly increase the possibility of action by others, especially if it's the result of a lack of cooperation by the clubs, or by anyone else who is or has been involved with baseball."

A lawyer for the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, which held hearings on steroids and professional sports in 2005 and 2006, told the Associated Press he was almost certain Mitchell had not contacted the panel about possible subpoenas.

But the attorney, Keith Ausbrook, said lawmakers are closely following the investigation.

"If he's not getting anywhere, we'll certainly consider where to re-engage in it," Ausbrook told the wire service in Washington.

The players union refused comment on Mitchell's remarks.

No timeline for report

Selig met with a small group of reporters after the meetings broke up and said he is comfortable with the pace of the investigation.

"Look, some clubs have been more cooperating than others," Selig said, not naming names. "But at this stage, I'm not concerned about that. We will have cooperation."

Asked if he urged teams to cooperate when he spoke after Mitchell's briefing, the commissioner turned uncharacteristically steely-eyed and said, "Urged is not strong enough."

"He was pretty firm," one team representative acknowledged. "I wouldn't call it a dressing down, by any means, but he was certainly firm."

Mitchell told the owners that when he agreed to head the investigation, he "would follow the evidence wherever it leads, and that in writing my report, I will stick to the evidence and let the chips fall where they may. That's what I am going to do."

Neither Mitchell nor the commissioner gave any indication how far off that report might be. But neither gave any indication it would be anytime soon.

"I've always believed it's better to get things done right than to get them done fast," Selig said.

"In this case, there's no timeline because there's no history for this. The senator has a very able group of people working with him and for him. And he'll get it done as fast as he can."

Owners' Aid Sought In Steroids Inquiry (BSUN)

By Jeff Barker, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, January 19, 2007

Mitchell urges 'full cooperation'

Former Sen. George Mitchell urged baseball owners today to cooperate with his investigation into players' steroid use, saying Congress might force witnesses to testify later if they don't do so voluntarily now.

"I believe it will be in your best interests, and the best interests of baseball, if I can report that I have received full cooperation from your organizations, and from others, in conducting this investigation," Mitchell said in prepared remarks he made to owners in Phoenix and that Major League Baseball posted on its Web site.

Congress has what Mitchell lacks -- the power to issue subpoenas if players balk at appearing, as some did when the House Government Reform Committee held a steroids hearing in March 2005.

At that hearing, former slugger Mark McGwire damaged his reputation by declining to answer questions about whether he used steroids or other performance-enhancing drugs during his career. Then-Oriole Rafael Palmeiro, who tested positive for steroids in August 2005, famously shook his finger at the same hearing and denied using the drugs.

In today's remarks, Mitchell suggested that baseball, which unsuccessfully challenged the committee's subpoena power in 2005, would be wise to avoid tangling with Congress again. If a governmental entity gets involved, Mitchell warned, "the burdens, the risks, the time involved and the resources required will be much greater than they are now."

The committee that held the McGwire-Palmeiro hearing appears at least as concerned about baseball issues today as it was in 2005, perhaps more so.

With the recent Democratic takeover of the House, the panel has changed its name to the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform and is chaired by Rep. Henry Waxman, a Californian who initiated the 2005 hearing by writing a letter to then-chairman Tom Davis, a Virginia Republican.

In a statement today, Waxman said: "The use of steroids in professional sports continues to be an issue the committee is interested in, and we're looking forward to learning more about the progress Senator Mitchell has made in his investigation."

Mitchell made his plea to the owners as he prepares to interview active players, a task that could meet with resistance.

The former Maine Democratic senator began his probe nine months ago after commissioner Bud Selig said: "When it comes to the integrity of this game, an impartial, thorough review is called for and baseball must confront its problems head on."

Mitchell said today that baseball "still has a cloud" over its head.

"If nothing else, the results of the Hall of Fame voting last week, and the reaction to it, offer fresh evidence that this issue will not just fade away," Mitchell said, apparently referring to voters shunning McGwire.

The steroids issue is particularly sensitive for baseball because San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds, alleged in a book by two San Francisco Chronicle reporters to have used the drugs, needs just 22 home runs to eclipse Hank Aaron's all-time mark.

Congress May Probe Baseball Steroids, Mitchell Says (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Danielle Sessa

Bloomberg, January 19, 2007

Jan. 18 (Bloomberg) -- Former Senator George Mitchell told Major League Baseball owners that the U.S. Congress might get involved with a steroids investigation if teams don't cooperate with his own probe.

Mitchell, appointed by baseball Commissioner Bud Selig in March to investigate steroid use, said the federal government would use subpoena power he lacks to force them to talk.

``I believe that a report that is not credible and thorough will significantly increase the possibility of action by others, especially if it's the result of a lack of cooperation by the clubs, or by anyone who is or has been involved with baseball," Mitchell said in a statement at the owners' meetings in Arizona.

Selig asked Mitchell to examine past use of performance- enhancing drugs in baseball after a book raised new allegations about Barry Bonds using steroids and other muscle builders, which Bonds has denied. Mitchell said last month his probe would take longer than he expected because of a lack of cooperation from people he didn't identify.

Selig said he asked Mitchell to address the owners at their quarterly meetings today in Phoenix, and encouraged the clubs to work with the Democrat from Maine, a former Senate majority leader.

``Urge is probably not strong enough" of a word to describe what he told the owners, Selig said in a session with reporters after the meeting. ``Some clubs have been more cooperative than others, but at this stage I am not concerned about that. He will have cooperation."

Mitchell said he's conducted hundreds of interviews during his 10-month investigation and soon will try to talk with active players.

Legal Help

Players union spokesman Greg Bouris declined comment. Union chief Don Fehr instructed players in June not to talk to Mitchell without legal representation.

Baseball and its union strengthened the drug policy twice in 2005 under pressure from Congress, which threatened to pass legislation mandating testing and penalties in major professional sports.

Mike Reynard, a spokesman for Senator Jim Bunning, a Kentucky Republican and Hall of Fame pitcher who sponsored the bill, declined to comment on Mitchell's remarks. A spokesman for Representative Henry Waxman, a California Democrat who led a steroids inquiry in 2005, didn't immediately respond to an e- mails seeking comment.

``We have cooperated and hopefully everybody else will," Chicago White Sox owner Jerry Reinsdorf said.

Mitchell pointed to results of the last week's Hall of Fame voting as an indication that the steroid cloud over baseball won't fade away. Mark McGwire, whose 583 career home runs are tainted by steroid suspicions, received 23.5 percent of the vote, less than a third of what's needed for induction.

A lack of cooperation would further extend the length of the investigation, Mitchell said.

``It will be in your best interests, and the best interests of baseball, if I can report that I have received full cooperation from your organizations, and from others, in conducting this investigation," Mitchell said.

Drug Ring Leader Gets Life Sentence (CINE)

By Dan Horn, Dhorn@enquirer.com

The Cincinnati Enquirer, January 19, 2007

Clarence "The General" Remble left Los Angeles for Ohio several years ago to run a drug trafficking network.

He'll spend the rest of his life in prison instead.

A federal judge imposed the life sentence Thursday after prosecutors described him as the ringleader of a gang that operated in Middletown, Zanesville and other southern Ohio communities. A jury convicted Remble in July of conspiracy to distribute narcotics.

Rather than target Cincinnati or larger cities, prosecutors say, Remble and other gang members tried to build up their drug network in smaller towns.

They recruited a few fellow gang members from California and Louisiana, but most of the 20 people charged in the case were from Ohio.

"We believe what this group was trying to do was establish a stronghold in smaller communities," said FBI spokesman Michael Brooks. "They were set up to pretty much control narcotics trafficking in those areas."

The FBI investigated the case with police and sheriff's departments in Middletown, Butler County, Coshocton, Muskingum County, the Ohio State Highway Patrol and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service.

"The distribution network headed by Clarence Remble has been completely disrupted," Brooks said.

Nineteen others have been convicted of drug charges and all but two have now been sentenced. Because federal drug laws are tougher than most state laws, many of those sentences were for 10 years or more. Remble is the only one to receive a life sentence.

Brooks said the Dodge City Crips are an offshoot of the Crips street gang.

He said the southern Ohio operation supplied, distributed and manufactured crack cocaine and methamphetamine.

The FBI arrested Remble in July 2005 after tracking a shipment of 44 pounds of cocaine from California to southern Ohio, prosecutors say.

Druglord Sentenced To Life In Prison (MIDJOUR)

By Dave Greber, Staff Writer

Middletown (OH) Journal, January 19, 2007

CINCINNATI — The leader of a street gang charged in a major drug ring that stretched from Middletown to Los Angeles will spend the rest of his life in prison.

Clarence Remble, 37, of Long Beach, Calif., was found guilty on charges of manufacturing and distributing a controlled substance and conspiracy in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati for his leadership role in the Dodge City Crips, who moved drugs from Ohio to California.

Remble is one of 20 people who have been arrested and charged in a major drug bust that was coordinated by the FBI, Middletown Division of Police and several other law enforcement agencies.

The joint federal, state and local investigation in Middletown began in January 2005, spearheaded by the local department.

To date, 18 of the 20 individuals involved in the drug ring have been convicted. Ten local residents were charged with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute methamphetamine, crack cocaine and marijuana and other crimes in connection with the investigation.

WeHo Demonstrators Protest Pot Raids (LAT)

By Tami Abdollah, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

About 100 people demonstrated outside West Hollywood City Hall this morning, protesting a series of federal raids that shut 11 outlets for medical marijuana in the county.

According to William Dolphin, a spokesman for Americans for Safe Access, the demonstration began about 8:30 a.m. and lasted for some 30 minutes.

Federal agents Wednesday raided the 11 medical marijuana outlets in Los Angeles County, seizing several thousand pounds of processed drug, hundreds of marijuana plants, an array of guns and bagfuls of cash.

The simultaneous raids, part of an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, were the largest such operation in the county in recent memory. Five dispensaries in West Hollywood were raided with the other six in Venice, Hollywood, Sherman Oaks and Woodland Hills.

The action by federal agents angered some local officials and was taken despite a state law permitting possession and cultivation of marijuana for qualified medical patients.

Officials said that more than 20 people were detained for questioning but no charges have been filed. Authorities would not release information about any other people possibly detained at the dispensaries.

Sarah Pullen, spokeswoman for the DEA's Los Angeles field division, said agents seized large quantities of marijuana-laced edibles that included "anything from ice cream bars to lollipops to cookies to candies and candy bars."

In West Hollywood, agents in bulletproof vests, sunglasses, gloves and face masks piled out of the stores — four of which were on Santa Monica Boulevard — with boxes and black trash bags full of seized evidence while protesters booed and shouted, "State's rights!" and "DEA go away!" among other slogans.

At the Farmacy, agents loaded three cars with bags as amateur documentary filmmakers and medical marijuana users pushed against police tape. The raid and protest clogged traffic, and motorists honked their horns to show support for the demonstrators.

In all, Pullen said, agents seized more than 100 boxes of evidence and continued their work past 10 p.m.

West Hollywood officials said they were taken by surprise, only learning of the raids as they occurred. West Hollywood has a "long-standing commitment" to the use of medical marijuana for people with such catastrophic illnesses as HIV and AIDS, city spokeswoman Helen Goss said.

"We've been fighting to support the access of medicinal marijuana for many, many years and there's just a great disconnect between the federal government and communities like West Hollywood," Councilman Jeffrey Prang said. "Medicinal marijuana provides comfort and relief to people who are seriously ill and seemingly they view those people as drug addicts who belong in jail as opposed to people who deserve compassion and assistance."

The West Hollywood sheriff's station was notified of the impending raids about 1:30 p.m., one hour before they began, Los Angeles County Sheriff's Lt. David Smith said. Deputies moved in to help control about 50 protesters who gathered in the 7800 block of Santa Monica Boulevard near three of the stores.

California voters approved Proposition 215, the Compassionate Use Act, in 1996, which made marijuana available by prescription for medicinal uses. SB 420, which took effect in 2004, clarified Proposition 215, and taken together legalized possession and cultivation of marijuana for qualified medical patients.

According to Pullen, neighboring businesses and residents had complained about a significant number of the dispensaries, and there had been increased reports of crime in the areas around the outlets.

"Anyone in possession, selling or distributing marijuana is in violation of federal law and subject to prosecution," she said.

"There are hundreds of thousands of patients in California who need safe and reliable access to a medication that their doctors recommend they use and these raids are an example of the federal government going out of its way to interfere with the lives of patients," countered Steph Sherer, founder of Americans for Safe Access, a national advocacy group for medical marijuana use, based in Oakland.

"I think if California has a problem with our law, that our courts and our law enforcement should handle it," she said. "We have no need for the federal government to come and interfere."

The raids came on the heels of separate actions taken Tuesday by the West Hollywood City Council and the Los Angeles Police Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0118912

The council Tuesday unanimously approved an ordinance establishing permanent regulations on medicinal marijuana dispensaries, capping the number in the city at four.

The Police Commission, meanwhile, voted to support a moratorium on new marijuana dispensaries in Los Angeles and for tougher regulations of existing enterprises. Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton pledged to work with federal authorities to prosecute businesses found to be violating the law.

Richard Eastman, a pro-medical marijuana activist who said he was diagnosed with AIDS in 1995, said he was horrified by the raids. Some of the pills he takes to fight his illness, Eastman said, "take away my appetite, but the marijuana keeps me eating."

As a result of the raids, Eastman estimated that perhaps 2,000 people who ordinarily would buy marijuana for medical purposes "won't be able to get their medicine tomorrow. And it's not like they can go to Sav-On or Thrifty."

The owner of one of the raided dispensaries said Wednesday that she was saddened that people will not be able to have the freedom of choice to use medical marijuana.

"We abide by state and local ordinances, and state laws, in providing a service to patients because they have the legal right by state Legislature to be able to make the choice of having medical marijuana as their choice of therapy," the dispensary owner said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

DEA Raids 11 Pot Clubs (LADN)

Police chief says dispensaries prey on teenagers

The Drug Enforcement Administration raided 11 medical marijuana dispensaries across Los Angeles on Wednesday, including five in the San Fernando Valley.

The raids came a day after Los Angeles Police Chief William Bratton denounced the storefront medicinal clinics as crime magnets that have begun to prey on teenagers - including passing out fliers at Grant High School in Van Nuys this past summer - and called for a moratorium on the facilities.

"(These) enforcement operations send a message to these drug traffickers," said Sarah Pullen, a DEA special agent. "The DEA will continue to conduct these enforcement operations and keep our community safe by enforcing federal drug laws."

Under a 1996 state ballot measure, the clinics can distribute doctor-prescribed marijuana to relieve anything from anxiety to nausea to acute pain. But federal officials consider all marijuana use illegal.

The number of clinics has exploded from five in 2005 to 143 by the end of last year. Bratton said many of the clinics are lucrative operations aimed at recreational users.

Bratton and Councilman Dennis Zine have backed rules banning dispensaries within 1,000 feet of any school, day-care facility, church or other house of worship.

While several medical marijuana activists support some regulation, they say the federal raids unfairly harm patients.

"It's disgusting in this day and age, when cities and counties are moving to regulate medical marijuana, that the federal government would still be busting people," said Don Duncan, Southern California coordinator for the Americans for Safe Access, a national medical marijuana advocacy group.

This week, the Los Angeles Police Commission released a report that found about half of all the city's marijuana clubs were in the Valley. The report found increased robberies and aggravated assaults around clubs near Van Nuys and more citizen complaints.

Wednesday's Pot Raids Prompt Protest In WeHo (CBS2)

CBS 2, January 19, 2007

(CBS) WEST HOLLYWOOD, Calif. A demonstration outside West Hollywood City Hall Thursday protested federal raids on 11 medical marijuana dispensaries in Los Angeles County.

Federal authorities do not recognize the California law that allows patients with a doctor's prescription to have marijuana, an ordinance approved by voters in 1996 as Proposition 215.

William Dolphin, a spokesman for the Oakland-based pro-medical marijuana group Americans for Safe Access, said the gathering was an "angry and concerned protest."

"Whenever we see these kinds of coordinated and simultaneous raids ... clearly the idea is to intimidate and frighten," Dolphin said.

In West Hollywood, marijuana outlets were raided at 7828, 7825, 7901 and 8464 Santa Monica Blvd., and at 8921 Sunset Blvd. During Wednesday's raids, about 50 protesters shadowed DEA agents, who wore body armor, helmets and face masks as they carted away evidence.

Six other stores were raided, including four in the San Fernando Valley, one in Hollywood and one in Venice, said Sarah Pullen of the DEA.

Pullen said that about 20 people were detained. She did not have immediate numbers regarding possible arrests or how much marijuana was seized.

Los Angeles County has an estimated 200 marijuana outlets.

The Los Angeles Police Commission voted Tuesday to support a moratorium on new marijuana outlets, and police Chief William Bratton pledged to work with federal authorities to close the dispensaries.

Ralph Partridge, who heads the Drug Enforcement Administration office in Los Angeles, said the raids showed that the storefront operations are "nothing more than drug trafficking organizations bringing criminal activities to our neighborhoods and drugs near our children and schools."

The West Hollywood City Council voted Tuesday night to strengthen restrictions on marijuana outlets, but some council members have sympathized with those who contend they need pot as medicine.

"The city of West Hollywood has had a long-standing commitment to the compassionate use of medical marijuana for those persons who are facing catastrophic illnesses," City Manager Paul Arevalo said.

LOS ANGELES -- About 100 people demonstrated outside West Hollywood City Hall Thursday to protest Wednesday's federal raids on 11 medical marijuana dispensaries in Los Angeles County, organizers said.

DEA Raids Medical Marijuana Centers (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

Federal agents in California and Washington state have raided several medical marijuana distribution centers, seizing thousands of pounds of the drug, marijuana-laced edibles, weapons and cash. There were no arrests.

DOJ_NMG_0118914

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) Special Agent in Charge Ralph W. Partridge, who heads the agency's Los Angeles field office, said his agents served 11 federal search warrants yesterday at marijuana distribution centers located throughout Los Angeles County, including five locations in West Hollywood, four in the San Fernando Valley, as well as locations in Hollywood and Venice.

"Today's enforcement operations show that these establishments are nothing more than drug-trafficking organizations bringing criminal activities to our neighborhoods and drugs near our children and schools," Mr. Partridge said.

He described the investigation as ongoing, adding that "leads are being actively pursued and developed."

In California, according to the DEA, there is no state regulation or standard of the cultivation or distribution of medical marijuana. The state leaves the establishment of any guidelines to local jurisdictions, which can vary widely.

The DEA and its local and state counterparts routinely have said that large-scale drug traffickers hide behind and invoke California's Proposition 215, even when there is no evidence of any medical claim. Prop. 215 created an exemption from criminal penalties for medical use of marijuana. But it does not legalize marijuana; it only changes how medical patients and their "primary caregivers" will be treated by the state's court system.

The DEA said high-level traffickers often pose as caregivers and are able to sell illegal drugs with impunity.

Drug-enforcement agents also raided the Everett, Wash., headquarters of an advocacy group for medical marijuana patients, confiscating what police documents said were more than 1,000 marijuana plants and computers whose owners said contain personal information on 200 people authorized to use the drug for medicinal purposes.

Detective Roy Alloway, assigned to the federally funded West Sound Narcotics Enforcement Team, discounted assertions by spokesmen for the group that the center was designed as a source for medicinal marijuana only. He told the Associated Press the site was a drug-dealing enterprise, adding that it was "absurd" to think that the number of plants there would be covered by a medicinal marijuana medical authorization.

Washington law allows possession of marijuana in doctor-approved cases but makes no provision for obtaining it.

Agents Raid Medical Marijuana Advocacy Office (SEAPI)

By Casey Mcnerthney And Claudia Rowe, P-I REPORTERS

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, January 19, 2007

Plants, computers and cash seized in Everett

Drug enforcement agents raided the Everett headquarters of an advocacy group for medical marijuana patients, confiscating what police documents say was more than 1,000 plants and computers that the owners say contain personal information of about 200 men and women authorized to use the drug for medicinal purposes.

So far, no one has been arrested or charged with a crime.

Fearful of potential repercussions and unsure of the officers' ultimate aim, patients in the CannaCare network of marijuana users have been "laying low," said one, terrified that they may be prosecuted for using a substance authorized by their physicians.

"Who knows what they're doing with our information?" said Steve Newman, who has multiple sclerosis and has been associated with CannaCare for two years. "It makes me concerned -- really, really concerned. But we're pretty helpless. Nobody can say much about it."

A detective assigned to the federally funded West Sound Narcotics Enforcement Team, which launched Friday's raid, scoffed at the notion that CannaCare -- run out of the home of medical marijuana advocate Steve Sarich -- was anything other than a drug-dealing enterprise.

Detective Roy Alloway said it was "absurd" to think that the number of plants Sarich was tending would be covered by his medical authorization.

"It's clear that Sarich is a guy that's selling drugs," said Alloway, who noted that state law allows no more than a 60-day supply of marijuana for medical use.

The amount found in Sarich's home, he said, was "not even close."

Long a thorn in the side of law enforcement for his vocal, thumb-in-the-eye advocacy style, Sarich, 56, insists that the government is merely harassing patients -- himself included -- who have a legitimate right to use the drug for managing pain due to multiple sclerosis, cancer and a host of other illnesses.

Washington voters approved the use of marijuana for certain medical conditions through a citizens initiative in 1998.

"Since they don't like medical marijuana, this is an attack on the people that support it," said Sarich, who insists he's no drug dealer. The nominal sums CannaCare collects go into supporting medical marijuana users, he said.

Only a few ounces of pot were found in the raid, and Sarich said the bulk of the seized crop was unrooted cuttings and starter plants. He also said the $1,020 drug agents seized in the raid was for his $1,103.56 Snohomish County PUD bill.

The raid's ultimate end remains unclear. Alloway said he referred the information to federal authorities because of the pot-growing operation's size.

Jeff Eig, spokesman for the Seattle division of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, declined to comment.

Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times reported on its Web site that the DEA said federal agents had raided 11 medical marijuana outlets in Los Angeles on Wednesday and seized several thousand pounds of marijuana, along with weapons and money.

Washington law allows possession of marijuana in doctor-approved cases but makes no provision for obtaining it, forcing patients who cannot grow enough to buy from others -- sometimes resorting to patronizing street-corner dealers.

Sarich, however, has flouted the statute by announcing that CannaCare will provide pot plants to patients. He and an associate, John Worthington, whose Renton home was also raided last week, said the police action was politically motivated retaliation.

Sarich also believes that because the state has no list of registered medical marijuana patients, CannaCare was targeted because it has contact information for more than 1,200 users.

That incursion into patient privacy worries advocates at the American Civil Liberties Union at least as much as the bust itself.

Alison Chin Holcomb, director of the Washington ACLU's Marijuana Education Project, said Sarich might have forced the government into it.

"He certainly wasn't afraid of getting the attention of law enforcement," she said. "He put himself out there on the radar."

Worthington recently sent documents alleging drug-enforcement excesses by Alloway to the state House and Senate judiciary and health care committees. He sent another letter to the State Patrol, accusing the detective of tampering with evidence.

"They went after me because I'm an activist, and I've been terrorized out of growing," said Worthington, whose home contained six marijuana plants, according to a Kitsap County Sheriff's Office document. "I can't have my kids frisked like they're criminals. That was disgusting. I'm not Al Capone -- I'm a dad."

Alloway, who works for the Bremerton Police Department, denied the allegations of wrongdoing on Wednesday.

Local Drug Unit Raids Medical Marijuana Organization (KS)

Kitsap Sun, January 18, 2007

Drug detectives from the Kitsap-based West Sound Narcotics Enforcement Team seized about 1,500 marijuana plants from an Everett-based medicinal marijuana group Friday, in what will likely become a marquee case for the state's medical marijuana law.

The headquarters of Cannacare, whose mission is to be a "support group" for the state's medical marijuana users, was searched by the drug unit after WestNET detectives received a search warrant signed by a Kitsap County Superior Court Judge.

The seizure has angered Cannacare's members, who believe federal authorities are attempting to undermine the state's medical marijuana law, passed as an initiative by Washington voters in 1998.

"Rather than arresting the Director of CannaCare, Steve Sarich, and prosecuting him under the Washington State Medical Marijuana law as a patient, the Drug Enforcement Agency was called in to prosecute under federal law," said a blog entry under Cannacare's MySpace site.

Carlos Rodriguez, the sergeant in charge of WestNET, said issues concerning federal and state laws are irrelevant because what Sarich and CannaCare are suspected of doing is illegal.

Rodriguez said the Washington state law allows for a "60-day supply" and a maximum of 27 plants, if the plants are in different stages of life.

"But 1,500 plants for one person is ridiculous," Rodriguez said. "And you're not allowed (under the law) to sell it."

The case is being examined by the federal Drug Enforcement Administration. Charges against Sarich, who was not arrested in the raid, and other CannaCare members may be coming.

Computer registries with records of supposed medicinal marijuana patients were also seized, according to the search affidavit.

Agents Raid Medical Marijuana Grower (KING)

By Rob Piercy, KING 5 News

KING-TV, January 19, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118916

EVERETT, Wash. - Investigators raided members of a medical marijuana advocacy group called Canna Care, saying it was the home of a big-time drug dealer.

But resident Steve Sarich said it's a home of compassion, where cannabis plants are sprouted and given to people who are sick so they can grow their own medical marijuana.

"A lot of them bed ridden or in wheelchairs," Sarich said. "They can't go down to University Avenue and buy a bag off the street."

When he's not tending plants at his "medicinal nursery," Sarich and a friend have also been investigating what they call "unlawful and terrorist raids" conducted by drug task force groups on medical marijuana users.

"If they don't grow, they don't have any medication," he said. "If they do grow, these local drug task forces come in and raid them and terrorize them."

A few days after submitting their investigation to state leaders, agents raided Steve's home Friday. They confiscated hundreds of seedlings, saying it was a major grow-and-sell operation.

Steve said he has a doctor's medical authorization for a 60-day supply.

"A plant this big, that's not in flower, is a zero-day supply of medication," he said. "Whether you have one of them or 5000 of them, it's still a zero day supply of medication."

He says the real reason for the raid was the investigation of task force groups like West Net, the one that raided his house.

"It's a ridiculous claim -- it suggests that I would have a vendetta against someone I don't know," said West Net detective Roy Alloway.

Manhattan: Heroin Ring Arrests (NYT)

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

Three people have been extradited and charged with participating in an international heroin-smuggling operation, federal prosecutors said yesterday. The three, Yaya Yahayai, 50; Henry Sichone, 42; and Andrew Sarpong, 33, are charged with involvement in a smuggling operation that bought heroin in Thailand and moved it through various routes to cities in the United States, including New York, said Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney in Manhattan. Mr. Garcia said the ring recruited couriers who smuggled heroin by swallowing it or using false compartments in suitcases.

For Two Brothers, Colombia's War Is Family Affair (WSJ)

By Matt Moffett

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

BOGOTÁ, Colombia -- Roberto and Guillermo Sáenz were the youngest and middle of seven children born to conservative schoolteachers half a century ago. As a war between the army and Marxist guerrillas gathered force, Roberto recalls being sheltered by Guillermo and his other siblings in a childhood full of "studying, fútbol and fiestas."

Then when Roberto was entering the university and Guillermo was nearing graduation, Guillermo broke some news. " 'Man, I don't see any sense in all of this,' " Roberto recalls his brother saying. " 'I'm going.' " Guillermo fled into the jungle to join the largest leftist guerrilla group, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, eventually rising to the rank of "ideological leader" of the seven-member ruling secretariat. Today, he's one of the most wanted men in the Americas, with a price on his head of $2 million from the Colombian government and $5 million from the U.S.

Roberto pursued a political career, one that brought him to a quite different leadership position: He's the designated peacemaker for the government of this capital city. The municipal agency he heads, the Reconciliation Network, works in Bogotá's barrios promoting nonviolent solutions to social conflicts, holding candlelight vigils and petition drives, encouraging young people to express their opinions peaceably in graffiti art and rap music. "Our mission is showing that creative protest is more effective than picking up a gun," says Roberto, who is 50 years old.

Millions of Colombian families find themselves divided by the country's interminable conflict, but few are at such odds as the Sáenz brothers. While Roberto collects signatures to put a disarmament referendum on the ballot, Guillermo, 58, faces criminal charges from the Colombian government of blowing up pipelines and bombing villages. While Roberto manages a program to aid families of those kidnapped by the FARC, Guillermo is charged with masterminding abductions. While Roberto uses politics, sports and music to try keeping youths out of the orbit of violent drug traffickers, Guillermo faces a U.S. indictment alleging that he helped "set the FARC's cocaine [trafficking] policies" and arranged the murder of hundreds of people who got in his way. The indictment handed up in Washington last March accused 50 senior FARC guerrillas of shipping cocaine valued at more than $25 billion to the U.S. and other countries.

'Wrong Path'

DOJ_NMG_0118917

Roberto says he tried -- without success -- to get Guillermo to renounce violence in their last meeting back in 1991, when FARC leaders left the jungle for peace talks with the government held in Caracas, Venezuela. "To my brother, I say, 'I hope you're in good health and don't have problems' " Roberto says. "But to the guerrilla, I say, 'Give up this war because it's the wrong path.' "

Though Roberto says he hasn't tried to contact Guillermo since their meeting 16 years ago, he has found that having a rebel comandante in the family is a hard thing for an antiviolence activist to live down. "Even though in Colombia nobody gets surprised by anything anymore," the newsweekly Semana said last year, Roberto's position "doesn't fail to attract attention." Roberto believes his phones are tapped by intelligence operatives hoping for some clue that could lead them to Guillermo, who is generally referred to by Colombians, including Roberto himself, by his nom de guerre, Alfonso Cano.

In revenge for abductions carried out by Guillermo, another Sáenz brother, José Ricardo, was kidnapped in 1996 by right-wing paramilitaries, which oppose the guerrillas and are involved in drug trafficking and other criminal activities. The kidnappers had intended to seize Roberto, he says, but he had already left Colombia for a diplomatic post in Europe after getting death threats. Hoping to win his brother's release, Guillermo, from hiding, issued a statement saying José Ricardo, a teacher, had no links to the FARC. "My intense fraternal pain is mingled with the pain of many Colombians wearied by similar or worse tragedies," Guillermo wrote. José Ricardo was freed after eight months in captivity.

The family drama doesn't seem to have shaken Guillermo's revolutionary fervor. In position papers and interviews with Colombian journalists over the years, he has maintained that violence is justified because of inequities that are built into Colombia's economic and political systems. "We guerrillas have been obliged to take up arms to find peace," Guillermo once wrote. "It's the great contradiction and a terrible truth."

Peacemaking Tradition

Roberto allows that while violence is one truth in Colombia, the country also has a peacemaking tradition that is often overlooked. He and Bogotá's leftist mayor, Luis Eduardo Garzón, set up the Reconciliation Network in 2005 to train people for making peace even as a military boot camp would train people for making war.

In classes the Reconciliation Network has started offering for community leaders, there are lessons about Colombia's pacifist Páez Indians, who once halted a firefight between guerrillas and rural police by walking into the no man's land carrying only ceremonial palm staffs. In addition, the Network encourages activities such as Golombiao -- a variation of soccer pioneered by other peace-promoting groups -- with a scorekeeping system that weighs teamwork and respect for opponents, as well as the number of goals put in the net. Teams must be coed and, for it to count, the first goal must be scored by a female player.

The Network also helps run a protest and public-information campaign to press conservative President Álvaro Uribe to swap FARC prisoners held by the government for hostages held by the guerrillas. Deyanira Ortiz, whose husband, an ex-legislator, was kidnapped by the FARC five years ago and is still missing, doesn't hold Roberto's brother against him. "Colombia is an odd place," Mrs. Ortiz says. "It's possible for a single family to produce a soldier, a priest and a guerrilla. We all appreciate Mr. Sáenz's support."

The Network's staff of 16 social workers, from philosophy graduates to ex-guerrillas who now renounce violence, work on projects in rough neighborhoods like Ciudad Bolívar. In 2005, paramilitary gangs murdered 150 Bolívar youths who violated their curfews and other directives. "Nice kids go to bed early," read the chilling paramilitary graffiti, "and those that don't, we'll put to bed."

The Network's man in the barrio, Jairo Vargas, worked with youths and community leaders on a campaign of marches, late-night parties held in defiance of curfews and painting sessions in which youths covered paramilitary graffiti with murals. The number of youth killings in Bolívar fell to just 40 last year.

Bolívar young people like 16-year-old Jhon Castro are enlisting in the nonviolent cause. About a year ago, Jhon's best friend was killed by paramilitaries. But rather than seeking vengeance, Jhon says he channeled his anger into a Network protest last September aimed at getting a local university to admit more poor youths, who otherwise might be drawn to armed gangs. The first couple of days no one noticed the demonstration involving scores of students. Then they brought in a rapper and a sound system. "It was still a nonviolent protest -- just much louder," Jhon says. In no time, the university dean came out to cut a deal expanding access to poor students.

Guillermo, however, continues to cast a shadow over Roberto's peacemaking efforts. With President Uribe escalating the offensive against the guerrillas, Roberto has to deal with refugees streaming to Bogotá from war-torn provinces like Tolima -- the very operating area of the Central Bloc of the FARC that Guillermo helps command.

Last month, the army announced that it had killed a guerrilla fighter who had been Guillermo's chief bodyguard and was on the trail of the comandante himself. Roberto says both his parents died resigned to the path Guillermo had taken, and Roberto himself holds out little hope for a late-life conversion. "He'll likely die fighting," says Roberto.

Holed-Up Tax Protester, Wife Convicted (FINDLAW/AP)

By Philip Elliott, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 19, 2007

(AP) - CONCORD, N.H.-A man who has holed up with armed supporters in his cement-walled house for most of his tax evasion trial was found guilty Thursday, along with his wife, of failing to pay federal income taxes for a decade.

Ed Brown has said he will defend himself against capture if necessary.

U.S. Marshal Stephen Monier said Thursday that members of his staff continued talking by telephone with Brown and had no plans to confront him.

Ed Brown's wife, Elaine, a dentist who earned most of the couple's income, has been staying with a son in Massachusetts and attended the trial.

The Browns, of Plainfield, contend the law does not require them to pay federal income tax, while the government says the Browns owe more than $625,000. The Browns stopped paying income taxes in 1996 and stopped filing returns in 1998, a prosecutor said. They could each face decades in prison.

A jury decided they employed a scheme to hide their income and avoid taxes in part by using postal money orders in increments just below the reporting threshold to pay for their hilltop compound. Courts have routinely rejected similar attempts by other taxpayers.

Marshals now have to consider how to seize the Browns' assets. The jury was deliberating whether the Browns should lose their home.

"We've established a good line of communication, all of our conversations have been amicable and friendly, and that's how we expect they will continue," Monier said.

Ed Brown stopped attending court midway through the trial, which began Jan. 9. His wife remains out on bail pending the couple's April 24 sentencing; she has said she loves her husband, but that his way of handling the case is not hers.

A man who answered the telephone at the Browns' house Thursday afternoon said Ed Brown could not come to the phone, but had expected a guilty verdict.

"He's here at the house, and he's not leaving of his own free will," said the man, who identified himself only as Bernie.

Ed Brown, a retired exterminator, has said he stayed home to protest a system that had already convicted him.

"Most Americans would cower and cringe and raise their hands and surrender like a good little slave," he told reporters at his home this week.

"I won't. Under no circumstances. I do not tolerate cowardliness, oppression, bulliness, and I certainly don't tolerate a federal agency that has absolutely zero jurisdiction in my state, never mind in my county, in my town."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Focus On Broad Challenges Facing Country (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — When President Bush delivers his State of the Union address Tuesday, he'll be facing a new audience on an old issue: a Democratic majority in Congress that is strongly opposed to his new plan for the Iraq war.

Explaining the proposal to boost U.S. troop strength by 21,500 in Iraq is a major goal of Bush's speech, said White House press secretary Tony Snow, even as Democrats and some Republicans push forward a non-binding resolution against it.

"We understand it's going to be a skeptical audience," Snow said.

Unlike Bush's prime-time address on Iraq last week, Snow said, the State of the Union "has a large domestic component" that will be crafted to find common ground with the Democrats who control Congress. The agenda includes immigration, education and energy.

The speech will also focus less on a laundry list of specific proposals and promises, as many of these presidential addresses do, and instead focus on broader challenges facing the country.

"A lot of times these speeches, they just go on and on and you lose people," Snow said. "It's better to spend some time focusing on big issues so that people do get a sense of your engagement with them."

DOJ_NMG_0118919

Linda Fowler, a government professor at Dartmouth College, said Bush's challenge won't be in convincing the lawmakers gathered in the House chamber Tuesday — it will be gaining public support for his plans on Iraq so he can move on to domestic issues. She said the "deeply unpopular war" in Iraq has sapped Bush's popularity and made it more difficult for him to maneuver politically.

"It really creates barriers for other activity," she said.

Presidents have delivered State of the Union speeches before in difficult times. President Reagan did in 1987, shortly after the Iran-contra scandal broke, and President Clinton did in 1999, in the middle of his impeachment trial. Reagan, however, used his address to talk about winning the Cold War with the Soviet Union, and Clinton enjoyed Gallup Poll approval ratings in 1999 in the high 60s. Bush's overall approval rating was at 34% in last weekend's USA TODAY/Gallup Poll.

Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a senior scholar at the University of Southern California, said Bush needs to discuss issues beyond the war, if only "to show that Iraq is not all encompassing" and that he wants to work with Democrats.

"He can't pass any kind of agenda without reaching out to the majority," she said. "It's legacy time."

Snow did not elaborate on speech details Thursday, but indicated that among other issues the president would discuss global warming as he talks about alternative energy sources.

Bush is also expected to renew his call for a "comprehensive" immigration bill that includes a program for temporary, foreign "guest workers" and tighter border security. Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., and other Republicans object to guest-worker programs. They say the programs provide amnesty for illegal immigrants.

Extending and expanding the No Child Left Behind education law figures to be on the president's agenda, as well as proposals for health savings accounts that carry tax advantages.

Shorter State Of The Union Will Stress Common Ground (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

President Bush on Tuesday will deliver a stripped-down State of the Union address, leaving out the usual laundry list of policy initiatives, and emphasizing common ground with Democrats in a nod to the new political reality on Capitol Hill, the White House said yesterday.

"Some of the old State of the Union formulas have kind of run their course," spokesman Tony Snow said.

"Part of the calculation here is that a lot of times these speeches, they just go on and on and you lose people," Mr. Snow said. "It's better to spend some time focusing on big issues so that people do get a sense of your engagement with them, and there will be opportunities to pick up other topics in much greater detail later on."

The presentation, which will skip the old, hourlong formula in which "every department and every agency gets a line or a mention," was devised because, as Mr. Snow said with a smile, "we want people to watch."

Another change will be the president's audience. For the first time, he will address a Democratic majority in the joint chamber. Behind him, right next to Vice President Dick Cheney, will be House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California. This scenario has influenced the speech, which will seek to enunciate issues on which Republicans and Democrats can agree.

"In that sense, maybe it does reflect a little bit of the political reality," Mr. Snow said.

The spokesman said Mr. Bush will focus on a few broad themes, including the war on terrorism, energy, health care, immigration and education.

Mr. Snow said that although Mr. Bush will use some of his prime-time address to lay out the domestic agenda for his final two years in office, he also will devote a portion to defending his new Iraq strategy, which calls for sending more than 21,500 additional troops to the war-torn country.

"We've noted all along that the speech is not a one-time-only engagement with the American public. It's worth talking about," he said.

The president said in a television interview yesterday that he understands there is "skepticism" about his Iraq plan. But he added, "I believe it will work."

As for the Democrats, the White House said they should offer their own plan on Iraq if they oppose the president. Moreover, Mr. Snow said, the new majority should wait until Mr. Bush delivers his address on Tuesday.

"We understand that because of politics -- I mean, people are already prebutting his speech they haven't heard. And they're developing their responses to policies they haven't seen. So we understand how that works," he said.

Still, Mr. Bush plans to offer some olive branches to Democrats, and will seek to reach across party lines in search of consensus.

DOJ_NMG_0118920

"The fact is that there are going to be a number of policies here that are going to be good politics because they're good policies. And they're going to offer opportunities for Democrats and Republicans to work together on areas where they do have a vested interest in making this a stronger and better country," Mr. Snow said.

Bush Tailors State Of The Union Speech (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, January 19, 2007

President Bush's State of the Union speech next week will avoid the traditional laundry list of initiatives and focus on a few issues, such as energy and health care, where he might find common ground with the Democratic-controlled Congress.

Bush is considering ways to make health care affordable and seek the power to raise gas mileage standards for passenger cars, according to former administration and industry officials.

The approach to Tuesday night's speech, as outlined Thursday by White House press secretary Tony Snow, reflects the current political landscape: Voters in November ousted Republicans as the party in charge on Capitol Hill and Bush now faces skeptical majority Democrats rather than compliant GOP lawmakers.

The speech comes less than two weeks after Bush announced a big buildup of U.S. troops in Iraq. With Bush's low approval ratings, a narrowly tailored national address might keep the public from tuning out or reaching for the remote, White House officials reason.

"I just think some of the old State of the Union formulas have kind of run their course," Snow said.

The president plans to highlight the war in Iraq and the fight against terrorism as well as immigration and education, Snow said.

On the school front, for example, Bush is expected to urge that Congress renew the No Child Left Behind law, the signature domestic policy of his first term.

In last year's speech, Bush rebuked critics of his stay-the-course strategy in Iraq; at the time, more than 2,240 American troops had died. This year he will defend his plan for a war that now has claimed more than 3,000 U.S. lives.

Democrats have chosen Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia, a vocal critic of the war who has a son serving in Iraq, to give their party's response. Colorado Sen. Ken Salazar, who grew up in a Spanish-speaking household, will deliver the Democrats' first-ever Spanish-language preview address to the president's State of the Union.

The costs of the war and the deficit probably will preclude Bush from announcing expensive new programs.

As he did last year, when he said America was "addicted to oil," Bush is expected to bemoan U.S. reliance on foreign sources of energy and express support for alternative fuels.

The president is expected to challenge Congress to fix Social Security's long-term solvency problem, preserve tax cuts, join him in balancing the budget within five years and work to make the costs of the war more transparent in the federal budget.

According to two auto industry officials, the president may seek the power to raise fuel economy standards for passenger cars. The two officials, who spoke only condition of anonymity because they did not want to pre-empt Bush's address, said it probably would be part of a plan to offer more incentives for increasing alternative fuels and accelerating the number of vehicles running on alternative fuel.

Bush asked Congress for the authority to change fuel economy standards for passenger cars last year; the measure failed in the House. The administration has opposed simply imposing tougher mileage requirements without changing the system because of safety concerns and interest in providing flexibility to struggling domestic automakers.

The administration released new fuel economy rules last year for sport utility vehicles, pickups and vans based on a vehicle's size. Automakers were supportive of the changes, developed after months of study. Environmentalists said it was insufficient because it required only nominal increases in the standards.

On health care, the president is expected to continue promoting health savings accounts, according to Roy Ramthun, a former economic adviser to the president.

Such accounts are available to people who buy insurance policies with high deductibles, meaning consumers are responsible for more of the initial costs when they see a doctor or a dentist. The insurance policies do not cost as much because of the high deductible, yet they do provide protection in the event of a major injury or illness.

Ramthun said Congress agreed with some of the president's request last year to raise the contribution limits for the accounts. Congress also agreed to let employers put more money into the accounts of low-wage workers, he said.

Bush last year urged higher contribution limits and proposed letting employers contribute extra amounts for chronically ill workers. Ramthun said he believes the president will repeat those calls this year.

A Reality-Based State Of The Union (column) (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0118921

By Eugene Robinson
Washington Post, January 18, 2007

For those of you who can't wait until Tuesday's big speech, my fellow Americans, here's the real state of the union:

A president who reduces the near-infinite variety of humankind to "with us" or "against us" has mired the nation in a disastrous, unnecessary war. Comparisons to Vietnam are imprecise -- the American casualties in Iraq are lower, the geopolitical stakes are much higher and the damage to our nation's standing in the world has been incalculable.

Some believe that the president sees clearly the futility of his ill-advised war and that at this point he's just stalling so his successor will take the fall for an eventual American withdrawal. Those cynics are wrong; George W. Bush has demonstrated time and again that he values resolve over reason.

The us-or-them president is now assuming an elbows-out posture toward Iran that is disturbingly reminiscent of the run-up to war in Iraq -- denunciations, threats, a military buildup in the Persian Gulf. Haven't we seen this movie before?

Oh, and the president's tic of smiling at inappropriate moments -- such as when he's answering a question from Scott Pelley or Jim Lehrer about the human costs of the war -- has become a little scary.

Congress is effectively powerless to stop the president from escalating his futile war with a "surge" of 21,500 troops. But Republicans are joining the new Democratic majority in opposition to the war, and this growing, bipartisan consensus threatens to pit Capitol Hill against the White House in an increasingly bitter confrontation.

In other news, fellow citizens, scientists reported that 2006 was the warmest year on record for the United States. The first half of January 2007 was so balmy in the Northeast that crocuses bloomed. Only recently has the president begun to pay grudging lip service to global warming, while firmly resisting measures -- such as capping carbon emissions -- that might actually mitigate the pressure humans are putting on the climate system. I've begun to wonder how a row of palm trees would look in my back yard.

More than a year after the president pledged to rebuild New Orleans, the city is still a ghost of its former self. Neighborhoods remain devastated, residents still can't go home, businesses can't function without workers or customers, and now a brutal crime wave has filled the crippled city with fear. Had Bush fulfilled his promise with quick, comprehensive, effective federal assistance in the weeks after Hurricane Katrina -- a Marshall Plan for the Gulf Coast -- the city might be back on its feet. As things stand, it's not a question of when New Orleans will fully recover, but if.

Fellow Americans, you have come to see economic inequality as a major issue, especially those of you who live in parts of the country that have suffered from the effects of globalization. This phenomenon is poorly understood here in Washington, and your government has offered you no solutions. Candidates who find a way to talk about the widening gap between haves and have-nots are likely to do well in 2008.

The debate over the war drowned out one of the most significant events of the week in Washington: a joint news conference Tuesday by the Business Roundtable, AARP and the Service Employees International Union to call for health-care reform. The nation's biggest corporations, its most influential consumer group and its most aggressive labor union came together to demand that an unfair, expensive, inefficient system be fixed. Massachusetts and California have already begun to tackle the problem. Maybe someday the White House and Congress will get into the game.

The immigration issue continues to smolder and surely will flare up again. In education, No Child Left Behind hasn't begun to live up to its promises. Many Americans fear that their children's lives will not be as prosperous as their own.

But the state of the union is not all bad, my fellow Americans. When the president gives his speech, one of those two seats behind him will be occupied by a woman, Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi -- a first, and an undeniable sign of progress. The two leading candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination are a woman and a black man -- more progress. The nation spoke clearly, and loudly, in the midterm elections, and now there's a counterbalance to the out-of-control White House.

Yes, Washington can be thickheaded and slow. You may have to repeat yourselves a few more times, fellow Americans, but eventually the message will get through.

House Dems Close The First '100 Hours' (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn
AP, January 19, 2007

The House wrapped up the Democrats' "100 Hours" legislative sprint Thursday with time to spare, voting to recoup billions of dollars in lost royalties from oil and gas companies and roll back industry tax breaks.

The energy bill capped a two-week drumbeat of votes on legislation that, while popular with voters last fall, awaits a sketchy fate in the Senate.

The House bill, approved 264-123, sets a conservation fee on oil and gas from the Gulf of Mexico, attempts to recoup royalties lost because of a government error in drilling leases in the late 1990s, and rolls back several oil industry tax breaks.

DOJ_NMG_0118922

"In the November election, the American people signaled their wish for change — a wish for our country to go in a new direction," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. "Democrats promised that we would, and these past two weeks, we have delivered on our promise."

Democrats accomplished their early legislative goals in 87 hours, adopting new ethics rules and passing bills raising the minimum wage, expanding taxpayer financed research into embryonic stem cells, forcing more homeland security measures, directing the federal government to negotiate for cheaper Medicare prescription drugs and lowering interest rates on subsidized student loans.

Democrats pushed the legislation through swiftly, denying Republicans any opportunity to amend bills, and established themselves as the vanguard for the Democratic agenda. But internal friction within both parties, the potential for partisan gridlock in the Senate and confrontation with the White House over the war in Iraq signal less, not more, legislative production in the weeks ahead.

In the Senate, Democrats and Republicans on Thursday struggled to untangle a partisan knot that threatened to sink ethics legislation. The episode illustrated how hampered Senate Democrats are to impose their will with their razor-thin majority.

The past two weeks also took the glow off the cooperative tone both parties set in the opening day of the new Congress. House Republicans complained bitterly about being denied amendments on the legislation, an echo of Democratic complaints during the 12 years of Republican dominance.

"We are short-circuiting democracy here, and I think my colleagues on both sides of the aisle understand it," said House Republican leader John Boehner, R-Ohio. "I'm here today to ask my colleagues on the other side of the aisle to live up to the promises that were made, to live up to the desire to be treated fairly."

Democrats were not sympathetic.

"We are working on an agenda that the minority would not or could not do, and we're fulfilling our promise to the American people," said Rep. Louise Slaughter, D-N.Y., chairman of the House Rules Committee. "And all the whining you can do, all of it you can produce will not deter us from it."

Still some Democrats were eager to move on to a more deliberative pace.

"One of the things that we were savagely critical of is the fact that the Republicans did not follow the regular order," said Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich. "Now it is time for us to get back and take ourselves seriously and proceed under the regular order."

For all its speed, the House legislation now enters the quicksands of the Senate, where Republicans already are displaying their ability to alter or slow down the Democratic agenda.

Senate Republicans, for instance, were trying to use the ethics legislation to extract a promise from Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada that the Senate would get a vote on legislation to give the president authority to challenge individual spending items for elimination.

Republicans also insisted on attaching $8.3 billion in small business tax breaks to a Senate version of minimum wage legislation. The legislation was written jointly by Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus, D-Mont., and the committee's ranking Republican, Charles Grassley. Reid has said he would support the tax breaks to pass the new wage floor. But House Democrats have objected, noting that tax legislation must originate in the House, with the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee.

Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., said Senate Democrats were essentially telling the House that Congress would not raise the minimum wage if it did not contain tax breaks.

"How are you going to explain that?" he asked. "I don't know what Baucus and Reid are talking about."

Senate Republicans also planned to press for different legislation dealing with college tuition. The House bill would cut in half the interest rates paid by college graduates for their need-based, federally subsidized loans. Republicans have argued that students would be better helped by expanding federal tuition grants.

If passed by the Senate, the prescription drug bill and the stem cell research bills also face presidential vetoes. The House vote margins were not sufficient to override a veto.

But the prescription drug bill may not even reach the president in its current form. Baucus and other senators want to scale back the scope of the House bill, by targeting the drugs that the government would be permitted to bargain for prices.

If the partisan friction were not enough, both parties face internal conflicts as well.

Several House and Senate Republicans have objected to President Bush's troop boosting plan for Iraq. Two Republican senators — Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine — have singed on to a nonbinding resolution opposing the insertion of 21,500 new troops into the war.

Democrats are divided themselves, unable to agree on how to express their opposition to Bush. Some prefer a nonbonding resolution, while others in the House and Senate want more muscular legislation specifically limiting Bush's ability to act on his strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0118923

In the House, Pelosi and some of her key committee chairmen were on a collision course over how to address global warming legislation. Pelosi wants to create a special committee to recommend legislation, at least duplicating work by committees that have jurisdiction on climate change issues.

After 42 Hours (or So), House Democrats Complete 100-Hour Push (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — House Democrats met the goals of their 100-hour legislative offensive with plenty of time to spare on Thursday, claiming that their successes proved they could govern.

Republicans derided the hurry-up nature of the effort as a bit of one-sided political showmanship that undercut the Democrats' pledge that the new Congress would be more bipartisan.

But the easy approval of the half-dozen measures in the 100-hour agenda — dealing with the minimum wage, embryonic stem cell research, health care, national security, education and energy — was celebrated by the new majority as a validation of the blitz, an idea born on the campaign trail that blossomed into a central House Democratic theme.

"It was a way to say that this Congress will no longer be a place where optimism and good ideas come to die," said Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, who devised the approach as what Democrats deemed a counterpoint to 12 years of Republican control.

Ms. Pelosi also established another benchmark on Thursday, announcing that she had asked Democratic lawmakers who serve as committee chairmen to draw up a series of energy bills "so that by the Fourth of July we can have a package of legislation to truly declare our energy independence."

Some Republicans predicted that only one or two of the 100-hour bills would eventually become law in a form close to that approved by the House. And they heaped criticism on Democrats for not giving them any chance to offer their own proposals.

"We are short-circuiting democracy here, and I think my colleagues on both sides of the aisle understand this," Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the minority leader, said Thursday on the floor as the Democrats pushed through the last bill, rolling back some subsidies for the oil industry.

Republicans and some Democrats said the 100-hour drive had been somewhat overshadowed by the debate over the war in Iraq and President Bush's proposed troop buildup there.

"As long as George Bush is in the White House, putting more troops in Iraq, that is all that matters to voters," said Representative Tom Davis, Republican of Virginia. (Mr. Davis said he was still assessing his position on the president's decision to send more than 20,000 additional troops in an effort to quell sectarian violence.)

The ability of House Democrats to pass their bills within the prescribed time was never in doubt, given the majority's ability to control the schedule and the leadership's decision to be very selective in how it counted the time. When the Democratic clock stopped, only 42 hours 25 minutes of time actually spent on the bills had expired, and Democrats said they could have easily handled the legislation more quickly.

The Associated Press, which counted all the time the House was in session, clocked the 100-hour effort at 87 hours.

While the whole enterprise drew ridicule from Republicans, the Democratic response was essentially "look who's laughing now."

"They can make fun of it," said Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the majority leader. "But they cannot make fun of the fact that for the first time in 10 years, we have raised the minimum wage."

The $2.10-an-hour increase in the minimum wage may be the legislation with the best chance of becoming law. The Senate is expected to consider a similar proposal quickly, though senators of both parties support adding tax breaks for businesses to help them offset any new costs. House Democrats prefer an increase without such an add-on, but may go along in order to get a measure to the president's desk.

The outlook for other 100-hour measures is more problematic. Last year Mr. Bush vetoed legislation that would have expanded federal financing of embryonic stem cell research, and the House still lacks a veto-proof majority for a similar bill it just passed. Another measure, directing the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies over the cost of drugs sold through Medicare, could also draw a veto.

In addition, senators say they have reservations about the costs of enacting recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission that are newly approved by the House, and they have different ideas as well on the remaining bills.

"Many of the 100-hours 'accomplishments' can't make it through the Senate" or survive a veto, said Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri, the Republican whip.

DOJ_NMG_0118924

But Democrats said that they had done what they set out to do and that the first flurry of legislation was the start of their work, not the end. “This is just the beginning of making sure the future is a future that’s fair for everybody,” said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus.

Now his party is faced with what to do in the next 100 hours, and the next, particularly after promising a full House workweek. The coming days are likely to be dominated by the war in Iraq and by Mr. Bush’s plan for more troops there.

Ms. Pelosi, who met Thursday with Democratic senators, said afterward that House Democrats would line up behind a version of the new Senate resolution declaring that the troop increase is not in the country’s best interest.

Though that measure is not binding on the president, Ms. Pelosi said Democrats would continue to apply pressure on him to change his approach on both the war and their legislative program.

“All of these bills are being passed in a bipartisan way,” the speaker said. “We hope that he would consider signing them. We will take our campaign on these issues, though, to the public, in hopes that their voices would be heard by him.”

Congress Is Off To A Bipartisan Start, But Tougher Tests Lie Ahead (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 19, 2007

from the January 19, 2007 edition - http://www.csmonitor.com/2007/0119/p02s02-uspo.html Congress is off to a bipartisan start, but tougher tests lie ahead In the first 100 legislative hours, House Democrats drew significant GOP support of their 'Six for '06' agenda.

By Gail Russell Chaddock | Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

WASHINGTON

After a bitterly fought midterm election, Democrats controlling the new Congress pledged to transcend partisanship and tackle the big problems that concern Americans. Then, something happened that neither Washington insiders nor, probably, even the voters expected: Lawmakers began acting as if they meant it.

In the 110th Congress's first 100 legislative hours, which wrapped up Thursday, House Democrats drew a significant number of GOP votes on their "Six for '06" agenda, despite giving minority Republicans little voice in shaping the legislation.

A rule change to overhaul lobbying and ethics reform cleared the House on a nearly unanimous vote. A bill to enact additional antiterror recommendations of the 9/11 commission pulled 68 GOP votes. Eighty-two Republicans helped pass the first increase in the federal minimum wage in nine years; 37 Republicans supported expanding federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research; and 124 members of the GOP caucus joined Democrats to gradually cut interest rates in half on student loans.

At the same time, Democrats in the House and Senate scrambled this week to find partners on the other side of the aisle to challenge the White House over its conduct of the Iraq war. On Wednesday, Sen. Chuck Hagel (R) of Nebraska became the first Republican to formally break with the Bush White House, by supporting a bipartisan resolution opposing the president's plan to send more US troops.

Heeding the voters

The bipartisan, problem-solving mantra is one that lawmakers of both stripes say they took straight from voters in the midterm election. "The message in the last election was a resounding repudiation of the status quo and partisanship that had poisoned the ability of Congress to develop solutions," says Sen. Olympia Snowe (R) of Maine. "People are demanding government and results. People were so disaffected, and that really has been a galvanizing force toward bipartisanship."

Sen. Barack Obama (D) of Illinois sounded a similar note in launching his presidential exploratory committee this week. "I've been struck by how hungry we are for a different kind of politics," he said. "It's not the magnitude of our problems that concerns me most, it's the smallness of our politics."

More strange bedfellows

Interest groups and lobbyists, too, seem to have caught the spirit, at least a little. Some say they are finding an opening for bipartisan cooperation in the 110th Congress that could lead to breakthroughs on issues ranging from climate change to universal healthcare.

Some of these issues are not now at the top of Democrats' agenda. On Tuesday, leaders of the Business Roundtable, the Service Employees International Union (SEIU), and the AARP (a lobby group for seniors), announced they were, for the first time, joining forces to push Congress for universal-healthcare legislation.

"There are a lot of things Congress needs to do that are now doable," says Bill Novelli, AARP's CEO. "What's really powering this is that these problems have gotten so bad." Healthcare costs are breaking employers, who are shifting costs to employees. "It's now the middle class that is affected, and the middle class is very worried," he says. "When you get to that kind of situation, there's a lot of pressure."

DOJ_NMG_0118925

Views are converging around a healthcare approach that combines elements of patient cost-sharing and government regulation. "The answer to the healthcare problem is not one of policy but one of politics," said SEIU's Andy Stern.

On another front, 28 evangelical leaders and climate scientists signed a joint "call for action" Wednesday. The partnership taps into a rich vein for bipartisan collaboration in the new Congress. In the run-up to President Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday, which is expected to feature new energy initiatives, lawmakers on both sides of the aisle announced new collaborations on energy policy.

"Congress and the American people cannot afford to wait for the White House to lead on this issue," said Senate majority leader Harry Reid, as he previewed work by six committees on energy independence. In one of the strongest bipartisan collaborations on Capitol Hill, Sens. Joseph Biden (D) of Delaware and Richard Lugar (R) of Indiana, chairman and ranking member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, are sponsoring a resolution calling on the US to return to international negotiations to limit greenhouse-gas emissions.

On the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, Sens. Joseph Lieberman (I) of Connecticut, Norm Coleman (R) of Minnesota, Evan Bayh (D) of Indiana, and Ken Salazar (D) of Colorado introduced this week a bill to cut oil imports by 7 million barrels a day by 2026.

A united front on the Iraq war?

The strongest pull for bipartisan cooperation is shaping up to be the Iraq war. GOP senators seen to be wavering on their support for Mr. Bush's "new way forward" in Iraq were called to the White House Wednesday for consultations.

"I suspect very little mind-changing went on there, but I'm hopeful that some of this gets back to the president," says Senator Coleman, one of a dozen senators who reportedly met with administration officials. He doesn't support "putting American forces into the cross hairs of sectarian violence," but has yet to sign on to a resolution opposing it.

Poll: Dems' '100-hour' Agenda Gets Mixed Reviews (LAT)

By Janet Hook, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON - A bipartisan majority of Americans strongly supports the bills that whisked through the House in the first days of the Democratic-controlled Congress, but many remain uncertain about where the party wants to lead the nation, a new Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll has found.

Approval of Congress has increased since the midterm elections ousted Republicans from their House and Senate majorities and Democrats are viewed in a more positive light after two weeks in power, according to the survey.

But only 25% of those surveyed believed that Democrats have formulated a clear direction for the country; 58% said they had failed to.

Those results amount to a mixed report card on the much-ballyhooed "100-hour" agenda House Democrats set for themselves as they took power.

They made a strong start with House passage of some broadly popular bills, such as an increase in the minimum wage and a cut in student loan rates that passed with significant Republican support - rare displays of bipartisanship after years of the party-line splits that marked GOP control.

But the survey underscores that Democrats still have much to prove to voters as the Senate debates these bills and lawmakers in both chambers turn to more divisive issues, such as the federal budget, global warming and Iraq.

Overall, the poll found 36% approve of how Congress is doing its job - hardly a mandate, but up from 30% in September.

"So far, so good," said Hildegard Wharton, a retiree in Wooster, Ohio, who responded to the poll.

Wharton, a Democrat, added: "I hope they do a better job than the Republicans. If they don't, they are not going to get reelected."

The Times/Bloomberg poll, supervised by Times Poll Director Susan Pinkus, surveyed 1,344 adults by telephone Saturday through Tuesday. It has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

It found that pressure is especially high for Democrats to change course in Iraq; 45% identified the war as the most important issue for the new Congress to address, a far higher figure than for any other issue.

"If they just tackle this war and get these boys home, they will be doing good," said Jerry Alexander, a retired car salesman in Savannah, Tenn., who is an independent. "They better, because that's what they were elected for."

The positive reaction among those polled to the major elements of the initial Democratic agenda ratifies the political strategy behind its design: party leaders deliberately filled the congressional session's opening hours with issues that, for the most part, polls have found enjoyed broad bipartisan support and were likely to pass before President Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday. One aim was to provide a contrast with the gridlock that stalled many bills during the recent years of the Republican-controlled Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0118926

The student loan rate cut that passed the House on Wednesday was supported by 79% of those polled. Legislation aimed at lowering prices in Medicare's prescription drug program, which passed the House last week, was backed by 80%.

Repealing tax breaks for big oil companies, which the House approved Thursday, was supported by 61%. An expansion of federal funding for embryonic stem cell research, passed by the chamber last week, was backed by 59%.

The most popular item was the push to increase the federal minimum wage, which under the House bill would rise over two years to $7.25 an hour from $5.15. The increase, which would be the first in a decade, was supported by 81% of those surveyed - including 66% of the self-described conservatives.

"The minimum wage increase was long overdue," said Susan Wilkinson, a homemaker and a Democrat who lives in Trabuko Canyon in Orange County. "It's pretty sad that it had to be even an issue to debate."

Democrats hope their early results will reinforce the judgment by voters in November that it was time for a change of control in Congress.

The new poll indicates a less critical view of congressional Democrats among the public - although their favorable rating is virtually unchanged, 42% now, compared to 40% in September, their unfavorable rating was 32%, down from 41% in the previous poll.

Accompanying that drop was an increase - to 22% from 15% - in those who said they did not know enough about congressional Democrats to judge. That suggests there is a sizable wait-and-see faction among voters.

"I just don't know how much of what they have done is going to bear any fruit," said Jim Bauder, a computer programmer in Fort Jones, Calif.

Bauder, an independent, added: "President Bush has declared he's going to veto many of the things they have passed. Is it going to be a situation where anything gets accomplished?"

Some of the early promises emanating from Washington are being viewed with skepticism.

Almost three-quarters of those surveyed - 72% - supported House-passed ethics reforms to ban gifts from lobbyists and require the disclosure of pork barrel projects. But only 27% said they believed such measures would make a real difference; 60% said they expect business-as-usual in the way Capitol Hill operates.

"My experience is that there have been reforms, but there always seems to be new or expanding loopholes people find," said Bauder.

Helen Anderson, a teacher in Houston, said she was unimpressed with what Democrats have done in the opening weeks.

"I think they are trying to make a big show to make it look like they are taking a new direction," said Anderson, a Republican. "All they can say is they want to do the opposite of what's being done now, but they don't say how they are going to do it."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), in the news spotlight since the November elections as the first woman to lead either congressional chamber, remains little known to many Americans but has made some headway in raising her national profile.

Among those with an opinion, 34% viewed her favorably, 21% unfavorably. Still, 41% of those surveyed said they had not heard enough about her to have an opinion. In December, that figure was 50%; in September, 63%.

By some measures, people seem more optimistic about the economy: 68% said they thought it was doing well, up from 54% in September. Some attributed their upbeat outlook to the drop in gasoline prices.

"As prices go down on gas and energy, other prices will be coming down," said Debra Glover, a substitute teacher in Oak Park, Mich., who is an independent. "It's happening real fast. I'm liking that."

But the poll also found increased anxiety about the impact of free trade: 41% said doing away with restrictions on international commerce hurts the economy.

Pelosi Gains With Public As Democrats Get High Marks For Agenda (BLOOM)

By Heidi Przybyla

Bloomberg, January 19, 2007

Jan. 19 (Bloomberg) -- Americans are warming to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, and they give the Democratic-led Congress high marks for its initial legislative priorities.

A new Bloomberg/Los Angeles Times poll shows positive views of Pelosi, 66, climbed over the past month and are considerably higher than the marks Americans gave one of her highly publicized predecessors, Republican Newt Gingrich, in the first weeks of his tenure as speaker in 1995.

The poll conducted Jan. 13 to 16 showed even more support for the party's early priorities, including repealing subsidies for oil companies, cutting prescription-drug costs for seniors and raising the minimum wage, which were backed by large majorities of respondents.

``There's some honeymoon halo going on here," said David Mayhew, a professor at Yale University in New Haven, Connecticut who has written several books on Congress. ``They made up a platform that they know is anchored well in public opinion."

Still, the survey revealed warning signs that tougher times may lie ahead for the Democrats who won control of the House and Senate in the November elections. Even as almost two-thirds of respondents said they want the country to go in a different direction than President George W. Bush has charted, 58 percent said the Democrats hadn't formulated a clear course for the future.

In addition, only a plurality of respondents, 42 percent, had a favorable impression of Democrats in Congress, largely unchanged from previous recent polls.

Iraq Dominates

Iraq was the dominant issue for poll respondents, 45 percent of whom said the war should be the top priority for the new Congress. Health care, including coverage for the uninsured, came in a distant second, with 20 percent of respondents saying it was their chief concern.

The poll of 1,344 adults has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Positive perceptions of Pelosi, the first woman speaker of the House, have been increasing over the past month as her new prominence garnered her greater public exposure.

Thirty-four percent of respondents gave the 11-term California representative a favorable rating, up from 27 percent who did so in a poll conducted in December. Forty-one percent of those surveyed -- a plurality -- said they still hadn't heard enough about her to form an impression, down from 50 percent who had no opinion in December. Twenty-one percent rated her unfavorably, a number that is unchanged from the December poll.

Gingrich Precedent

By contrast, a Los Angeles Times poll in January 1995 found that Gingrich, who engineered the Republican congressional landslide in 1994, had more unfavorable ratings, at 39 percent, than favorable, at 26 percent. In September 1996, almost two years after he became speaker, Gingrich's negative rating reached 54 percent.

With the spotlight on Pelosi, 61 percent of respondents said they didn't know enough about her counterpart in the Senate, Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, to form an opinion. That's down slightly from 65 percent in December.

Pelosi and her party also enjoy broad support for the seven legislative items they vowed to pass in the first 100 hours of the new Congress, which began Jan. 3. All the measures have already been approved in the House.

Minimum Wage

At least four-fifths of respondents said they back the measures cutting student loan interest rates in half, increasing the federal minimum wage by $7.25 from $5.15 over about two years, lowering prescription-drug prices and screening all cargo on U.S.-bound ships and planes.

Significant majorities also approve of the legislation repealing some tax breaks and subsidies to oil companies, enacting a new ethics package for Congress and increasing federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research.

Forty-seven percent of self-described Republicans said they back the stem-cell proposal, which Bush vetoed last year and continues to oppose.

The narrowest margin of support for any of the Democratic goals -- 51 percent to 26 percent -- goes to a plan to enact a so-called pay-as-you-go rule that requires Congress to offset new spending bills or tax breaks with spending cuts or tax increases.

Overall, disapproval of the job lawmakers are doing has declined, with negative ratings of Congress dropping from 57 percent in a September poll conducted when Republicans were in control, to 44 percent in the latest survey.

Divisions Among Democrats

Some of the initial support for Democrats and their priorities could fade as Congress takes up more divisive issues, including the situation in Iraq. While most Democrats agree that the Bush administration has mismanaged the war, the party remains divided over whether to call for an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces or withhold funding for the conflict.

``It's easy to say you don't want to have troops in Iraq, but what is the game plan?" said Barry Gershowitz, an independent from Rock Tavern, New York.

Gershowitz, a 64-year-old retired banker, said he has a ``slightly" more favorable impression of congressional Democrats than of Republicans. ``I'm looking for a breath of fresh air," he said. ``Hopefully I'll get it from the Democrats, but it remains to be seen."

Senators Work To Revive Ethics Bill (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, January 19, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118928

Senate leaders worked to resuscitate an ethics and lobbying measure Thursday, with the new Democratic majority trying to stave off defeat on its first major bill and Republicans wanting to avoid being blamed for obstructing an overhaul.

Aides from both parties said the two sides were trying to resolve the dispute that derailed action on the legislation Wednesday, and were putting together amendments.

Barring further conflicts, a final vote could come as early as Thursday night.

There is strong bipartisan support for the general goals of the legislation: reducing the influence of lobbyists over policymaking; ending the gift and travel perks that have tainted the public's image of Congress; and forcing lawmakers to be more open about the pet projects they slip into legislation.

Action on the bill hit a wall Wednesday. Republicans were angry they could not get a vote on a proposal giving the president, with congressional approval, more power to kill single spending items in larger bills. So GOP senators voted against a resolution needed to move the bill to final passage.

On Thursday morning, both sides accused the other of killing the bill and betraying the trust of voters who had demanded that Congress clean up its act.

"What this maneuver shows is that the Republican leadership hasn't learned the lessons of the 2006 election," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

"The Democrat leadership does not have to kill this legislation," countered Republican leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky. "I believe that we owe it to the voters as well as the institution to come to a fair agreement and pass this legislation."

The dispute was over an attempt by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., to get a vote on a modified version of a line-item veto. It would allow the president to single out spending items for elimination. Under Gregg's proposal, Congress would have to agree to the items expunged.

Democrats insisted that the proposal was not relevant to the ethics bill and too contentious to be dealt with in a short time. Gregg said it fit in the ethics bill because most of the items removed would be the special projects that have been linked to wasteful and inappropriate spending.

The two sides were working on an agreement under which Gregg would be guaranteed consideration of his bill at a later date.

Any deal would have to take in the objections of the Senate's senior member, Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., who is vehemently opposed to any legislation that might cede the legislative branch's power over the purse to the president.

The ethics and lobbying legislation would bar lawmakers from accepting gifts and travel paid for by lobbyists; make it more difficult for former lawmakers to lobby their old colleagues; deny pensions to lawmakers convicted of serious crimes; require more reporting by lobbyists on their activities; and require public disclosure of those home-state projects.

Democrats are determined to show voters they are changing the way Washington works so they made the measure their first order of business after assuming power in the Senate.

The House, on its first day of Democratic control, changed some of the rules concerning gifts, meals and travel from lobbyists. The House is scheduled to take up legislation next month that, like the Senate bill, would change lobbying law and require a House-Senate compromise.

Senate Cracks Impasse On Ethics (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Senate late Thursday passed a bill with ethics rules aimed at changing the way lobbyists and lawmakers do business with each other.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., called it the "most significant legislation in ethics and lobbying reform we've had in the history of this country."

Beyond 100 hours: What the future may hold for key House measures

Earlier, Reid and the Senate's top Republican, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, worked behind the scenes to broker a compromise that would allow lawmakers to move forward on the bill. It is the first measure being pushed by the Democrats who won control of the Senate in November's elections.

The changes, which have bipartisan support, bar senators from taking meals, gifts and sports tickets from lobbyists. They also restrict lobbyist-funded travel and impose new limits on senators' travel on private planes.

Action on the ethics plan stalled Wednesday after New Hampshire Sen. Judd Gregg and other Republicans blocked a vote on the bill. They were demanding the measure include what amounts to line-item veto power for the president.

Thursday's work to break the deadlock came amid finger-pointing by both parties.

DOJ_NMG_0118929

A "good ethics train was moving down the tracks until Republicans put the line-item veto in its path," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. The GOP action amounted to a "grand act of ethics hypocrisy," said Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash.

For their part, Gregg and other Republicans argued that a line-item veto — which would allow the president to block specific items in a spending bill, rather than have to approve or reject the whole thing — was a logical part of the ethics package. The measure would require more public disclosure of "earmarks," money for special projects that members of Congress insert into spending bills, often anonymously. Most of the things the president would veto with line-item power would be wasteful projects, said Gregg, the top Republican on the Budget Committee.

Under the deal, Gregg will get a vote on his proposal during debate on a measure to increase the federal minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, from $5.15 currently. The minimum wage bill is the next order of business in the Senate, and could be considered starting Monday.

Gregg said his proposal would give the president power to send specific spending projects back to Congress for reconsideration, giving lawmakers a chance to "take a second look at waste."

Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., chairman of the Appropriations Committee, objected to Gregg's plan on Wednesday. He is well known as a vigorous defender of Congress' power to determine spending.

On Thursday, Byrd said it was "dangerous" for lawmakers to give up any power over spending. "Weaken the power of the purse and one weakens oversight, for example, over the bloody nightmare of the war in Iraq."

Other provisions in the ethics bill would:

·Extend from one to two years the time a former member must wait before he can lobby Congress.

·Deny pensions to lawmakers convicted of serious crimes.

·Require more reporting by lobbyists of their interactions with Congress.

·Require public disclosure of home-state projects added by senators to bills.

The impasse highlighted the difficulty Senate Democrats face in trying to push their agenda in a chamber where they control 51 out of 100 votes. By comparison Thursday, Democrats in the House celebrated swift passage of their first six bills, including measures to raise the minimum wage and expand federal funding for embryonic stem cell research.

Earlier this month, the House approved changes to its own ethics rules that included similar prohibitions on gifts, meals and travel funded by lobbyists.

Reid said legislation takes longer in the Senate but insisted that top Democrats would work aggressively on a range of legislative proposals, including the increase in the minimum wage.

Senate Passes Vast Overhaul In Ethics Rules (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — The Senate on Thursday overwhelmingly passed sweeping changes to ethics and lobbying rules, overcoming bipartisan reluctance to ban many of the favors that lobbyists do for lawmakers and to illuminate the shadowy legislative practice of earmarking money for special projects.

The Senate's action makes the start of the 110th Congress a watershed moment in the history of K Street and Capitol Hill. Interpreting the results of the Nov. 7 election as a reaction to corruption scandals when Congress was under Republican control, the Senate has joined the House in adopting broad new rules that go beyond the proposals Republicans introduced last year, the ones that Democrats campaigned on, or the extensive changes House Democrats recently passed.

The measure passed around 9 p.m. by a vote of 96 to 2. Senators Orrin Hatch of Utah and Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, both Republicans, were the only members to vote against the bill.

On Wednesday, Senate Republicans nearly derailed the bill in a dispute over when the Democrats would agree to vote on a Republican proposal, a version of the line-item veto. Democrats seized on the moment to accuse the Republicans of deliberately scuttling the reforms. At a news conference, a half-dozen Democratic senators competed to belittle the Republicans' line-item veto as "an excuse," "a ploy," "a subterfuge," a "rabbit out of a hat" and "a grand act of ethics hypocrisy."

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the leader of the new Democratic majority, threatened to postpone any action on ethics until the next election and publicly blame the Republicans if they did not allow a vote Thursday.

But by Thursday evening, Mr. Reid and Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, had resolved the impasse. They agreed to hold a vote on the line-item veto as part of a minimum-wage debate next week.

"This legislation has been extremely difficult to deal with," Mr. Reid said Thursday night. "It is difficult because it deals with our lives."

DOJ_NMG_0118930

"In the short-term, the reforms in this bill may take some getting used to," he added, "but in the long term, we'll be thankful we took these steps."

Like the new House rules, the Senate bill bars members from accepting gifts, meals or trips from lobbyists or the organizations that employ them. It ends the use by senators of borrowed corporate jets at discount rates. It prohibits departing senators from negotiating with prospective new employers until after their successors have been elected and restricts them from directly or indirectly lobbying the Senate for two years after leaving office.

Also like the House rules, the Senate measure requires disclosure of the sponsors, the purpose and the cost of earmarks, the pet projects that lawmakers have been able to tuck anonymously into complicated spending bills.

Unlike the House, the bill would also explicitly prohibit earmarks that would benefit the immediate family of the senator who sponsored it. All those changes revise internal Senate rules and do not require House or presidential approval.

Senate Democrats also incorporated into the bill a provision that, if signed into law, would require for the first time that lobbyists disclose the most valuable favors they do for lawmakers: holding campaign fund-raisers, soliciting campaign contributions and bundling checks from clients and friends.

Of all the bill's provisions, it was the disclosure requirements for bundled checks that met the stiffest resistance behind the scenes in the Democratic caucus because of the potential to make it harder for incumbent lawmakers to tap K Street lobbyists as surrogate fund-raisers, aides involved in negotiations over the bill said, speaking anonymously because the talks were confidential.

Addressing another loophole in campaign finance laws, the Senate bill would also bar lobbyists or their employers from giving parties to honor lawmakers at party conventions. House Democrats say they plan to take up the subject of lobbying rules on their side of the Capitol in the next several weeks.

The Senate debate showcased the deep ambivalence of many lawmakers about changes that could curb their personal privileges and potentially limit their fund-raising advantages.

The party leaders began by teaming up to introduce a much weaker bipartisan bill, and lawmakers in both parties acknowledged behind-the-scenes resistance to strengthening it. But many found amendments to strengthen the bill politically difficult to oppose.

The bill became a pivotal test for Mr. Reid in his new role trying to manage the Senate. He is a frequent target of Republican accusations of fraternizing with influence-peddlers. Several members of his immediate family have worked as lobbyists, although he says that none have lobbied his office, and he is among the biggest recipients of the discounted use of corporate jets for travel.

Mr. Reid promised vigorous reform as his first act as majority leader. He offered an amendment to bar lawmakers from accepting the discounted use of corporate jets, promising to discontinue the practice himself.

But when a Republican senator offered an amendment to match the House's earmark disclosure rules, Mr. Reid miscounted the votes he had on his side when he tried and failed to table the measure. Mr. Reid first argued against moving too fast to match the House Democrats' new rules and then embraced the same idea with token modifications.

Senate Passes Ethics Package (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Senate Democrats and Republicans broke a difficult stalemate last night and approved 96 to 2 expansive legislation to curtail the influence of lobbyists, tighten congressional ethics rules and prevent the spouses of senators from lobbying senators and their staffs.

The Senate legislation, hailed by proponents as the most significant ethics reform since Watergate, would ban gifts, meals and travel funded by lobbyists, and would force lawmakers to attach their names to special-interest provisions and pet projects that they slip into bills. Lawmakers would have to pay charter rates on corporate jets, not the far-cheaper first-class rates they pay now.

The House earlier this month approved similar language as part of an internal rules change. But other portions of the Senate-passed measure would carry the weight of law and would have impacts far beyond the Capitol. The House would have to pass comparable legislation for those provisions to take effect.

One of those legislative provisions would force lobbyists to publicly disclose the small campaign donations they collect from clients and "bundle" into large donations to politicians. Bundling is a way for lobbyists to contribute far more money to candidates and thus wield more influence than they could by making individual contributions, which are currently limited to $2,100 per candidate for each election cycle. Lavish gatherings thrown by lobbyists and corporate interests at party conventions would be banned.

Former lawmakers would no longer be able to engage in any lobbying activity for two years after they leave office. And, in most cases, the lobbyist spouses of senators would no longer be able to take advantage of their family status to influence the colleagues and staffs of their husbands and wives. The only exception is for spouses who had been lobbying for at least one year before their husband or wife was elected.

"This is the toughest reform bill in the history of this body as relates to ethics and lobbying, so everyone here tonight, when they vote on this, should vote proudly," said Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "This is historic."

James Thurber, a professor of political science at American University, did not go that far, but he said the impact of the Senate bill would be substantial: "It will change lawmakers' behavior and lobbyists' behavior as well, and it will bring more transparency to lobbying."

The measure appeared dead Wednesday night after Republicans refused to allow passage without a vote on an unrelated amendment that would hand the president virtual line-item veto authority. For nearly two days, Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) -- who jealously guards the Senate's prerogatives on spending matters -- single-handedly blocked efforts to come to an accord on that line-item veto vote.

Democrats and government watchdog groups angrily pointed their fingers at the Republicans, charging that their demand for a vote on such an extraneous provision was simply an indirect way to kill popular legislation they dared not vote against.

But Reid found a path around Byrd, offering Republicans a chance next week to add the spending control measure to a bill to raise the minimum wage if they can find the votes. That broke the logjam, and the Senate then began debating several amendments to the bill, with an eye toward completing work late last night.

The bipartisan vote masked furious backroom lobbying on a measure too popular to kill in public. One provision that was stricken from the bill last night would have forced interest groups to disclose funds spent on grass-roots campaigns that implore the public to contact their representatives about legislation.

That provision -- to force the disclosure of pseudo-grass-roots campaigns -- had raised the ire of an odd coalition that included the American Civil Liberties Union, the Traditional Values Coalition, the American Conservative Union and the National Right to Life Committee, which worked hard to strip it out or even block the whole bill.

The Family Research Council met with lawmakers and their staffs, conducted interviews on radio talk shows, extensively e-mailed its members and notified other organizations, asking them to contact their senators to express opposition, according to Tony Perkins, the group's president. In the end, the Senate struck the measure, 55 to 43.

"This is an issue about free speech, not an issue that is either Republican or Democratic," said Marvin Johnson, legislative counsel of the American Civil Liberties Union, during the coalition's telephone news conference yesterday.

In another defeat for watchdog groups, the Senate overwhelmingly defeated a proposal to create an independent ethics counsel to investigate allegations of wrongdoing in the Senate. The 71 to 27 vote was the second time that Congress has rejected the proposal in recent years.

Opposition from so many conservative activists had raised accusations from Democrats that Republicans were doing their bidding by blocking passage, but other opponents were less partisan. Lobbyists for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, or AIPAC, also talked to lawmakers about excluding from the measure's travel ban trips to Israel sponsored by the group's nonprofit foundation affiliate. The legislation, as written, would allow those trips to continue.

In addition, lobbyists' organizations worked against many parts of the Senate bill, arguing that lobbyists would still be able to spend lavishly on lawmakers under its provisions. They would just have to do so in the context of political fundraisers because fundraising activities are not addressed in the bill.

"The bill has gone from bad to worse," said Paul A. Miller, immediate past president of the American League of Lobbyists. "What's being proposed now puts us in danger of making the system even more corrupt than it is now, largely because the bill would move a lot of lobbying contacts into the realm of campaign finance, and that's more corrupting than under the current system."

But government watchdog groups said they saw much to praise in the bill, and they worked hard for its passage. After Republicans temporarily derailed it late Wednesday, the watchdogs responded furiously. Democracy 21 posted what it called a "Hall of Shame," listing the 45 Republicans that voted to filibuster the bill. The League of Women Voters condemned what it called "late night shenanigans."

"Let there be no mistake here: This was Senate Republicans thumbing their noses at the American people," declared Common Cause President Chellie Pingree.

But, ultimately, it was Byrd that tried to block all of Reid's efforts to accommodate Republican demands on a measure long sought by President Bush that would allow the president to submit to Congress a list of spending items that the White House wants to strike from congressionally passed spending bills. Under the measure, Congress would then vote on whether to sustain or accept those rescissions. Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), its sponsor, called it a modest proposal to help ferret out egregious waste that leaves Congress the final say.

But Byrd decried it as "an assault on the single most important protection the American people have against a president, any president, who wants to run roughshod over [their] liberties." GOP demands for a vote were "little more than political blackmail," he said.

Under the agreement reached last night, Byrd and Gregg will rejoin that battle next week, when the spending-control provision finally comes to a vote.

Senate Passes Ethics Reform By 96-2 Margin (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

The Senate last night overwhelmingly passed an ethics bill after breaking a day-long stalemate over a Republican proposal on earmarks that had threatened to kill the legislation.

The vote was 96-2, with the two "no" votes coming from Republican Sens. Tom Coburn of Oklahoma and Orrin G. Hatch of Utah.

"It's the most significant legislation on ethics and lobbying reform ever passed in the history of the country, and it was hard to get there," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said as he left the Senate chamber after last night's vote. "It was a long day."

The impasse had centered on an amendment by Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican, that would authorize the president to remove earmarks -- provisions in a bill to fund specific projects, often used by members of Congress to pay for pet projects in their home districts or states -- and send the legislation back to Congress for a second look and another vote.

Republicans wanted to vote on their amendment as part of the ethics bill, but Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, had been single-handedly blocking a deal.

"This reform bill is threatened by an effort by our colleagues on the other side of the aisle to give the president line-item veto authority," Mr. Byrd said on the Senate floor yesterday. When Republicans didn't get the amendment vote they wanted, they retaliated Wednesday by voting against a parliamentary procedure needed to pass the overall ethics bill, effectively blocking what had been Mr. Reid's first order of business.

But Mr. Reid, Nevada Democrat, secured the ethics-bill vote last night by conceding to Republican demands for a vote on the Gregg amendment.

"It was a difficult bump," Mr. Reid said. Still, he said he was "proud of this debate. It started bipartisan, and it looks like it will end bipartisan."

The ethics bill that passed last night would bar gifts and free travel from lobbyists, require lawmakers to pay more for travel on corporate jets and increase the publicizing of earmarks. It also restricts lobbying by the spouses of sitting members, increases the time before a former lawmaker can become a lobbyist, requires more disclosure by lobbyists, and denies pensions to lawmakers convicted in the future of serious crimes.

The Republican measure will be voted on Monday as an amendment to the bill to raise the minimum wage. This power to revise spending bills would differ from a line-item veto in that either chamber of Congress could reject it with a simple majority vote. Congress had passed a straight line-item veto in 1996, but the Supreme Court declared it unconstitutional in 1998.

Mr. Reid said the episode did not produce winners or losers in the Senate.

"The winners are the American people," he said in announcing the deal, which came an hour before the vote. "They have reason to have faith in their government again."

But Mr. Coburn said he voted against the bill because it failed to bring transparency to Congress and said many of the better provisions will be shed before it becomes law. He said as an example of the bill's shortcomings the large number of restrictions on lobbyists.

"Lobbyists aren't the problem," the Oklahoma Republican said. "Members of Congress are the problem. ... We need transparency."

Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, said he appreciated that Democrats "put politics aside to reach an agreement" on Mr. Gregg's proposal.

"Fiscal responsibility is more than a campaign slogan," Mr. McConnell said when the agreement was announced shortly after 8 p.m. "I trust that my colleagues will stand with the voters and support this commonsense reform."

Mr. Gregg also applauded the deal as "a real victory for the American taxpayer" and called his amendment "an excellent tool against unnecessary spending and I am confident that my colleagues on both sides of the aisle will agree."

The two senators who were not present for last night's voting were hospitalized Sen. Tim Johnson, South Dakota Democrat, and 2008 presidential hopeful Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0118933

The Senate last night also voted 55-43 to adopt a Republican amendment that deleted a provision of the ethics bill that would have expanded the definition of lobbyist to include grass-roots organizers, possibly including ministers and neighborhood groups.

Under the legislation, grass-roots organizations that attempt to "influence the general public" to contact members of Congress would have to register as lobbyists and file financial reports -- or face a $200,000 fine.

Democrats had fought unsuccessfully to keep the provision in the bill.

The Senate also defeated, on a 71-27 vote, an amendment that would have created an independent Office of Public Integrity to take over some of the ethics committee's investigative powers. Supporters said that the scandals involving Republican Rep. Mark Foley and lobbyist Jack Abramoff have killed public trust that lawmakers can police themselves.

Supporters say the proposal to limit earmarking strikes at the core of congressional ethics.

Mr. Byrd has added $2.95 billion in pork-barrel projects for West Virginia to appropriation bills since 1991, according to Citizens Against Government Waste (CAGW). Last year, he sent home $239 million in earmark spending, which CAGW calculates to be $131.58 for every West Virginia resident, more than four times the national average of $30.55.

More than 30 public-works projects in West Virginia bear the senator's name, including Robert C. Byrd Highway, Robert C. Byrd Industrial Park, Robert C. Byrd Federal Correctional Institution, Robert C. Byrd Federal Courthouse and two Robert C. Byrd Federal Buildings.

A New Day In Washington, Same As The Old Days (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Just two weeks ago Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell stood side by side, pledging a "new day in Washington" full of bipartisan cooperation. Senators, McConnell said, wanted "to tackle the big issues."

Yesterday, Reid and McConnell started tackling -- each other.

While senators engaged in a bench-clearing brawl over ethics legislation, Reid and fellow Democrats abandoned the Senate floor and went to the television studio to condemn the Republicans. "What they wanted -- and they were afraid to spew it out of their mouths -- they hate this legislation!" Reid sputtered.

McConnell rushed into the studio minutes after Reid left. "Truly astonishing" is how he described the Democrats' argument. "Absurd on its face."

After a day of bitter exchanges, the two sides finally reached a deal behind closed doors and then went to the Senate floor last night in a public act of reconciliation. Reid praised the Republicans he had just berated. McConnell hailed a "successful example of good negotiating, though it took a while, for a favorable result."

It did seem to be a needlessly difficult journey for legislation that in the end was opposed by only two senators. Just last spring, a nearly identical bill sailed through the Senate with little fuss. On Jan. 4, Reid and McConnell agreed to be sponsors of the ethics bill, the first major piece of legislation before the Senate this session. Reid (Nev.) said that gesture "speaks volumes" about the new bipartisan spirit.

Few believed that boast, but neither did anybody expect what happened Wednesday night on the Senate floor. Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) tripped up the legislation by attempting to add an unrelated poison pill, and McConnell (R-Ky.) led a filibuster. The two sides reached a compromise, only for Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) to scuttle it with a procedural objection that wasn't resolved after nightfall Thursday.

Lawmakers were pointing fingers every which way. Was it Gregg, in the back room, with the non-germane amendment? Or was it McConnell, in the minority leader's office, with the filibuster? Maybe the real culprit was Byrd, on the Senate floor, with the unanimous-consent objection.

"Clearly, any excuse will do for them to bring down an ethics reform bill!" Dick Durbin (Ill.), the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate, charged at a noon news conference.

Sen. Patty Murray (Wash.), facing the cameras with her fellow Democrats, agreed that "what we saw was the Senate Republicans, in a grand act of ethics hypocrisy, shatter the new culture of cooperation in an attempt to kill real reform."

"You can't say that the Republican Party and the Republican membership of the Senate is in any way not trying to move this bill forward," responded Gregg. "The stoppage here," he continued, "is occurring because there is an individual senator on their side who is threatening to filibuster this amendment. . . . I believe they do protest too much."

Democrats seemed to be enjoying themselves a bit too much as they held their news conference condemning the Republicans for temporarily derailing the ethics bill with a "line-item veto" amendment. Though they entered the room with grim faces, Sen. Chuck Schumer (N.Y.) could not suppress a grin. By the time the sixth Democratic speaker, Dianne Feinstein (Calif.)

got her turn at microphone, Schumer, Russ Feingold (Wis.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) could be seen behind her, enjoying a chuckle.

"They just pulled the line-item veto rabbit out of a hat as an attempt to stop ethics reform," said Schumer, chairman of the Mixed Metaphor Committee. "The good-ethics train was moving swiftly right down the tracks until the Republicans stopped it, putting the line-item veto log in its path."

Gregg, in his dueling news conference, was defensive on this point. "This is not a line-item veto," he maintained. "This is enhanced rescission." The Republican admitted his proposal "doesn't survive the germaneness test," but he pleaded, "It is relevant."

Finally, in the evening, Gregg and Byrd were placated, and the Senate returned to business. But would subsequent bills be any easier? Reid wasn't optimistic. "I mean, they're not wild about anything I've talked about," he told reporters.

As senators struggled over their ethics disagreement, Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), the minority whip, went to the Senate floor late yesterday. "We've been out here marking time all afternoon," he complained. "Helloooo," he called out to the empty chamber. "It's a quarter to 6."

"This is the kind of thing that I think leads to problems and tarnishes our image, and I wish we could find a way to do things in a more normal way," Lott's lament continued. "But maybe the Senate can't do that."

GSA Chief Scrutinized For Deal With Friend (WP)

By Scott Higham And Robert O'harrow Jr.

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

The chief of the U.S. General Services Administration attempted to give a no-bid contract to a company founded and operated by a longtime friend, sidestepping federal laws and regulations, according to interviews and documents obtained by The Washington Post.

Administrator Lurita Alexis Doan, a former government contractor appointed by President Bush, personally signed the deal to pay a division of her friend's public relations firm $20,000 for a 24-page report promoting the GSA's use of minority- and woman-owned businesses, the documents show.

The contract was terminated last summer after GSA lawyers and other agency officials pointed out possible procurement violations, including the failure to adequately justify the no-bid deal or have it reviewed in advance by trained procurement officers, officials said.

The GSA's Office of Inspector General has launched an investigation into the episode and briefed Justice Department lawyers, according to sources who said they were not authorized to speak publicly about the ongoing investigation. Officials at the inspector general's office and the Justice Department declined to comment.

In an interview Wednesday, Doan said she believed she was following proper procedures to hire the best firm available to quickly produce a report on diversity practices.

"I made a mistake," Doan said. "I thought I was moving this along. I was immediately informed that I wasn't necessarily moving it along in the way that was best for it. So at which point they canceled it, life went on, no money exchanged hands, no contract exchanged hands.

"I'm stunned, absolutely stunned by the amount of legs that this has taken, you know, how this has like kind of jumped up and run away with things."

The friend, public relations executive Edie Fraser, declined to comment.

"I can't," Fraser said. "I just admire her immensely."

Since assuming the helm of the GSA in May, Doan has repeatedly clashed with others within the agency over her intervention in matters that previous administrators delegated to subordinates, in part to avoid the appearance of political influence. The GSA is the largest broker of goods and services for the federal government, managing nearly $56 billion worth of contracts a year.

Last month, a dispute between Doan and her own inspector general's office became public when The Post reported that she had proposed curtailing the office's contract audits and had compared its enforcement efforts to "terrorism." Doan said she was interested in cutting wasteful spending by the agency and denied making the comparison.

Doan, 49, is a rising political star in the Republican Party who hit turbulence soon after she took over the GSA. She grew up in the downtrodden Ninth Ward section of New Orleans and was one of the first African American children to attend the city's private schools. She later went to Vassar College and obtained an advanced degree in Renaissance literature from the University of Tennessee at Knoxville.

Doan often speaks to groups about overcoming the struggles in her past and reminisces about how her great-grandmother fed the family by selling pralines on the docks in New Orleans. The family home was destroyed during Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0118935

She was appointed to run the GSA after a 15-year career as owner of New Technology Management Inc. The Reston-based firm, which provides surveillance equipment for border security and other projects, was named in 2004 as one of the nation's fastest-growing small technology businesses.

During her business career, Doan developed close ties to the GOP. Between 1999 and 2006, she and her husband, Douglas, a former military intelligence officer and business liaison official at the Department of Homeland Security, donated nearly $226,000 to Republican campaigns and causes, documents show.

In 2004, Bush introduced Doan at a Commerce Department event for women who own small businesses. Later that year, Doan was invited to speak at the Republican National Convention in New York. In 2005, Doan sold her firm for an undisclosed sum to a group of investors and retired. At the time, New Technology Management had revenue of nearly $20 million and government contracts worth more than $200 million.

Last spring, the Bush administration asked Doan to take over the GSA, which had been shaken by scandal after lobbyist Jack Abramoff tried to obtain properties under GSA control. Abramoff took then-GSA chief of staff David H. Safavian and others on an all-expense-paid golf trip to Scotland, and Safavian provided Abramoff with inside information about the properties. Both men have been convicted.

On April 6, Bush nominated Doan to be the first female administrator in GSA history. She pledged to make the agency operate more like a private business and to "restore GSA's leadership as the premier contracting and service provider."

On July 25, two months after taking office, Doan signed the no-bid contract with Public Affairs Group Inc. and two of its divisions, the Business Women's Network and Diversity Best Practices. The companies were founded and are operated by Fraser, the president and chief executive of Public Affairs Group and the president of Diversity Best Practices. The contract was signed on the letterhead of the two divisions, and Doan said Diversity Best Practices was to have done the work.

An online newsletter posted by Diversity Best Practices and the Business Women's Network in 2003 called Doan a "partner" and described her as "one of the nation's best and brightest women entrepreneurs."

Deneen Vaughn, a former vice president of Public Affairs Group, told The Post in an interview last week that Doan's company often sponsored programs arranged by the Business Women's Network and spoke at the group's events.

"She's been a longtime friend and business partner of Edie Fraser," said Vaughn, who left the organization in May. "She supported the growth and development of the company, and she mentors other members of our organization."

The companies run by Fraser routinely sponsor diversity-oriented events that attract such luminaries as Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) and Fortune 500 executives.

Early in her career, Fraser worked as an Africa desk officer for the Peace Corps. She later started Edie Fraser Associates, a public relations firm that won a measure of notoriety in 1980 when it secured a $9,800 no-bid contract to study the Commerce Department's public relations office.

Then-Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) gave the deal one of his famous "Golden Fleece" awards for the misuse of tax dollars, saying Commerce already had 112 public relations employees.

In the mid-1980s, Fraser turned her attention to helping female and minority entrepreneurs, producing a series of reports about their changing status in the U.S. economy.

Fraser and Doan have appeared on the same panels and lavished praise and awards on each other at conferences. They also served together on the national advisory board of Enterprising Women, a magazine for female business owners. "Lurita Doan is precisely what this nation needs," the magazine quoted Fraser as saying, admiring Doan's business acumen, in 2003.

Last summer, two weeks before Doan signed the contract with the companies run by Fraser, she attended a star-studded gala sponsored by those companies called "Celebrating Diversity -- the Changing Demographics of America."

"It is so important, as women, to extend that helping hand to one another, that we help mentor each other and give us that extra break that we need to move our way to the top," Doan said, according to a copy of her remarks on an event Web page.

The contract Doan signed with the companies directed them to produce a report promoting GSA's "major achievements" in contracting with minority- and women-owned businesses. The contract called for producing a report that would be "approximately 24 pages." It would contain profiles of diversity success stories at the GSA and include "recommendations for how to use the report."

Doan said she did not use the GSA's public affairs division, which has about a dozen employees who develop information about the agency's programs, because she wanted to employ an expert in the diversity field.

"Diversity Best Practices is the industry leader in this area," she said. "They have won countless awards on diversity representation and issues."

The contract should have been competitively bid, according to procurement experts and officials familiar with the arrangement. Under federal regulations, contracts worth more than $2,500 at the time were to have been open to competition, unless there were extenuating circumstances. Those include disasters and instances in which the bidding process could cause

"unacceptable delays in fulfilling the agency's requirements," according to the Federal Acquisition Regulation, which governs all federal contracting.

The general counsel of the GSA at the time, Alan R. Swendiman, advised Doan to terminate the contract. It was then terminated by a GSA contracting officer. Swendiman left the agency a short time later and is now a special assistant to the president and director of the White House Office of Administration. He declined to comment.

Contracting experts said Doan should have steered clear of the contract.

"Only contracting officers can sign federal contracts and obligate federal funds," said D. Kent Goodger, a federal contracting official for 38 years who now teaches federal procurement courses for the Agriculture Department and other agencies. "Anyone who assumes that they have that authority, like the administrator of GSA, is wrong."

Steven L. Schooner, a procurement specialist at George Washington University's law school, called Doan's involvement in the contract "highly irregular."

"One of the things you're trying to avoid is political favoritism," he said. "You don't want the process polluted or corrupted by political influence."

Doan has taken other steps that have raised questions inside the agency, according to internal memos and e-mails obtained by The Post and interviews with GSA officials.

Last September, Doan intervened in an effort to determine whether five major contractors should be suspended from doing business with the federal government after they had been accused of making fraudulent claims. The firms -- KPMG, Ernst & Young, PricewaterhouseCoopers, Booz Allen Hamilton and BearingPoint Inc. -- had paid the Justice Department more than $66 million to settle allegations that they kept travel rebates from airlines and hotels that should have gone to the GSA, according to agency officials.

The GSA's debarment office initiated "suspension actions" against the companies and issued "show-cause" letters, asking the firms to explain why they should not be suspended or debarred, according to a Sept. 7 e-mail obtained by The Post. Companies found to be engaged in fraud can be suspended or banned from doing business with the federal government.

"I would expect that the companies will respond to me by saying that they have acknowledged their sins, paid restitution and have put in place measures to prevent a recurrence of this activity," GSA debarment official George N. Barclay wrote in the e-mail. "Suspension determinations could be avoided upon such a showing."

Three days later, Doan wrote to several senior GSA officials: "I do not recall this issue EVER coming up in a single management meeting or any meeting for that matter." She asked that the show-cause process be "stopped until cooler heads can prevail."

But the show-cause letters had already been sent, and the companies later avoided suspension or debarment by agreeing to return travel rebates in the future.

Goodger, the former government contracting official, said Doan's involvement was unusual and "creates an appearance of impropriety."

Doan acknowledged that her intervention was unusual but said she did not do anything improper.

"As the head of this agency, I have an obligation to weigh in and say, 'What is this matter, do you know what this matter is?' " she said.

"I don't want to be a rubber-stamp kind of figurehead administrator of this agency. I do not want to participate in the old go-along-to-get-along kind of Washington two-step-type activity. This is not what I'm here for. So, yes, I am going to be involved."

Doan also generated consternation within her agency and on Capitol Hill with her proposals to curb the agency's contract audits and to cut the inspector general's budget by $5 million. The audits, which aim to ensure that the government is getting the best prices for goods and services, have saved taxpayers more than $1 billion over the past two years, the inspector general's office reported.

Doan's efforts prompted senators and congressmen from both parties to write to her, requesting that she halt her plans.

"You have not made a coherent case that explains how your proposal would benefit the taxpayer compared to the system now in place," said one letter signed by three members of Congress, including Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), the new chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, which oversees the GSA.

Doan has said publicly that the proposed cuts were part of an effort to reduce wasteful spending across the agency. Privately, she complained that Inspector General Brian D. Miller and his staff were intimidating GSA employees and vendors. She accused Miller's staff members of leaking budget information and asked for an investigation.

Doan also demanded that Miller notify her of all ongoing criminal probes of GSA employees and provide her with a monthly report of his office's activities. Miller said disclosing the cases could jeopardize investigations, and he disregarded Doan's requests for a leak investigation and monthly reports, according to a Jan. 10 memo obtained by The Post.

Doan said she has been misunderstood and is trying to do the best job she can.

DOJ_NMG_0118937

"I bring the sensibility of someone whose favorite song is the national anthem. I love this country," Doan said. "I was one of the chosen ones who has had a chance to really live all aspects of the American dream. I feel so blessed to have this opportunity to give back."

Kerry Calls For Probe Of Pentagon Sales (AP)

By Sharon Theimer

AP, January 19, 2007

Sen. John Kerry on Thursday called for an investigation into security weaknesses in the Defense Department's surplus sales that have let buyers for Iran and China acquire aircraft parts and other valuable military gear.

The Massachusetts Democrat sought an inquiry by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee after The Associated Press reported that in several instances middlemen for the countries had exploited security flaws to acquire sensitive surplus.

The surplus sales include parts for F-14 "Tomcat" fighter jets, a plane retired last year by the United States and now flown only by Iran. Iran bought the jets in the 1970s before the U.S. government banned most exports, including defense-related sales, to the Mideast country.

"There is no way that Iran should be getting these sensitive military parts, especially with the situation in the Mideast so turbulent," Kerry said.

Federal investigators say that in at least one instance, gear purchased from Pentagon surplus got to Iran. A Pakistani arms broker bought Chinook helicopter engine parts for Iran from a U.S. company that had bought them in a Pentagon surplus sale, and those parts made it to Iran, according to Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents. They spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Sensitive surplus is supposed to be rendered useless for military purposes or, if sold, then only to buyers who promise to obey U.S. arms embargoes and other laws.

Defense Department official Fred Baillie said the Pentagon did nothing wrong in selling the surplus and that it was not the agency's fault the items wound up in the wrong hands.

The Pentagon has worked to tighten surplus sale security following a scathing report by the Government Accountability Office last year that identified numerous weaknesses. Measures include trying harder to properly identify surplus before it is marked to safe to sell. If there is doubt about what an item is, it now is destroyed, whereas before it might have been sold, said Baillie, the Defense Logistics Agency's executive director of distribution.

Customs and GAO officials worry about security problems with the program, however, and are seeking assurances the Pentagon will not sell surplus parts from the recently retired F-14 fleet.

Thousands of the components already are set for market. Baillie said that more than half of the roughly 76,000 parts for F-14 are general nuts-and-bolts hardware that the Pentagon surplus program can sell to the public with no restrictions.

About 10,000 are Tomcat-specific and will be destroyed, he said. The rest, about 23,000 parts, are valuable for both military and commercial use and are being reviewed to see whether Pentagon surplus can sell them without jeopardizing national security, Baillie said.

House Votes To Rescind Oil Drillers' Tax Breaks (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — House Democrats easily passed legislation on Thursday that would rescind $14 billion in tax breaks and subsidies for oil drillers and reserve the money to develop alternative energy projects and conservation technologies.

The measure passed 264 to 163, with many Republicans joining a bloc of Democrats. Passage came despite opposition from the oil industry and the Bush administration, which said the bill singled out the companies for higher taxes and could increase the country's dependence on foreign oil.

The bill will rescind $7.6 billion in tax breaks for oil drillers that Congress passed in 2004 and 2005 and will add $6.3 billion in royalties from companies that pump oil and gas in publicly owned waters of the Gulf of Mexico and off Alaska.

One provision is intended to correct errors in drilling leases signed by the Interior Department in the late 1990s that allowed oil companies to escape billions of dollars in royalties over the next decade.

The provision, opposed by the White House and the industry, would require companies that refuse to change their leases to pay a "conservation fee" on each barrel they produce. Otherwise, under the bill, the companies would be barred from acquiring additional leases.

DOJ_NMG_0118938

"Big Oil is hitting the taxpayer not once, not twice, but three times," Representative Nick J. Rahall II, Democrat of West Virginia and chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee, said. "They are hitting them at the pump. They are hitting them at the Treasury through the tax code. And they are hitting them with royalty holidays."

Many Republicans complained that the bill would lead to higher gasoline prices by penalizing domestic production and create a "slush fund" for alternative energy projects.

"The San Francisco Democrats want to run the cars on the road with wind," said Representative Steve Pearce, Republican of New Mexico.

Representative Phil English, Republican of Pennsylvania, said the bill would increase energy costs for manufacturers and prompt them to move more jobs abroad.

The bill would also rescind a tax credit for "domestic manufacturing" that oil companies received in 2004 and a much smaller tax break for geological expenses.

The oil vote completed a first wave of measures that House Democratic leaders wanted to pass in their first 100 hours of legislative activity after taking control of Congress.

Senate Democrats are moving more cautiously, but they have signaled that they support most of the bill's provisions and plan to pass them in one form or another.

"I support the principle behind the House bill," said Senator Jeff Bingaman, Democrat of New Mexico, adding that he had asked that the House bill be placed directly on the Senate calendar.

The White House said that it "strongly objects" to much of the measure, arguing that it singled out the oil industry and that the royalty provision undermined the sanctity of binding contracts that the companies had signed.

But President Bush has opposed additional tax breaks and subsidies for oil companies and called for more spending on renewable energy and conservation. The White House stopped short of threatening a veto, and few if any lawmakers expect Mr. Bush to invoke one.

At a hearing of the Senate Energy Committee several hours before the House vote, investigators and Democratic lawmakers criticized the Interior Department's response to the bungled offshore leases.

The Government Accountability Office estimated that the mistake has cost the Treasury $1 billion, and could ultimately cost it $10 billion if the leases remain unchanged.

The leases entitled companies drilling in deep water to avoid royalties on much of their initial production, but in 1998 and 1999 officials during the Clinton administration omitted a standard escape clause that eliminated the incentive if oil prices climbed above $34 a barrel.

Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's inspector general, told the committee that midlevel administrators first spotted the mistake in 2000 but that top officials did not disclose the issue until The New York Times reported on it in February 2006.

Mr. Devaney said that senior officials discussed the issue in March 2004 with the director of the Minerals Management Service, Johnnie M. Burton, but they decided they were powerless to change the leases and dropped the matter.

The agency's silence and reluctance to take action, Mr. Devaney said, was "a shockingly cavalier management approach" and a "jaw-dropping example of bureaucratic bungling."

Ms. Burton did not testify Thursday. C. Stephen Allred, the Interior Department's assistant secretary for land and minerals management, defended Ms. Burton as a person with the "highest integrity."

The House vote on Thursday was an opening skirmish in a broader attempt by Democratic leaders to scale back government financial support for oil and gas producers while ramping up support for renewable energy and conservation.

"Today's vote represents the first step toward a future of energy independence," the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, said.

Oil executives denounced the House vote, though none were surprised that it passed by a wide margin.

"This is purely a political bill playing on the campaign rhetoric of the 2006 election," said Barry Russell, president of the Independent Petroleum Association of America. "At a time when we need more American energy, it simply doesn't make sense to harm those companies that can provide it."

House Democrats offered little clue on Thursday about how they would channel the money from oil producers into alternative and renewable energies. The bill specifies that the money will go to a reserve, which is essentially an accounting device to offset the cost of separate legislation aimed at promoting other sources of energy and efficiency.

Many Republicans complained that Democrats were creating a slush fund with the oil money that would be sealed off from public debate. Democrats responded that the money would be allocated through future legislation that would be debated in Congressional committees and on the House floor.

President Bush is expected to weigh in with proposals in his State of the Union address on Tuesday, and White House officials have said that new energy programs will have a prominent place in the speech.

House Repeals Tax Break For Big Oil (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 19, 2007

House Democrats capped their "100 hours" agenda with the passage of an energy bill yesterday, the sixth piece of legislation approved in two weeks, and Democratic leaders said the package marked "a beginning, not an end" to their legislative ambitions.

Though the six measures still face battles in the Senate and possible veto by the White House, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, boasted that "we made promises and we kept our promises."

Though Republicans complained that they were not given enough opportunities to amend the six bills, an average of 62 GOP lawmakers voted in favor of the measures. Thirty-six Republicans voted for the energy bill adopted yesterday in a 264-163 vote.

But the atmosphere of celebration among Democrats was marred by criticism over House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's decision to create a new Select Committee on Energy Independence and Global Warming.

Pelosi said the committee would be designed to "raise the visibility" of energy and climate change issues, and that it would not have legislative jurisdiction. Many lawmakers saw it as a way to diminish the influence of veteran lawmakers, such as Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), who in the past has guarded the interests of the big U.S. automakers from his state by opposing higher fuel efficiency standards.

Pelosi said she was still looking to the committees on energy, environment and technology to come up with legislation and asked them to do that by July 4.

Dingell held a two-hour meeting yesterday with Democrats on his committee to discuss Pelosi's initiative. "It is unclear what this committee will do besides serve as a distraction to the substantive work already being done by the committee of expertise on this issue," Dingell said later.

Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) has told fellow Democrats that Pelosi asked him to chair the new committee, congressional sources said. Markey has been a vociferous critic of the oil and gas industry.

Pelosi needs a majority vote of the House to create the new committee, and congressional sources said there was talk yesterday of unhappy Democrats joining with Republicans to quash her proposal. "I believe the existing committees can deal effectively with global warming," Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), chairman of the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform and author of a climate change proposal, said in a statement. "But I can also understand why the Speaker believes it's important to highlight this issue."

The new committee and the July 4 target were responses to critics who said that yesterday's energy measure did not address key energy policy issues and to the groundswell of activity among companies, lawmakers and state governments who want to do something about climate change.

The measure passed yesterday would repeal a tax break oil and gas firms received in 2004 that effectively lowered their corporate tax rates. It would also bar oil companies from bidding on new federal leases unless they pay a fee on or renegotiated improperly drafted leases from 1998 and 1999 that did not require royalty payments on Gulf of Mexico production. And the bill would take the estimated $13 billion to $15 billion in revenues over a five-year period and set the money aside for tax breaks and appropriations that would go to renewable energy sources.

On Wednesday, the Bush administration said it was opposed to raising corporate tax rates on the oil industry when other manufacturing industries had benefited from the same rate reduction. The Office of Management and Budget also said that the administration was opposed to forcing companies to renegotiate contracts through statutes and said it preferred voluntary agreements with firms over the 1998 and 1999 leases. The OMB also said that using the revenues for new energy sources embodied a "tax and spend philosophy."

Other energy experts have taken issue with the idea of "energy independence" that Pelosi built into the name of the new select committee. Even with major efforts to cut consumption and boost alternative sources, the United States would be hard-pressed to eliminate imports that account for 64 percent of the about 21 million barrels a day of oil currently consumed.

House OKs Pursuit Of Lost Oil Royalties (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

The House yesterday passed an energy policy aimed at getting back more than $10 billion in federal royalty payments and eliminating tax relief and other subsidies that oil companies have enjoyed for the past decade.

DOJ_NMG_0118940

The Clean Energy Act, which passed on a 264-123 vote, would create a fund called the Strategic Energy Efficiency and Renewables Reserve using the recouped oil dollars. The reserve also would be used to fund more investment in renewable ethanol, wind, hydrogen and biofuels technologies, as well as energy conservation programs.

The energy bill represented the fulfillment of Democrats' promise to pass a package of six bills in the first 100 legislative hours of Congress.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said her party wasn't finished and announced that she would create a Select Committee on Energy Independence and Global Warming.

"I have also instructed my committee chairs to hold hearings so that, by July 4, we will have a package of bills that will truly get us to energy independence in 10 years."

Democrats for years have targeted oil companies that bought and signed federal land leases in 1998 and 1999. Because of a congressional oversight, these companies did not have to pay the royalty fee for oil when its price went above $34.73 a barrel or natural gas when its price rose higher than $4.34 for every million thermal units.

The prices for both oil and natural gas have been well above the royalty thresholds for years, with the loss of more than $10 billion in fees. Democrats say their energy bill will recoup those dollars.

"The American people are owed a fair value for the resources they own. Yet when the government gives tax breaks in the form of royalty relief to Big Oil and fails to accurately monitor its oil leasing programs, it is the American people who are footing the bill," said Rep. Nick J. Rahall II, West Virginia Democrat.

The White House was not pleased with oil and gas incentives that Congress enacted as part of the 2005 Energy Policy Act, calling them unnecessary.

It also opposed mandatory royalty relief and prohibitions on drilling-related user fees and tax incentives allowing some oil firms an almost automatic write-off of certain geological and geophysical expenditures.

The White House, however, is against the provision to renegotiate the 1998 and 1999 leases that Democrats seek.

The House bill limits the executive's discretionary power to modify royalties by stripping that authority from the secretary of the interior.

A report by the Interior Department's inspector general said the department had not been performing the proper oversight to track oil royalty payments to the federal Treasury and had not engaged in due diligence to ensure oil companies were paying them.

"In the compliance reviews, the Interior Department relies on the information given to them by the oil companies," Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney, New York Democrat, said in response to the report. "This is incompetence, cronyism and it could be corrupt."

The Justice Department has begun an investigation into the matter.

Republicans leaders attempted to block the House bill's passage with motions to adjourn, recommitting the legislation with instructions striking most of the provisions and arguing that passing it by a majority instead of two-thirds vote violated House rules.

"This bill will hurt domestic production and increase the price of oil and gas in this country," said House Minority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican. "If you take away the oil industry's incentives to invest in domestic production, you increase our dependence on foreign oil."

Methodists: No Bush Library At SMU (AP)

By Angela K. Brown

AP, January 19, 2007

A group of Methodist ministers from across the nation launched an online petition drive Thursday urging Southern Methodist University to stop trying to land George W. Bush's presidential library.

The petition, on a new Web site, http://www.protectsmu.org, says that "as United Methodists, we believe that the linking of his presidency with a university bearing the Methodist name is utterly inappropriate."

"Methodists have a long history of social conscience, so questions about the conduct of this president are very concerning," said one of the petition's organizers, the Rev. Andrew J. Weaver of New York, who graduated from SMU's Perkins School of Theology.

Brad Cheves, SMU's vice president for external affairs and development, said Thursday that the Methodist church is diverse in its membership and opinions and that those involved with the petition reflect only one view.

"We believe the vast majority of the Methodist membership, university and community support the library and that it will benefit the faculty, students and community for generations to come," Cheves said.

DOJ_NMG_0118941

SMU emerged as the apparent winner in the library competition last month when the site selection committee said it was entering into further discussions with just SMU, the 11,000-student, private university, which is first lady Laura Bush's alma mater. The Bushes are Methodists.

President Bush said Thursday that he was "leaning heavily toward SMU" and was close to a decision.

"I understand there are some who have reservations, and my advice to them is understand that a library and institution would enhance education, be a place for interesting discussion and be a place for people to express their views and write and think, and these universities I think understand that and are excited about the prospects, and so am I," he told Belo Corp. television.

Some SMU professors have opposed Bush's foreign policy, mainly the war in Iraq. Some faculty members also have complained that the library complex's think tank dedicated to the philosophy of the Bush administration would hurt the school's reputation.

But at a faculty meeting Wednesday, SMU President R. Gerald Turner said those fears were unfounded. He said among the library's benefits were increasing the school's visibility nationwide and spurring economic development in the city.

The Rev. Mark Craig — an SMU trustee and senior minister of Highland Park United Methodist Church, where the Bushes are members — said that the petition organizers' views do not reflect the opinion of most church members and that the petition would not affect decisions about the library.

"The library is not about politics," Craig said. "The library is about history, having U.S. history from a period of eight years and that conveyed to a great academic institution."

The project will be financed with a private fund drive aimed at raising at least $200 million.

While SMU's president said his university's exclusive talks with the selection committee would resume in a few days, the other finalists are Baylor University in Waco and the University of Dallas. A decision is expected in a few months, when Bush receives a recommendation from the committee.

Ambushing The Bush Legacy (WSJ)

By Naomi Schaefer Riley

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

In an interview Sunday night on "60 Minutes," President Bush told Scott Pelley that he is "not the kind of guy who sits here and says 'Oh gosh, I'm worried about my legacy.' I'm more worried about making the right decisions to protect the United States of America."

It's a noble sentiment, but with less than two years left in his presidency, Mr. Bush and his supporters do have to make some decisions about his legacy, or at least where it will be housed.

In December, the committee charged with selecting a location for W's presidential library announced that it had narrowed down the candidates from three to one, eliminating Baylor University and the University of Dallas in favor of Southern Methodist University, Laura Bush's alma mater. The proposed library will include, in addition to presidential papers and artifacts, a public-policy institute to further "domestic and international goals." Among the goals mentioned by the selection committee are "compassionate conservatism, the spread of freedom and democracy throughout the world and defeating terrorism."

It all sounds quite worthy, but certain members of the SMU faculty did not react well to the news of their campus's selection. In an op-ed article for the college newspaper, two professors from the university's theology school asked: "Do we want SMU to benefit financially from a legacy of massive violence, destruction and death brought about by the Bush presidency in dismissal of broad international opinion?"

A letter sent to SMU's president last week, signed by 68 current and past members of the faculty, echoed this theme. It expressed concern about "certain actions and attitudes of President Bush during his term in office," including (draw a deep breath here): "the erosion of habeas corpus, denial of global warming, disrespect of international treaties, alienation of longtime U.S. allies, environmental predation, disregard for the rights of gay persons, a pre-emptive war based on false premises and other perceived forms of disrespect for the created order and the global community."

Which raises the question: Why would Mr. Bush want to have anything to do with such hostile -- not to mention graceless and cliché-obsessed -- people? Why not look elsewhere for his library's site? Admittedly the professors who signed the letter make up less than 10% of SMU's faculty. But presidential libraries inevitably bring a degree of prominence, even prestige, to the universities that host them. Why should Mr. Bush and his friends give SMU the satisfaction? One can easily imagine Cindy Sheehan parading around the university grounds for years to come with hordes of sociology professors and student activists following her.

Locating presidential libraries at universities has become "de rigueur" only recently, according to Richard Norton Smith, the former director of five presidential libraries. Up through Eisenhower, Mr. Smith notes, such libraries were located at places of "special significance" to the president. And for good reason. "If you want to understand FDR," says Mr. Smith, "you have to understand Hyde Park," where Roosevelt grew up.

Typically, campus sites mean controversy. Herbert Hoover's library started at Stanford, but he moved it to his home state of Iowa out of fear that left-wing faculty would tarnish his legacy. When LBJ's library opened in 1971 at the University of Texas, Austin, thousands of protesters showed up. Duke rejected Nixon's library altogether. And the Reagan library was chased out of Stanford for largely ideological reasons.

Mr. Smith believes that faculty objections are shortsighted. "With rare exceptions, presidential libraries have contributed to the intellectual and cultural life of universities. They expose students to a whole range of history and policy makers. And it's very bipartisan exposure." It is true that such libraries serve, in part, as monuments to particular presidencies. But scholars and students are free to use the library contents as they please, of course. And the library's own exhibits may well change as new sources of information become available. Mr. Smith cites the way in which the newly discovered Johnson tapes -- showing his ambivalence about the Vietnam War -- changed the way that library presented the president's role in the conflict.

For a faculty sick with Bush rage, none of this seems to matter. The negotiations with SMU are moving forward, but what are Mr. Bush's options? One suspects that Baylor, an evangelical school, and the University of Dallas, a conservative Catholic school, would both be more hospitable environments. But why bother with universities at all? The Bush presidency owes very little to them. Compassionate conservatism, spreading democracy and defeating terrorism are hardly at the top of most academic agendas. Why not offer the library to the American Enterprise Institute or the Manhattan Institute? Or why not raise a little more money and just put it on the ranch in Crawford, Texas? Whatever else you can say about President Bush, his administration has rarely been "de rigueur."

NTEU Closer To Representing Customs And Border Workers (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

O ne of the largest union elections ever conducted inside the government has moved a step closer to resolution.

The Washington regional director of the Federal Labor Relations Authority, in a decision issued late Wednesday, said the National Treasury Employees Union should be certified to represent about 30,000 workers in Customs and Border Protection, a major bureau in the Homeland Security Department.

NTEU defeated the American Federation of Government Employees last June -- 7,349 to 3,426 -- for the right to represent the employees. AFGE filed objections to the election, but a review conducted by Robert P. Hunter, the Washington FLRA regional director, found no merit to the claims.

The election was forced by the merger four years ago that consolidated 22 federal agencies into the Homeland Security Department. Many of those agencies had unionized workforces, including Customs and Border Protection, which absorbed the old U.S. Customs Service, the former Immigration and Naturalization Service and parts of other agencies. In 2004, the department filed a petition requesting the election to clarify union jurisdiction issues, which set up the showdown between AFGE and NTEU.

Bush administration officials have closely followed the election battle because the union that is certified as the winner will gain a larger voice in workplace issues and perhaps even policy debates on Capitol Hill.

As part of the Homeland Security reorganization, Customs and Border Protection recast many of the "legacy" employees into a new occupational grouping, CBP officers. They work at about 300 ports and border crossings and are widely seen as crucial to the fight against terrorism. Most of the CBP officers came from the ranks of customs employees, traditionally represented by NTEU, and immigration employees, represented by AFGE.

After NTEU won the election at Customs and Border Protection, AFGE filed an appeal that alleged agency managers had been biased toward NTEU and had interfered with the AFGE campaign. CBP denied the allegations, and Hunter dismissed the AFGE claims in his decision.

"It has not been shown that any of the matters raised, whether considered separately or cumulatively, are sufficient to set the election aside," Hunter wrote. "In sum, all objections are dismissed and the certification to NTEU should be issued without further delay."

Under the election rules, AFGE can ask the members of the Federal Labor Relations Authority to review the regional director's decision. AFGE leaders were traveling from a conference in Houston yesterday and declined to say whether they would appeal, noting that they had not read the 84-page decision.

Colleen M. Kelley, the NTEU president, said she hopes AFGE will not appeal and that her union can soon begin efforts to bargain over work assignments, overtime and alternative work schedules.Bill to Stop IRS Outsourcing

White House Usher Reflects On His Bosses (WP)

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Chief White House Usher Gary Walters is retiring at the end of January. He has worked at the mansion since 1970 and for the past two decades has been in charge of the operation of the world's most famous residence. In an interview with C-SPAN's Brian Lamb that will air Sunday evening, Walters offered his reflections on the presidents and first ladies he has served. Some excerpts:

Richard Nixon: Quiet, extremely studious. I mean, he didn't become such a master of Chinese policy by rote.

Jimmy Carter: Tremendously smart, involved in minutia, almost to his detriment. . . . He was the one that liked to . . . walk around the grounds, and he wanted to know every tree, every plant, both the botanical name and the common name.

Bill Clinton: Workaholic. He was constantly working. And a memory that just caused all of us to wonder how in the world anybody could remember all the things he did.

President Bush : The steadfastness of his beliefs in what he's doing. . . . In his mind, this is the road to go down, and he has not wavered.

Laura Bush: Knows what she wants, but is . . . willing . . . to sit and look at something for a while before she makes a decision. She wants to have it right.

Hillary Rodham Clinton: Liked to work. She was a worker.

Nancy Reagan: The easiest person in the world to work for. Most people don't believe that when I tell them that.

Cheney's Enigmatic Influence (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

After six years, it remains one of Washington's enduring mysteries: How does Vice President Cheney shape decisions in the tight inner circle of the Bush administration? There's a sense that Cheney's influence is on the rise again, at least with Iraq policy, but that's after many months in which his allies say his role was diminished.

To outside observers, Cheney has been the political equivalent of a black hole -- exerting a powerful but mostly invisible force on decisions. The office of the vice president has had a gravitational weight that sucked in other personalities and entire branches of the government without emitting light or heat that would explain the decision-making process.

During Bush's first term, the "OVP," as it's known in Washington, functioned as a kind of parallel national security staff. Lewis "Scooter" Libby was a strong chief of staff, and he hired talented foreign policy experts -- Eric Edelman and then Victoria Nuland -- to act, in effect, as Cheney's national security advisers. During Bush's second term, that role was taken on by John Hannah, a former policy researcher at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. But insiders say that since Libby's departure in 2005, the OVP has had less of an impact on foreign policy.

"What has defined the OVP since Scooter left is listlessness," says one Cheney ally. "For 18 months, it was defined by its torpidity. That was deeply distressing" to Cheney's conservative supporters, who feared that Bush had become captive to overly cautious advice from his senior military commanders, Gen. John Abizaid and Gen. George Casey.

This month's change in Iraq policy, in which Bush turned away from the patient strategy his military commanders had advocated, may have marked a return of Cheney's influence. But insiders caution that it's a mistake to see Cheney as some kind of puppet master on Iraq policy and that the key decisions have been made by Bush himself.

The thrust of Cheney's views -- in urging the president to ignore politics and maintain a tough course on Iraq -- surfaced in an interview he gave last weekend to Chris Wallace of Fox News. Wallace noted that Iraq was a big issue in the November elections and that exit polls showed only 17 percent of voters supported sending in more troops. What followed was this remarkable exchange:

DOJ_NMG_0118944

Wallace: "By taking the policy you have, haven't you, Mr. Vice President, ignored the express will of the American people in the November election?"

The vice president: "Well, Chris, this president, and I don't think any president worth his salt, can afford to make decisions of this magnitude according to the polls. The polls change day by day."

Wallace: "This was an election, sir."

The vice president: "Polls change day by day, week by week."

Those remarks capture what Cheney's friends say is his crucial contribution to internal decisions -- a conviction that much of the political debate in Washington is just noise and should be ignored in favor of the country's long-term interests.

"Over the years, he got tired of suffering fools," says one longtime Cheney friend. "He thinks it's all BS." This contempt for Washington developed when Cheney was a top White House aide in the Ford administration during the cacophony that followed Watergate, this friend says, and it ripened when he made enough money as chief executive of Halliburton that he didn't have to care what people in Washington thought. The danger is that in encouraging Bush to ignore polls and even elections, Cheney has helped set up a confrontation between Congress and the executive branch that could undermine any hope of achieving a bipartisan approach on Iraq.

While Cheney seems to have prevailed on Iraq, he appeared to suffer a defeat in this week's White House decision to submit the warrantless surveillance program to the oversight of the FISA court. Many administration lawyers urged that course over the past several years, but it was strongly resisted by Cheney's current chief of staff, David Addington, who argued that the president had inherent authority to authorize the program under his war-making powers. "Addington clearly lost this round," says one official who met with him about the National Security Agency program.

The mystery of how Cheney operates may finally be clarified in the coming trial of Libby. The vice president will be called to testify on behalf of his former chief of staff, whom he described to Wallace last week as "one of the finest individuals I've ever known." That was pure Cheney -- the stand-up guy from Wyoming.

Cheney's testimony, in person or by affidavit, about the use of classified information will go to the heart of the Cheney puzzle: How does the most important but elusive presidential adviser in modern history use his power behind the scenes?

Bernanke Warns Budget Could Hurt Economy (AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, January 19, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke warned on Thursday that the economy could be gravely hurt if Social Security and Medicare aren't revamped, and he urged lawmakers to tackle the nation's thorny fiscal issues sooner rather than later.

"If early and meaningful action is not taken, the U.S. economy could be seriously weakened," Bernanke told the Senate Budget Committee. Future generations, he said, will bear much of the cost.

It marked the Fed chief's most forceful warning to date on the potential problems facing the United States with the looming retirement of 78 million baby boomers, the oldest of whom will start retiring next year.

This huge wave of retirees will hit the U.S. budget as well as the economy, Bernanke said.

"The longer we wait, the more severe, the more Draconian, the more difficult the objective — the adjustments are going to be. I think the right time to start is about 10 years ago," he told lawmakers when questioned about the urgency of the situation.

Absent policy changes by Congress and the White House, rising budget deficits are likely in the years ahead to increase the amount of federal debt outstanding to unprecedented levels, Bernanke said.

That could propel interest rates for consumers and businesses upward, which would be a worrisome development, he said.

"Thus a vicious cycle may develop in which large deficits lead to rapid growth in debt and interest payments, which in turn adds to subsequent deficits," he said. Ultimately, a big expansion of the nation's debt "would spark a fiscal crisis, which could be addressed only by very sharp spending cuts or tax increases or both," Bernanke warned.

After a bitter election season, both Democrats and Republicans on the Senate panel have promised to try to deal with the spiraling costs of federal entitlement programs.

Sen. Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, the committee's top-ranking Republican, called Bernanke's warning "right on, and a clarion call that I hope folks will listen to."

DOJ_NMG_0118945

Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad, D-N.D., said: "We hope people are listening about the need for us to address these long-term imbalances, to take these challenges on, and the sooner we do so, the better."

The budget deficit last year totaled $248 billion, a four-year low. Bernanke noted the improvement but likened it to a "calm before the storm."

Spending on entitlement programs will begin to climb quickly during the next decade, he said. Federal spending for Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid will total about 15 percent of the gross domestic product by 2030, compared to roughly 8 1/2 percent of GDP in 2006, he said.

Forecasts call for the deficit to worsen for the 2007 budget year. The Congressional Budget Office is projecting $286 billion in red ink, while the White House is predicting an even bigger shortfall of $339 billion.

Bernanke said that economic growth alone is unlikely to solve the nation's impending fiscal problems.

Fixing the problems, he said, will take persistence and a willingness by Congress and the White House to make difficult choices. It will be up to those policymakers to find the right balance between taxes and spending, he said.

The Fed chief steered away from offering specific solutions.

"In the end, the fundamental decision that Congress, the administration and the American people must confront is how large a share of the nation's economic resources to devote to federal government programs, including transfer programs such as Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid," he said.

President Bush wants to work on the looming insolvency of the Social Security program. But his one-time plan to add private accounts to the system withered in 2005 after meeting resistance from Democrats and Republicans alike, and is a nonstarter now that Democrats are in charge.

Bush has tapped Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to gather ideas on how to restructure the program. And the president says he wants to work with Congress on a plan to balance the budget in five years.

Bernanke, who took over the Fed last February, made his case in somewhat starker terms than his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, who had repeatedly sounded the alarm about the dangers to the economy from exploding entitlement costs, some economists said.

"Bernanke didn't mince his words. He wasn't trying to candycoat the situation," said Brian Bethune, economist at Global Insight. "I think Greenspan was a little more diplomatic ... but at this point, a little more frankness is maybe what Congress needs."

Bernanke Warns US Of 'fiscal Crisis' Fear (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Eoin Callan In Washington And Tony Tassell In London

Financial Times, January 19, 2007

Ben Bernanke stepped up the pressure on Congress to address the budgetary impact of soaring spending on entitlement programmes on Thursday, warning that they could one day cause a "fiscal crisis" in the US.

The Federal Reserve chairman told the Senate budget committee that the recent improvement in US public finances was only the "calm before the storm".

He urged immediate action to head off the looming Medicare and Social Security funding gap, saying the right time to start was "ten years ago". But Mr Bernanke refused to comment on whether this should be done by curbing spending, raising taxes or some combination of the two, saying that was for elected officials to decide.

His uncharacteristically hard-hitting intervention came as data revealed that US inflation rebounded in December, all but ruling out any chance that the Federal Reserve would cut interest rates soon. The Fed chief said that without new policies, entitlement spending would result in mounting fiscal deficits, and the effect on the "vibrancy, efficiency and growth rate of oureconomy" would soon be "palpable".

His tough talk will make it more difficult for the newly elected Congress to shy away from politically explosive entitlement reform, and may help Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson's efforts to entice some Democrats into joining a bi-partisan push on Social Security.

Mr Bernanke, though, identified Medicare as the core of the threat, describing it as a "much bigger problem than Social Security". He called for a root-and-branch overhaul of the US health sector to cut costs and increase efficiency. In other comments, Mr Bernanke expressed mildly more concern about the external deficit than did his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, saying there was "good reason" to consider that it "needs to start coming down slowly".

Mr Bernanke also reiterated his view that it was better to discipline hedge funds indirectly via counterparty banks than to seek to regulate them directly.

The consumer price index rose 0.5 per cent in the month, driven by a 4.6 per cent jump in energy prices, which had fallen in previous months. The higher-than-expected increase ended a two-month run of softer prices that had raised hopes the Fed would quickly drop its bias towards tightening rates and start preparing the ground for rate cuts in the spring or early summer.

Core CPI – which excludes volatile energy and food costs, and is more closely watched by the Fed – rose 0.2 per cent, after being flat in November.

US government bond markets were little moved in reaction, with the yield on the benchmark 10-year bond edging up 0.2 basis points to 4.787 per cent.

Fed Chairman Warns Congress On National Debt (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Benjamin S. Bernanke delivered a stern warning to members of Congress this morning to address the national debt, which has spiraled due to spending on federal programs, especially Social Security and Medicare, and threatens to harm the national economy.

"The longer we wait, the more severe, the more draconian, the more difficult the objectives are going to be," Bernanke said. "The right time to start was about 10 years ago."

Sen. Kent Conrad, (D-N.D.) chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, which called Bernanke in for advice, described his comments as "a clarion call."

"These long-term imbalances are threatening the long-term stability of the country," Conrad said.

At the end of last fiscal year, the federal debt consumed 37% of gross domestic product, Bernanke said during the two-hour hearing today.

Although the federal budget deficit reached a four-year low last year of $248 billion, Bernanke called it, "the calm before the storm," given the growth in federal spending. The Congressional Budget Office is projecting a $286 billion deficit this year; the White House $339 billion.

"A vicious cycle may develop in which large deficits lead to rapid growth in debt and interest payments, which in turn add to subsequent deficits," Bernanke said.

Federal spending for Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid was 8.5% of GDP last year and is expected to reach 15% by 2030, Bernanke said.

"In the end, the fundamental decision that Congress, the administration and the American people must confront is how large a share of the nation's economic resources to devote to federal government programs, including transfer programs such as Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid," he said.

Bernanke resisted taking a position on the merits of tax cuts, beyond observing that, "The general view is that tax cuts do not pay for themselves."

During questioning by Sen. Bernie Sanders (D-Vt.), Bernanke defended free trade policies, such as NAFTA and trade normalization with China, saying they are not to blame for causing the national trade deficit. He believes the widening gap is largely due to the historically low national savings rate and tepid investment.

Bernanke offered several suggestions to increase federal revenues and reduce spending, including streamlining the federal tax code to reduce the tax gap between what Americans owe and pay; increasing savings incentive programs; recalculating Social Security benefits and experimenting with new cost-saving Medicare and Medicaid healthcare programs.

Bernanke Raises Prospect Of 'Debt Spiral' (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke warned that rising health-care and Social Security spending could create a "vicious cycle" of rising debt and interest payments and an eventual fiscal crisis.

Watch Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's opening remarks7 to the Senate Budget Committee. (15:20)

Though Mr. Bernanke lacks the stature of his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, his strong language, coupled with what appears to be a growing respect for his views from lawmakers in both parties, could add impetus to efforts to overhaul entitlement programs, principally Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid.

They currently amount to almost half of federal noninterest spending and 9% of gross domestic product, or the value of all goods and services produced in a nation. The Congressional Budget Office, assuming no change in the programs, extension of Mr. Bush's tax cuts and continued moderate growth in health-care spending, projects that will rise to 75% of spending and 19% of GDP by 2050.

What do you think of Fed Chairman Bernanke's dire warnings on the budget deficit?9

Mr. Bernanke's advice, delivered at a hearing of the Senate Budget Committee yesterday, comes days before President Bush's State of the Union address and weeks before his 2008 budget request. In the first six years of his presidency, Mr. Bush expanded Medicare significantly while cutting taxes repeatedly. He is seeking to preserve those tax cuts in the face of a Democratic-controlled Congress, while seeking -- through Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson -- to revive an overhaul of Social Security.

Since taking office last year, Mr. Bernanke has met extensively with members of both parties, and the outreach appears to be paying off. Budget Committee Chairman Sen. Kent Conrad of North Dakota yesterday thanked Mr. Bernanke for insights he provided over lunch a few weeks ago. "You've sent a very clear message and one that I hope people are paying close attention to," Mr. Conrad said. The panel's senior Republican, Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, called Mr. Bernanke's testimony "a clarion call."

The bipartisan praise also reflects the fact that Mr. Bernanke's diagnosis was generally uncontroversial. While that protects the Fed's reputation for political independence, it may limit Mr. Bernanke's impact on the fiscal debate. Mr. Greenspan was influential in part because he made specific recommendations, such as the passage of tax cuts in 2001. Democrats often cited his support for Paygo -- a budget rule meant to keep tax cuts and new entitlement programs from boosting the deficit -- in making it a key plank in their fiscal platform.

WASHINGTON WIRE

See the expanded online version of Washington Wire11. The Journal's Washington bureau updates the Wire during the day -- every weekday -- with analysis, news and buzz from inside and outside the Beltway.

Mr. Bernanke steered clear of specifics on entitlement overhaul in his testimony and anything that could be construed as criticism of President Bush, for whom Mr. Bernanke previously served as an adviser. Despite senators' praise, it is unclear whether his advice will have much direct impact.

The Fed chief noted that last year's budget deficit, spending and revenue were, as shares of GDP, close to averages that have prevailed since 1960. That is a point the White House often makes to deflect charges that its tax cuts have led to dangerously large deficits. Mr. Bernanke said this was the "calm before the storm." Spending on Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid are about to ramp up, he said, as the population ages.

While breaking no new ground, Mr. Bernanke's testimony was notable for its emphasis on the consequences of a rising national debt -- the sum of all annual budget deficits -- rather than the annual deficit alone. The debt, he noted, would reach almost 100% of GDP by 2030 according to the Congressional Budget Office, a level previously reached only during World War II. The annual interest on that debt would be 4.6% of GDP, triple the current level. 12

"A vicious cycle may develop in which large deficits lead to rapid growth in debt and interest payments, which in turn adds to subsequent deficits," he said. Similar "debt spirals" have contributed to financial crises in other countries, a subject Mr. Bernanke studied as an academic. "Ultimately, this expansion of debt would spark a fiscal crisis, which could be addressed only by very sharp spending cuts or tax increases, or both," he said.

Mr. Bernanke didn't predict -- as more pessimistic analysts have -- that such a crisis would entail sharply higher interest rates or a sharply weaker dollar. Still, he noted higher debts would divert capital from growth-enhancing investments and funnel more of Americans' income to foreign bondholders. This will "have an effect on the vibrancy, efficiency and growth rate of our economy, which will be palpable," he said.

Mr. Bernanke took office promising to be less outspoken on fiscal policy than Mr. Greenspan. In his initial appearances before Congress, he irritated some legislators by refusing to comment on specific topics. Yesterday's appearance suggests he has refined his approach. Asked a year ago about restoring Paygo, he said the Fed chairman "should not be involved in making specific recommendations about [Congress's] internal decision-making process." Asked the same question yesterday, he said, "I don't really have the expertise to advise on [those] types of rules."

Fed Chief Warns That Entitlement Growth Could Harm Economy (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — Warning against complacency over the federal deficit, Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, said Thursday that recent positive trends on the budget were a “calm before the storm,” masking a long-term danger posed by looming deficits in Social Security and Medicare.

DOJ_NMG_0118948

"The longer we wait, the more severe, the more draconian, the more difficult the adjustment is going to be," Mr. Bernanke said in response to a question at a Senate hearing about when lawmakers should tackle the growth of spending in the twin entitlement programs. "I think the right time to start is about 10 years ago."

Mr. Bernanke's comments were consistent with his past warnings, and those of his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, about the unfinanced cost of the postwar generation's retirement. But his tone was more urgent, and it seemed aimed at the arrival of a new Democratic-led Congress that is just now setting its priorities.

His comments also dovetailed with statements by the Treasury secretary, Henry M. Paulson Jr., favoring efforts to curb the cost of entitlements this year, despite skepticism among some lawmakers that painful steps to deal with the problem cannot be taken two years before a presidential election.

Mr. Paulson has begun discussions with leading Democrats in Congress on Social Security and budget matters, but the administration has not shown its hand with specific proposals. President Bush's earlier proposal to convert a portion of Social Security benefits for some future retirees into individual investment accounts failed to even reach a vote in Congress.

Mr. Bernanke's tone of urgency echoed the comments of Senator Kent Conrad, a North Dakota Democrat who has long criticized the Bush administration's tax cuts and warned of the risk of long-term federal deficits. Only now, Mr. Conrad was leading the hearing and welcoming Mr. Bernanke's warnings. Before Mr. Bernanke took office, he initially told lawmakers that he would avoid commenting on fiscal policy once he became Fed chairman. But like his predecessors, he has found it hard to stay out of the debate, especially when Congressional leaders demand to hear his views.

Still, Mr. Bernanke was careful not to enter the partisan fray over taxes and spending on Capitol Hill. He said repeatedly it was not his role to dictate how Congress should deal with the problem, despite efforts by Mr. Conrad and other Democrats to get him to oppose extending the Bush administration's tax cuts, which expire in 2010.

Neither did Republican senators succeed in prodding him to praise the Bush tax cuts specifically or tax cuts generally, as they used to be able to do with Mr. Greenspan. The previous Fed chairman said frequently that it would be better to reduce spending than increase taxes, and his support of the Bush tax cuts in 2001 angered Democrats and helped ease their passage.

Instead, Mr. Bernanke, in his first testimony since the election remade the political landscape in Congress, said it was up to lawmakers to decide what levels of spending on social programs are appropriate, and then set taxes at a level necessary to pay for them.

Asked by Republicans to echo their view that taxes lead to increased revenues, Mr. Bernanke said that tax cuts spur economic growth but that they "usually do not pay for themselves" by generating more tax revenue than they drain from the Treasury.

"I'm going to try to avoid making specific recommendations on tax policy," he said in response to a question from Senator Judd Gregg of New Hampshire, the ranking Republican on the Senate Budget Committee. "I don't think there's a magic number. I only say that there is a difficult balance there."

To another Republican senator, Wayne Allard of Colorado, Mr. Bernanke referred to the cost of government programs and said: "Whatever it is, you have to pay for it. That's what I'm saying."

Mr. Gregg also sought to make the point that, under Mr. Bush, the federal deficit had declined in the last two years because of rising tax revenues resulting from economic growth. Mr. Bernanke's entire testimony was intended to say that, while true, this trend was virtually irrelevant to the problem at hand.

The Fed chairman came to a hearing of the Senate Budget Committee citing recent long term projections by the Congressional Budget Office that Social Security and Medicare outlays will rise from 8.5 percent of annual economic output to 10.5 percent in 2015 and 15 percent in 2030.

These costs, in turn, would force the United States to keep borrowing, pushing the ratio of publicly held federal debt from its current level of 37 percent of the economy to about 100 percent in 2030, a level reached in the past only during World War II.

"If government debt and deficits were actually to grow at the pace envisioned by the C.B.O.'s scenario, the effects on the U.S. economy would be severe," Mr. Bernanke told the committee. He said the trends would slow economic growth, drain away funds for private investment and sap confidence of consumers, businesses and investors.

Mr. Paulson's negotiations with Congress have been very preliminary, his aides say. The talks will probably not begin in earnest until after President Bush's State of the Union speech on Jan. 23, when he is expected to outline not only his approach on entitlements but on the overall budget.

Mr. Bush has said that the tax cuts are all but sacrosanct in his view, and Democratic leaders say they do not expect to try this year to rescind even the parts of them that most benefit the rich. Administration officials say they are waiting for the Democrats to lay out their own approach to the budget, taxes and entitlements.

Mr. Bernanke seemed to go out of his way to agree with every questioner, but he flatly disputed the trade views of Senator Bernard Sanders of Vermont, newly elected as an independent but who describes himself as a socialist and votes as a Democrat.

When Mr. Sanders said that recent trade deals with China and with Mexico and Canada had eroded jobs, the Fed chairman said: “I don’t agree with that.” He said that the nation’s $800 billion trade deficit resulted from a low savings and high consumption rate in the United States, not those or other trade deals.

Bernanke Renews Debt Warning (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke warned Congress yesterday of a "fiscal crisis" if it doesn't curb the projected growth of federal spending on retirement and health-care programs.

Echoing similar warnings by his predecessor, Alan Greenspan, Bernanke told the Senate Budget Committee that "the effects on the U.S. economy would be severe" if the government's debt were allowed to balloon as forecast.

Bernanke noted that the federal deficit has declined in the past two years but said that was "the calm before the storm" of skyrocketing expenses for an aging population. He cited Congressional Budget Office projections that spending on the big entitlement programs -- Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid -- will equal 15 percent of the nation's gross domestic product by 2030, double last year's level.

Bernanke, who was a top White House economic adviser until last year, declined to take a position on whether to extend President Bush's tax cuts, many of which are set to expire by 2010. He said he would be nonpartisan as Fed chairman, offering general economic analysis but no specific recommendations on taxes or spending.

The "difficult choices" of how to balance the government's spending and revenue should be made by Congress, the White House and the public, he said.

The federal deficit fell last year to $248 billion, 1.9 percent of the nation's total economic output, by one commonly cited measure. But the deficit would have been $434 billion, or 3.3 percent of gross domestic product, if the government hadn't borrowed from Social Security, Bernanke said.

He also decried "burdensome" tax rules and said Congress might raise tax receipts by making them simpler.

Inflation At 3-Year Low (WP)

By Nell Henderson And Howard Schneider

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Inflation fell in 2006 to its lowest rate in three years, as tumbling fuel prices and a slowing economy cooled the pace of consumer price increases.

Other figures released yesterday showed unexpected signs of improvement in the housing market, adding to an overall picture of an economy that ended the year in relatively good health.

Low inflation is a critical component of the economy's health, allowing consumers and businesses to make financial decisions without worrying that their wages, savings or profits will be eroded by price increases. Inflation rose to worrisome levels in 2004 and 2005, leading to a series of interest-rate increases that helped send the housing market into a tailspin.

Ebbing inflation means that the Federal Reserve may avoid raising interest rates this year, holding them at levels likely to keep unemployment low and encourage economic growth.

Several analysts said, however, that inflation trends in recent years have mirrored swings in oil prices -- which have fallen lately but could go up again. The analysts also said the unusually warm weather last month might have encouraged more hiring, shopping and home construction, temporarily brightening the economic picture in December.

And though inflation has fallen, Federal Reserve policymakers think it remains too high. They expect the housing downturn to help keep economic growth moderate this year while keeping prices down.

Stock prices fell yesterday as many investors abandoned hope that the Fed might cut interest rates in the first half of the year to boost economic growth. Instead, the central bankers are considered virtually certain not to change rates at their meeting in two weeks, while declaring that they will raise them if inflation proves to be more stubborn than they expect.

The latest inflation numbers are "sufficient to encourage the Fed but not enough to enable the central bank to relax its guard against higher inflation," said Peter Kretzmer, a senior economist at Banc of America Securities.

Consumer prices rose 2.5 percent in 2006, largely reflecting rising costs for health care, food and rental housing, the Labor Department said. That pace was significantly lower than the 3.4 percent inflation of 2005, and was the smallest increase since 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0118950

The annual change masked the volatility of fuel prices, which had surged in late 2005 after Hurricane Katrina and other storms. Oil prices rose through much of 2006 as well, peaking at more than $77 a barrel in July but then falling through the end of the year to about $63 a barrel. By December, fuel prices were 2.6 percent higher than a year earlier.

The department's consumer price index, a widely followed measure of inflation, rose 0.5 percent in December because of a sharp rebound in fuel prices that month.

Fuel prices caused inflation to outpace most workers' wage gains again last month. Average weekly earnings fell 0.1 percent in December from the month before, after adjusting for price increases, the Labor Department said in a separate report. But for the year, so-called real wages were up 2.1 percent. Those are the wages paid to non-managerial and manufacturing employees on private payrolls, who make up about 80 percent of the workforce.

Oil prices have fallen this month, which should dampen the January inflation figure. U.S. benchmark crude closed at $50.48 a barrel yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Because oil prices can swing so much, economists and investors seek a sense of underlying inflation by studying so-called core measures that exclude food and fuel. The core consumer price index rose 0.2 percent in December, partly reflecting higher clothing and rental costs.

Core prices were up 2.6 percent for all of 2006 -- the most since 2001, the department said. But they fell to a 1.4 percent annual rate of increase in the last three months of the year.

In a separate report, the Census Bureau said builders broke ground on 4.5 percent more new homes in December than in November. And they obtained 5.5 percent more permits for future construction.

Those were surprising jumps, given that housing has been in the doldrums for months. Many analysts attributed the increases to warm weather in December, discounting the odds of a rebound in housing construction anytime soon. Many builders and investors are still struggling to unload bloated inventories of unsold homes.

Some observers disagreed. "Builders are not going to take on more construction loans, pay off contractors and put up new homes just because the weather has turned warmer," said Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group. "Builders are motivated by one thing: the prospect that home buyers are seriously shopping again."

Economy Seems To Be Holding Its Own, But Inflation Risk Persists (NYT)

By Louis Uchitelle

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

The economy seems to be shaking off a slowdown brought on by the precipitous drop in housing, the latest economic data suggested yesterday.

More new home construction was started in December than in November, the Census Bureau reported, and the Consumer Price Index, the nation's best-known inflation gauge, rose at its fastest pace in eight months — on the surface, at least, an indication of robust demand. Fine print in the reports, however, signaled that the five-year-old recovery is far from being on solid ground.

"The economy is performing significantly better than many economists had expected as recently as a month ago," said Lynn Reaser, chief economist for the Investment Strategies Group at Bank of America. "But the housing downturn and cutbacks in auto production are still likely to hamper growth."

The housing starts came in at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.6 million units, up 4.5 percent from the November rate. The number of building permits issued last month also rose, suggesting that prices may have fallen enough to draw people back into the market.

Nevertheless, the increase in construction starts was entirely in apartment buildings. Builders started fewer single-family homes in December than in November. And compared with a year ago, permits and construction for any type of housing were down about 25 percent.

"Very simply, the benchmark single-family sector is very weak," Joel Naroff, president of Naroff Economic Advisors, wrote to his clients.

The inflation numbers were also ambiguous. The 0.5 percent increase in December came after no increase in November, and sharp drops in September and October.

Not since the 0.6 percent rise in April, has the Consumer Price Index jumped so sharply in one month — suggesting to Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group, that inflation is far from subdued, as the Federal Reserve would like.

"All this talk about the Fed lowering rates is looking increasingly unlikely," Mr. Baumohl said, "and the possibility is growing that the Fed will have to raise rates in the second half of this year." Like many economists, Mr. Baumohl focuses mainly on the so-called core inflation rate, which measures price changes other than those for food and energy.

The core rate rose 0.2 percent in December, matching the increase in four of the last six months. It appears to be leveling off, he said, at an annual rate of 2.6 percent, which was the year-over-year increase reported yesterday by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

If so, that would be well above the 1 to 2 percent annual rate that Ben S. Bernanke, the Fed's chairman, describes as acceptable.

Patrick Jackman, an economist at the bureau, argued that home rents are playing a big role in the core rate's steady increase to 2.6 percent last year from 2.2 percent in 2004 and 2005. The bureau measures housing costs not by the purchase price of a house, but by rents and by what it describes as the rental equivalent of owning a home.

Indeed, more people are seeking to rent homes, driving up rental prices. Compounding the impact on inflation, no other item counts as heavily as rents in the bureau's monthly calculation of changes in the Consumer Price Index.

Most of the 0.2 percent increase in the core inflation rate last month came from rising rents, the bureau reported. Meanwhile, the cost of many other major items — recreation, for example, education and health care — rose only mildly or not at all. Car prices fell.

The two exceptions were apparel and tobacco prices, the former going up because of an anomaly in the seasonal adjustment formula the bureau uses for the Christmas season, and the latter because wholesalers raised prices last month.

"If I were on the Fed, I would say there is really no inflationary pressure in the broad economy," Mr. Jackman said.

The 0.5 percent increase in the overall inflation rate last month came mainly from a spike in fuel costs. After falling from August until early November, fuel prices rose until late December — and then started to fall again.

Absent the spike in gas prices, the overall price index would have risen by about 1.25 percent last month. Oil prices in 2006 rose much more slowly than in 2005. As a result, the rise of 2.5 percent in the overall price index last year was well below the 3.4 percent increase in 2005.

"Inflation does seem to be subsiding," Ms. Reaser said, "and I think that will continue partly because the Fed's earlier rate increases are still putting a lid on economic growth."

Inflation Down – But Far From Conquered (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, January 19, 2007

from the January 19, 2007 edition - http://www.csmonitor.com/2007/0119/p02s01-usec.html Inflation down – but far from conquered 2006 saw prices rise at their slowest pace since 2003, but economists see a recovering economy.

By Ron Scherer | Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

NEW YORK

Last year, the nation's inflation rate declined to its lowest level since 2003. But now, economists are wondering if the 2.6 percent rate may be about as low as it's going to get for a while.

While this does not mean that inflation will become a dominant issue for the economy, it probably means that the Federal Reserve is going to continue to fret about it. And that may mean that instead of cutting rates this spring, the Fed sits tight until at least midyea r.

"It's too early to declare victory on inflation," says Richard DeKaser, chief economist at National City Corporation in Cleveland. "Inflation may be down, but it's not out."

On the surface, the inflation numbers appear to be relatively benign. Thursday, the Labor Department reported that the December Consumer Price Index rose 0.5 percent, reflecting a hike in the price of gasoline. The so-called core rate of inflation, the inflation rate without food and energy, rose just 0.2 percent in December. However, economists are quick to point out that so far in the month of January, the price of energy is down substantially, reflecting the warm winter. "Most people have probably forgotten the rise in December already," says Mr. DeKaser.

What has economists worried are signs that the economy is starting to recover some of its momentum. On Wednesday, for example, the government reported industrial production rose 0.4 percent, the first increase since August.

Even the housing sector is showing some signs of life, again reflecting the warmer winter. Thursday, the Commerce Department reported construction of new homes rose 4.5 percent in December.

"Even though construction was still weak, it was better on a seasonally adjusted basis," says Dan Meckstroth, chief economist at the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI in Arlington, Va.

Mr. Meckstroth thinks the economy is now moving out of its slower pace. He says there are some signs business is getting rid of the high inventories, particularly in the auto sector.

DOJ_NMG_0118952

One of the reasons for the improvement in auto sales – aside from the warmer weather that let people get to the showrooms – are lower prices. Last month auto prices fell for the fifth consecutive month. They were down 0.9 percent for the year.

If the economy is starting to firm up, the Federal Reserve's attitude toward inflation could start to change, says Robert Brusca, of Fact and Opinion Economics in New York.

While the economy was soft, the Fed could take a more relaxed posture, he says. But, now with capacity utilization rising, the unemployment rate low, and more tightness in the economy, he expects the Fed will start to change its approach.

"As the economy gets firmer, the Fed gets stricter about what it will let inflation do," says Mr. Brusca. "It's kind of like a teacher with the brighter students – there is a higher expectation."

One of the concerns is the possibility of a wage/price spiral. Economists say there is a six- to 12-month lag between low unemployment rates and rising labor costs. "The unemployment rate started 2006 at 4.7 percent and ended at 4.5 percent and we probably have not seen the full repercussions of that," says DeKaser.

And the rate may still get lower. Thursday, the government reported a large drop in new weekly unemployment claims. This followed a large drop the week before. Now, some economists are wondering if the January unemployment rate could drop to as low as 4.4 percent.

Even though inflation may not be showing up in the numbers, some business people say they can see it at work in more subtle ways. For example, Larry Roshfeld, a senior vice president at CorasWorks Corp. in Reston, Va., says inflation puts more pressure on managers, especially those in information technology, trying to meet profit projections. "Inflation puts pressure on the ability to grow profits," he says, "and one of the first places pressured is the IT department since there is no place to increase revenue."

Jay Whitehead, the publisher of CRO magazine, can attest to the squeeze taking place in the technology sector. His company planned a conference for corporate responsibility officers (CROs) in San Francisco but ended up moving it to Chicago. "Inflation is hitting the budgets in technology more than other sectors and everyone out West is crying the blues," he says. "Budgets were more open in the Midwest."

On an anecdotal basis, Mr. Roshfeld says companies are now more willing to allow employees to work from home in an effort to help cut commuting costs. "It used to be that only senior executives could work at home, but now that's spread to lower level employees."

Despite the slowdown in housing, some builders and developers say cost pressures are still a part of the business. Two years ago, new construction was running at about $100 per square foot, says Adam Cowgill, a real estate agent at Railey Realty in McHenry, Md.

Now, Mr. Cowgill says it's closer to $200 per square foot. And though some commodities, such as copper, have eased in price recently, he says drywall is up 15 percent over last year. "Once the price is up and everyone has become accustomed to it, no one wants to bring the price back down," he says.

Separately, Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke appeared before the Senate Budget Committee Thursday and warned about future implications of the rising costs of Social Security, Medicare, and other entitlement programs.

"If early and meaningful action is not taken, the US economy could be seriously weakened, with future generations bearing much of the cost," said Mr. Bernanke.

In early February, President Bush will present his 2008 budget to Congress. Although it's not clear if he will tackle the rising cost of entitlements, his new Treasury chief Henry Paulson has indicated this will be one of his priorities.

Bernanke's predecessor at the Fed, Alan Greenspan, was often critical of government spending as well. Bernanke will testify about the state of the economy in mid-February.

Stocks Shrug Off Oil Decline And Catch Apple Downdraft (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

An Apple yesterday kept the buyers away.

A 6.2% decline in the consumer-electronics giant's shares led technology shares lower, in a selloff that spread to other areas of the market. Apple Inc.'s earnings announcement late Wednesday included fiscal first-quarter profits that beat analysts' expectations but a lukewarm second-quarter outlook.

The technology-stock-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index, which includes Apple, tumbled 1.5%, or 36.21 points, to 2443.21, up 1.2% on the year. Semiconductor-equipment makers Lam Research Corp., Varian Semiconductor Equipment Associates Inc. and Applied Materials Inc. were among the sector's big decliners.

The blue-chip Dow Jones Industrial Average slipped 9.22 points, or 0.1%, to 12567.93, up 0.8% on the year.

The stock market's losses came despite another big drop in crude-oil prices, which flirted with the first close under $50 a barrel in more than 1½ years. Government data showing a weekly increase in U.S. crude stocks pushed the price of oil futures contracts for February delivery down $1.76, or 3.4%, to $50.48 a barrel, up from an intraday low of $49.90. Crude contracts are off 17% this year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Some analysts said the stock market's reaction to Apple's announcement embodied a broader problem that may resurface as the current earnings season plays out: Investors' expectations for corporate results have been so high for so long, sparking so many early bets, that there may be little room left for stocks to rally on the good aspects of detailed corporate announcements. "At the first sign of a reality check, people will tend to bail out in the current environment," said Chris Johnson, chief executive and chief investment strategist at Johnson Research Group in Cincinnati.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.3%, or 4.25 points, to 1426.37, up 0.6% on the year.

In testimony to the Senate Budget Committee, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke cautioned about the dangers of large government deficits and growing health-care and Social Security costs in the years ahead. He offered few hints about the Fed's near-term plans regarding its key interest-rate targets -- a topic that has consumed investors in recent months.

For now, corporate earnings are garnering far more attention on Wall Street, said portfolio manager Jerome J. Heppelmann, of the asset-management firm Liberty Ridge Capital. "Investors pretty much know the economy is slowing down," he said. "In that sort of situation, they'll tend to seek safer stocks" generating big cash flow and steady profits.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell1, and bond prices rose2. The 10-year note rose 9/32 point, or $2.8125 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.751%.

The dollar was mixed3. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar hit its highest level in nearly four years, to 121.2121 yen from 120.66 yen. The euro rose to $1.2965 from $1.2936.

California Judge Declares A Mistrial In Vioxx Cases (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

LOS ANGELES -- A hung jury forced a mistrial Thursday in lawsuits by two men who blamed their heart attacks on Vioxx, the once-popular painkiller made by pharmaceutical company Merck & Co.

The two cases were tried together before a Superior Court jury that deadlocked when they reached the third question on a lengthy verdict form.

The jury did answer "yes" to the first two questions, finding that Vioxx did have potential risks or side-effects that were known or knowable and that they presented a substantial danger to users of Vioxx. The third question asked if the plaintiffs' physicians would have recognized the potential risks or side-effects.

The first two answers were rendered moot when Judge Victoria G. Chaney declared a mistrial.

The jury had sent a note to the court saying it was having trouble with the third question and lawyers were allowed to reargue that point. The jury then went back for more talks, but ultimately said there was an impasse.

It wasn't clear when there might be a retrial of the lawsuits brought by Lawrence Appell, of Scottsdale, Ariz., and Rudolph Arrigale, of Westminster, Calif.

Thomas Yoo, a spokesman for Merck's legal team, said, "We're disappointed that the jury was not able to reach a verdict. If either of these plaintiffs wants to come back we'll be ready."

Messrs. Appell and Arrigale claimed that Vioxx was a substantial factor in their heart problems. They also claimed Merck failed to give sufficient warning of potential safety hazards of the drug.

Mr. Arrigale sought to recover more than $177,000 in medical costs as well as additional compensatory and punitive damages. Mr. Appell sought compensatory damages on behalf of himself and his wife, plus punitive damages and more than $105,000 to cover medical expenses.

The trial began Oct. 31. In closing arguments Dec. 19, attorneys for the two plaintiffs argued their clients' heart injuries were caused by Vioxx.

Merck, headquartered in Whitehouse Station, N.J., argued that the two men's heart problems were caused by pre-existing coronary heart disease, not Vioxx.

Merck attorney Stephen D. Raber also told jurors that the pharmaceutical giant had not failed to properly warn doctors of possible complications from using the painkiller.

Merck removed Vioxx from the market two years ago after its research showed the drug doubled the risk of heart attacks and strokes.

California's first Vioxx liability case also went to trial before Ms. Chaney. It ended in August, with jurors finding Merck was not liable for the heart problems of a California man.

DOJ_NMG_0118954

As of Nov. 30, the company faced 27,200 lawsuits over Vioxx and another 265 potential class-action suits.

Six lawsuits are set for trial between now and June, with the next scheduled to begin in New Jersey.

Excluding Messrs. Appell and Arrigale's suits, 18 cases have been scheduled for trial over Vioxx to date. Juries have ruled for Merck nine times, although a state judge ultimately set aside one of the verdicts, the company said.

Unfettered Debate Takes Unflattering Turn In Michigan Supreme Court (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

In a recent series of written dissents, Justice Elizabeth A. Weaver of the Michigan Supreme Court has accused four of her colleagues of "bully tactics," "abuses of power and grossly unprofessional conduct" and trying to censor her.

In response, in a confidential draft opinion, the court's chief justice has accused Justice Weaver of behaving like "a child engaging in a tantrum." In the opinion, Chief Justice Clifford W. Taylor suggested that she continue her protests with a hunger strike, as that "seemed to have the potential for everyone to be a winner."

Students of judicial history in Michigan and elsewhere said they could not remember a similar judicial melee.

"The justices of the Michigan Supreme Court are making spectacles of themselves," said Richard D. Friedman, a law professor at the University of Michigan. "They really should start acting like grown-ups."

The justices' exchanges, which continued this week, have been fueled by personal animus. But their disagreements involve serious issues, including First Amendment principles and judicial ethics.

The justices differ about whether they may disclose the details of the court's internal deliberations, about whether lawyers are free to criticize them personally and about how motions seeking their disqualification should be treated.

On Wednesday in Lansing, the state capital, the justices held a hearing about a rule it adopted by a vote of 4 to 3 last month. The rule forbids justices from making public "correspondence, memoranda and discussions regarding cases or controversies," but does not specify a punishment for violations.

The new rule has not deterred Justice Weaver. On her Web site, www.justiceweaver.com, portions of Chief Justice Taylor's draft opinion attacking her appeared this month, after the rule was adopted.

More than 20 people spoke at the hearing, most of them supporting the rule, a court spokeswoman said.

One of the speakers, Judge Richard F. Suhrheinrich of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, in Cincinnati, said in an interview on Wednesday that the secrecy of judicial deliberations is crucial to ensuring robust, unfettered and un-self-conscious debate.

"Judges on that particular court have decided to make the deliberations public," Judge Suhrheinrich said, "and it has caused a great deal of problems."

Through a spokeswoman, Chief Justice Taylor declined a request for an interview. In an interview with Michigan Public Radio on Wednesday, he lashed out at Justice Weaver, saying "she has been very difficult to deal with" since she was passed over for a second term as chief justice in 2001.

"Believe me," Chief Justice Taylor said, "she doesn't have anything. It's just about time this soap opera stopped."

In a written dissent last month, Justice Weaver called the new rule a gag order. She said it conflicts with a provision in Michigan's Constitution requiring dissenting judges to give their reasons.

Judicial deliberations are almost universally protected from outside scrutiny. There is not much law, however, on the question of whether participants in the deliberations may themselves be forbidden to disclose exchanges in which they participated.

Justice Weaver wrote last month that the immediate purpose of the new rule was to suppress a dissent that she had written in a disciplinary case. She added that her primary obligations were to the public rather than her colleagues.

The new rule, she wrote, cannot constitutionally apply to "repeated personal slurs, name calling and abuses of power, such as threats to exclude a justice from conference discussions, to ban a justice from the Hall of Justice or to hold a dissenting justice in contempt."

The disciplinary case that gave rise to the judicial disagreement involved Geoffrey Fieger, a prominent plaintiffs' lawyer and politician who ran unsuccessfully for governor in 1998. His opponent, Gov. John M. Engler, appointed four of the justices on the current Supreme Court.

Those justices were in the majority in a 4-to-3 decision in July that reprimanded Mr. Fieger for intemperate language about several appeals court judges.

"They held that the First Amendment doesn't apply to lawyers," Mr. Fieger said in an interview.

In her dissent in the matter, Justice Weaver said the four justices should have disqualified themselves from Mr. Fieger's case because they had displayed "bias and prejudice" in public comments made about him.

In the majority opinion, the justices acknowledged that they had tangled politically with Mr. Fieger, but said that having done so did not require their disqualification.

In a related federal case, the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit last month reinstated a suit by Mr. Fieger that challenged Michigan's judicial disqualification rules as a violation of due process. Justices of the Michigan Supreme Court, like judges on most state high courts, decide for themselves whether to grant motions seeking their disqualification.

"The traditions of deciding on recusal are due for a fresh review, because there is a new world swirling around the courts," said Bert Brandenburg, the executive director of Justice at Stake, a judicial reform group. Increasingly expensive and nasty judicial election campaigns and political attacks on judicial independence are part of that new world, Mr. Brandenburg said.

Justice Weaver did not respond to a request for comment, but an aide directed a reporter to materials on her Web site, which includes photographs, opinions, press releases and speeches. It also features her "10 Principles for Living."

Principle No. 6: "Avoid unnecessary disputes and confrontations."

Law Firms Are Urged Not To Force Retirements (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

A special committee of the New York State Bar Association is calling on law firms to end the practice of mandatory retirement for partners.

In a strongly worded report that is to be released today, the committee concluded that "mandatory retirement — requiring a partner to leave the firm upon reaching an arbitrary age — is not an acceptable practice."

Retirement practices at law firms is becoming a hot topic as many of the nation's lawyers enter their 60s and face policies aimed at pushing them out the door. About 57 percent of law firms with more than 100 lawyers reported having a mandatory retirement age, ranging from 65 to 72, according to a 2005 survey conducted by Altman Weil, a law firm management consulting company.

But firms that push lawyers out at an arbitrary age without taking into consideration the individual's productivity and contribution to the firm could be missing out, said Mark H. Alcott, 67, a lawyer with Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison, who is president of the bar association and who formed the special committee.

"One of the things that concerns me is that mandatory retirement ages are getting younger just as people are getting older and living more productive lives," said Mr. Alcott, who said Paul, Weiss had a mandatory retirement age of 70.

Law firms that have adopted more-corporate structures have long argued that older partners needed to be moved out to give more opportunities and a bigger chunk of profits to younger lawyers.

But members of the special committee said that some firms adopted the policies simply to avoid uncomfortable discussions with a senior partner whose skills may be diminishing.

"We're not suggesting that partnerships should be a lifetime guarantee, but we think it is a false premise that utilizing senior lawyers in a way that's consistent with their ability to contribute denies opportunities to younger lawyers," said Mark C. Zauderer, 60, a lawyer with Flemming Zulack Williamson Zauderer, who was chairman of the committee.

Mr. Zauderer, who said that his firm did not have a mandatory retirement policy, noted that law firms were keeping a close eye on legal challenges to their practices.

In federal court in Chicago, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has filed a lawsuit against the law firm Sidley Austin, accusing it of age discrimination in the demotion or forced retirement of 32 older partners in 1999. Sidley has denied the accusations.

The committee did not take a position on the Sidley Austin case, Mr. Zauderer said, but he said such cases may make it hard for large law firms to justify retirement policies on the ground that partners are owners and therefore exempt from protection by age discrimination laws.

Groups Offer Health Plan For Coverage Of Uninsured (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — A broad coalition of business and consumer groups, doctors, hospitals and drug companies laid out a major proposal on Thursday to provide health coverage to more than half of the nation's 47 million uninsured by expanding federal benefit programs and offering new tax credits to individuals and families.

"This is a proposal not for mandates but for incentives," said Dr. Reed V. Tuckson, senior vice president of UnitedHealth Group, one of the nation's largest insurers. "It's a careful balance of public and private solutions."

DOJ_NMG_0118956

The proposal, unveiled Thursday after more than two years of work, was endorsed by 16 groups including AARP, the American Hospital Association, the American Medical Association, the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association, Johnson & Johnson, Kaiser Permanente, Pfizer and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

Other coalition members endorsing the proposal were Families USA, a liberal-leaning consumer group, and America's Health Insurance Plans, a trade group for insurers.

The proposal comes at a possible turning point in the debate over national health insurance, which has been an elusive goal for Democrats since the New Deal. In the past few years, businesses of all sizes have said that health costs are cutting their profits and hurting their ability to compete. Politicians of both parties predict that the health care issue will figure prominently in the 2008 presidential campaign.

Without waiting for Congress, states like Massachusetts and California are expanding coverage, but want help from Washington.

As a first step, the 16-member group, known as the Health Coverage Coalition for the Uninsured, urged Congress to put more money into the Children's Health Insurance Program and create tax breaks for the purchase of private insurance covering children. Money for the program is running low, and many children are eligible but not enrolled.

Members of the coalition said their proposal would cost $45 billion in the first five years. They did not estimate the cost of insuring millions of adults in later years, nor did they suggest how to pay the costs. Dr. Tuckson said that "the cost of inaction is higher than the cost of action."

Ronald F. Pollack, the executive director of Families USA, said, "Our agreement transcends political and ideological boundaries."

But tensions bubbled below the surface, showing how difficult it could be to translate the recommendations into law. The A.F.L.-C.I.O., the Service Employees International Union and the National Association of Manufacturers participated in the coalition for more than a year but did not endorse the final report. The deepest divisions came over how to pay for expanded coverage and who should foot the bill.

Andrew L. Stern, president of the service employees' union, supports health insurance for all but has said that the "employer-based system of health coverage is over" and that it "is collapsing, crushed by out-of-control costs." By contrast, members of the coalition said they wanted to preserve and build on that system.

E. Neil Trautwein, former assistant vice president of the National Association of Manufacturers, said the proposal had "little reference to fiscal realities."

JoAnn C. Volk, a policy analyst at the A.F.L.-C.I.O., said she favored expanding government programs. "But tax credits would not guarantee access to comprehensive coverage and could leave consumers with high out-of-pocket costs," Ms. Volk said.

Suzanne DeFrancis, a spokeswoman for the Department of Health and Human Services, said: "We all share the goal of helping people get health insurance. The administration believes this can be done best by helping people buy their own insurance, rather than creating a new government entitlement to health care or raising taxes."

More than eight million children are uninsured. At least two-thirds are eligible for Medicaid or the Children's Health Insurance Program. One way to cover these children would be to enroll them automatically in Medicaid or the children's insurance program if they qualified for food stamps or reduced-price school lunches, the coalition said.

In general, Medicaid is available to children under 19 in families with incomes below the poverty level, about $16,600 for a family of three. The coalition said Congress should provide tax credits to families with incomes from 100 percent to 300 percent of the poverty level, to help them buy coverage for children.

The coalition offered longer-term recommendations, saying that states should have the option to expand Medicaid to cover all adults with incomes below the poverty level.

"Day after day, there is debate and discussion," Dr. Tuckson said. "Day after day, people die. We are sick and tired of the debate. We are focusing on what is achievable."

TEED UP Health-Insurance Gap Surges As Political Issue (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon And David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

Suddenly, the long-festering issue of providing health coverage to the one in six Americans who lack it seems to have leapt to the top of the national to-do list.

On Tuesday, an unlikely coalition of the Business Roundtable, AARP and the Service Employees International Union called for "affordable quality health care for all." 1

On Wednesday, Pennsylvania's governor became the latest to offer a way to cover the uninsured in his state.

DOJ_NMG_0118957

Yesterday, another strange-bedfellows coalition, ranging from a health insurers' trade group to a liberal advocacy group, unveiled a plan to subsidize health premiums with a mix of tax credits and federal spending. And Oregon Sen. Ron Wyden dusted off a plan to make people buy insurance, with employers chipping in. On Tuesday, President Bush is expected to talk about his ideas for shrinking the ranks of the uninsured.

Thrusting the long-running issue to the fore are political and economic forces that have been building for years but are given new force by political events. Not only have the Democrats taken over Congress, but state political leaders, including Republicans such as California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, are moving on their own to change the system. And U.S. companies increasingly complain that the current employer-paid insurance system puts some of them at a disadvantage -- either globally or vis-a-vis firms that won't provide insurance. (See related story.2)

A SURGING ISSUE

· The News: Many Americans' lack of health insurance has abruptly become a hotter political issue, with proposed fixes proliferating and states taking action on their own.

· The Cause: Political winds shift and big companies say employer-paid insurance puts them at a global disadvantage.

· Bottom Line: Disagreement over cures may prevent change, but issue will be hot in 2008 presidential race.

All this increases the chances that Washington will try to tackle at least a piece of a health-care problem that has only grown bigger since the Clintons' failure at comprehensive reform back in 1994. But it still doesn't necessarily mean anything big will happen, at least nationally, in the next couple of years. The primary reason: There's nothing approaching a consensus on what to do.

There is, for sure, a growing consensus that the rising number of Americans without health coverage is a problem, not just for them but also for employers and governments that pay the bills. U.S. auto companies "are paying for the emergency-room treatments of people who can't afford it," complains Tom Lasorda, chief executive of DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler unit. "I'm paying for it because the rates go up because I have to cover the cost."

But there is a splintering of approaches to the problem. Some favor bigger government. Others would bolster the decaying system of employer-sponsored insurance. Still others would make health insurance more like car insurance and have people buy their own, aided by various subsidies.

THIS WEEK IN HEALTH CARE

See a list of events and announcements related to health care coming up this week.

Those who are optimistic that the recent talk portends action see a harmonic convergence of interests that suggests the latest round of press conferences and plans offered by coalitions will produce something tangible. Andrew Stern, president of the Service Employees International Union, or SEIU, says that when the Clinton health initiative failed, "business believed that they could somehow manage health costs, and the economy was far less global." The world has changed. "Having had 13 more years of increasing costs...," he says, "people realize that you can't manage this as a company -- we have to manage this as a country."

The problem has long been apparent and is getting worse. The number of Americans without health insurance is growing, and rising premiums have lessened employers' willingness to provide it. Though a majority of Americans still get insurance through the workplace -- a practice tracing to the 1940s, when businesses offered fringe benefits in lieu of higher wages -- the fraction of employees offered coverage at work fell to 77.4% in 2005 from 81.2% in 2001.

At last tally, the Census Bureau said 15.9% of Americans, 46.6 million in all, lacked health insurance. Government programs -- Medicare, Medicaid and the 10-year-old State Children's Health Insurance Program -- pick up the elderly, the disabled and the very poor.

Nearly 70% of the uninsured are in families with at least one full-time worker. In some cases, the employer doesn't provide coverage. In others, the employee can't afford it or doesn't take the coverage that employers offer, according to the Kaiser Commission on Medicaid and the Uninsured, a private foundation-backed effort.

So by no means are the uninsured all poor; more than a fifth live in families with incomes above $40,000. And it would seem they or their employers can afford to pick up a part of the tab -- an important factor in making some of the proposals floating around feasible.

The heightened political focus on the issue reflects pressure from two sources. One is voters' anxieties, both about the cost of care and about the risk of losing insurance for reasons such as changing jobs. "A member of Congress goes home and two issues come up every time you get together with folks: One of them is Iraq, and one of them is health care," says Sen. Wyden, an Oregon Democrat. "A lot of people who have coverage think they're one rate hike away from losing their coverage."

The other is an ever-louder complaint from U.S. businesses that they can't compete in a global economy when companies from other countries don't have to pay for health care. Deere & Co. Chief Executive Robert Lane told Congress last year that failure to act could result in a "limiting of covered services, loss of employer-provided health care...and even a loss of American jobs, both in the manufacturing and service sectors."

The uninsured, of course, make up only one of the U.S. health-care system's issues, alongside quality and, especially, rapid rises in costs. But confronting the uninsured problem is politically appealing and it seems not quite as intractable. "Dealing with cost is really hard. It means leveling with the public. It means telling people you can't have everything you want or your doctor wants," says Paul Ginsburg, president of the Center for Studying Health System Change, a foundation-backed think tank in Washington.

Then there's raw partisan politics. Democrats believe they have the political wind at their backs and that one reason they do is public anxiety about health care. Republicans feel a need to respond, and often look for approaches that rely less on government and more on market forces.

At the same time, some proponents of free trade seek ways to ease workers' anxieties about globalization so they might be less hostile to it. Recent initiatives at the state level reflect the public pressure for some kind of governmental action -- and at the same time increase the pressure for some federal action.

"Legislators and governors are feeling pressure from small businesses," says Katherine Swartz, a professor at the Harvard School of Public Health. She has another idea for dealing with the problem: government-subsidized reinsurance pools that might make it more affordable for employers to offer insurance.

Ms. Swartz says that "nobody believes anything is going to come out of Washington. States are more willing to say let's try something." Flush state budgets help. A survey by the Kaiser Family Foundation found that one-third of states, 17 in all, increased access to health coverage in 2006, often to low-income children. For the first time in four years, no state restricted income eligibility in Medicaid or in the State Children's Health Insurance Program.

Last year, the then-governor of Massachusetts, Republican Mitt Romney, helped by Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy, cut a deal with Democratic leaders of the state's legislature. It required state residents to obtain insurance, created a state-sponsored "connector" where they could go to buy it, and required all but the very smallest employers to provide insurance or pay a penalty.

Vermont and Maine also have enacted universal-coverage plans. Vermont aims to have 96% of state residents insured by 2010 through a mix of subsidies and employer contributions, plus a tobacco tax. Maine's program, aimed at insuring all by 2009, is grappling with inadequate funding, fewer people enrolling than anticipated and lawsuits from business over the financing mechanism.

Several other states are mulling ways to increase coverage for their residents. Some mix expanded government programs with mandates on individuals to purchase insurance -- along with subsidies for low-income people, new insurance pools to share risks, and mandatory employer contributions.

Last week, California Gov. Schwarzenegger outlined a plan that would make uninsured residents purchase insurance, and require businesses with 10 or more employees to either offer insurance or pay 4% of their payroll into a fund for the uninsured. The plan would levy new taxes on doctors and hospitals to help pay for the state's estimated 6.5 million uninsured, a number that includes illegal immigrants.

On Wednesday, Pennsylvania's Democratic governor, Edward Rendell, became the latest recruit, with a plan to cover his state's nearly one million uninsured. He stopped short of a Massachusetts-style mandate, instead proposing to phase in a requirement that those with incomes above 300% of the poverty level ($60,000 a year for a family of four) purchase health insurance, along with full-time college and graduate students. His proposal would also penalize employers that didn't offer insurance and would provide money to help individuals afford it.

He stopped short of a Massachusetts-style mandate but would penalize employers that didn't offer insurance and would provide money to help individuals afford it.

As things stand, Mr. Rendell said, "It is a tremendous deterrent for businesses that are considering locating in Pennsylvania to know that in addition to paying for their own employees' health coverage, they will be subsidizing the costs of the uninsured" as hospitals charge them more to cover the free care the hospitals must give.

From the perspective of big companies, the mandatory-employer-contribution programs at least level the playing field within the U.S., though they don't do much to ease the problem of competing globally.

In Washington, it's far easier to get agreement on the goal -- "affordable, quality health care for all" is the mantra -- than on the way to get there.

One camp, almost entirely Democrats, sees the current turmoil and dissatisfaction with job-linked insurance as hastening a single-payer national system. It's an idea many Democrats have pushed since the days of Franklin Roosevelt and Harry Truman.

DOJ_NMG_0118959

Sen. Kennedy, head of the Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions, is proposing to expand Medicare beyond the elderly and disabled to all Americans, beginning with children and those aged 55 to 64. To many, that still seems politically unrealistic, especially given problems that Canada and Britain have run into with their national systems, including long waits and rising costs. But expanding the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which was created in 1997 to help states provide coverage to more low-income children, strikes some Democrats as a feasible step in this direction.

Another camp, including some Bush administration officials, sees the turmoil and decay of job-linked health insurance as a reason to go in a very different direction. They would let individuals shop for health care much as they do for other things. They would use tax breaks and vouchers to help people afford insurance, preferably high-deductible policies that prod citizens to make wise choices.

The government already is taking steps to make Americans better consumers of health care. To encourage people to be more cautious in using health care, the Bush administration is seeking ways to wean Americans off generous schemes that pay for almost anything. In their place, it favors high-deductible policies that cover the big expenses, plus ways to let people pocket the savings if they avoid unnecessary treatment or shop for lower-priced care. Health Savings Accounts are a way to do this, offering tax breaks to people who take high-deductible policies and allowing them to escape taxes on wages set aside for health care, keeping the money if they don't spend it.

Mr. Bush is expected to continue pushing in this direction. Among possible proposals: ways to make the market for individually purchased insurance more efficient, and encouragement to small businesses to help employees buy bare-bones policies. Administration officials argue that current tax law imprudently encourages employers to provide unlimited amounts of health care to workers who aren't taxed on that as income. One possible change would be to limit that tax break and devote any revenue raised by the change to subsidizing coverage for lower-income Americans.

In a recent op-ed piece in The Wall Street Journal, Mr. Bush listed "affordable health care" among the biggest issues facing the American people.

A third camp, borrowing from what's going on at the state level, essentially would widen existing sources of health insurance -- government, employers and individual policies -- so that they cover everyone. Such plans sometimes require that everyone get insurance; penalize employers that don't offer it; and subsidize coverage for people who can't easily afford it yet don't qualify for programs for the poor.

Although state experimentation is in favor now, one obstacle to state-by-state reform is a federal law, the Employee Retirement Income Security Act, or Erisa, that limits states' maneuvering room. It has thwarted an attempt by Maryland to force Wal-Mart Stores Inc. to offer health insurance to employees. This week, the Fourth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld an earlier decision that Maryland had violated Erisa. Legal experts said the decision could pose problems for states considering health-care changes but suggested that it wouldn't cripple efforts in states like Massachusetts, where the overhaul is broad and not targeted at a single employer.

Some veterans of health-care battles past smile at the enthusiasm for tackling the problem. Recalling high-profile press conferences of years past -- and proposals shredded by partisan politics or budget realities -- they say the most likely federal action is none of the above. There's also likely to be a big debate over health care in the coming presidential campaign.

But Mr. Stern, the union leader, thinks that view underestimates the current ground swell and unusual political opening. "I'm not sure Congress is yet recognizing the tidal wave that is building," he says. "It's the perfect time. You have an evenly divided Congress in Democratic control and a presidency in Republican control. You have everyone lined up on the side of universal coverage."

Doing nothing is costly too, says Henry Simmons, president of the National Coalition on Health Care, a collection of companies and interest groups that has agitated for major health-care change since 1990. "We can afford health-care reform," he says. "What we cannot afford is a continued failure to address the crisis in health care."

Tuesday

Who: Business Roundtable, Service Employees International Union, AARP

What: These unlikely allies launched a group called "Divided We Fail" and proclaimed that health care costs have gotten out of control. They said they plan to force lawmakers to begin confronting the issue of health care reform as we head towards the 2008 election.

Tidbit: The group got off to a rough start with a full-page ad in the Washington Post announcing the group somehow failing to include the word "Divided," leaving the ad to read simply: "We Fail"

Wednesday

Who: A bipartisan group of Senators and members of the House

DOJ_NMG_0118960

What: Unveiled the "Health Partnership Act" which is aimed at providing grants to states that are crafting their own health care reform plans. Under the plan, Congress would create a State Health Innovation Commission to review and approve grants

Quote: "There is no single prescription to solving our nation's serious uninsured problem. Extending health care to the millions of Americans who are uninsured will require the innovation of governors and other leaders in all 50 states. Our legislation simply helps each state implement the solution that is right for them," said Sen. Jeff Bingaman, (D-NM), a sponsor of the bill.

Tidbit: The bill doesn't call for a specific amount of money to fund the program.

Wednesday

Who: Pennsylvania Gov. Edward Rendell

What: Became the latest governor to propose a plan to cover the state's uninsured residents

Quote: "We can no longer stand by while health care costs spiral out of control … It is no longer a question of whether we can afford to act – the cost of inaction is far greater; both in terms of individual health consequences and from the increasing burden on taxpayers," Mr. Rendell said.

Tidbit: The plan will phase in a mandate requiring health insurane for those with incomes more than 300% of the federal poverty level ($60,000 for a family of four) and require that full-time four-year college and grad students have coverage.

Thursday

Who: Strange bedfellows including Families USA, the US. Chamber of Commerce and America's Health Insurance Plans

What: Announced a two-step approach to providing coverage to children and adults. The plan would use of mix of tax credits, subsidies and an expansion of existing federal programs aimed at low-income individuals.

Tidbit: Perhaps to signal how grandiose they view their plan, the group unveiled it in the cavernous foyer of Washington, D.C.'s Union Station.

Thursday

Who: Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Oregon)

What: Introduced the Healthy Americans Act. The plan is to de-link health care from the employer-sponsored model and move towards a system where individuals purchase coverage and employers help foot the bill

Quote: "Americans really don't have health care at all. They have sick care," said Mr. Wyden. "We are going to change that. We are going to change that by giving seniors incentives to stay healthy, rewarding parents who enroll their youngsters in wellness programs and pushing private insurers to put a new emphasis on prevention and wellness in the plans they offer."

GOP Expects Secret Ballot (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, January 19, 2007

Republican National Committee members think they will get a secret ballot on today's election of a new general chairman, which would protect members opposed to the White House's push to fill the new slot with an advocate of an amnesty for illegal aliens.

"If we get the secret ballot as promised, then every member will feel free to express his or her view without the fear of coercion or intimidation," said RNC member Curly Haugland of North Dakota.

The move to create a new top office on the committee and fill it with Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida is scheduled to take place today, on the third day of the annual RNC winter meeting here. Mr. Martinez supports President Bush's plans for what conservative critics call amnesty for illegal aliens.

Former Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, a former state party chairman and RNC member who attended the meeting yesterday as an observer, was talked up by some members as an alternative to Mr. Martinez.

Mr. Steele, praised by name in a farewell speech by outgoing Republican National Chairman Ken Mehlman, lost a Senate run in November but remains popular with RNC members.

"The Republican Party is against amnesty for illegals, but if the president wants Mr. Martinez as general chairman, that should be the president's prerogative," Mr. Steele told The Washington Times.

The RNC leadership's desires historically almost always carry the day, especially when a Republican is in the White House, but some members yesterday said they saw hope that things might turn out differently this time.

"If it is a secret ballot, it will make a huge difference," said RNC member Denise McNamara of Texas, who said she intends to vote against the creation of the general-chairman position and, if that move fails, to vote against Mr. Martinez to fill the office, regardless of whether the vote is secret or public.

So far, a minority of members share her willingness to publicly express opposition.

DOJ_NMG_0118961

"I will vote against the creation of an office of general chairman, even if it is a voice vote," said RNC member Steve Cloud of Kansas. "But a lot of others on this committee who also oppose the creation of that office -- whether because it violates the rules or because they oppose amnesty for illegal aliens -- they will be afraid to say what they think unless there is a secret ballot."

At issue is whether the RNC's rules permit the creation the "general chairman" position. The rules governing the RNC, adopted at the 2004 Republican National Convention, call only for an elected chairman and co-chairman.

RNC member Robert M. "Mike" Duncan, a Kentucky resident and the current treasurer, is running unopposed for chairman. RNC member Tim Morgan of California is exacted to become the new treasurer.

Mr. Bush has said his friend, Mr. Martinez, will be the RNC's general chairman, even though the office has yet to be created by a vote of the 168-member national committee.

"Some members are opposed for that reason alone," Mr. Cloud said.

Mr. Haugland said he had won agreement, in a private meeting with the RNC leadership, to provide a report from a certified parliamentarian in support of a secret ballot instead of the usual voice vote on such issues.

Mrs. McNamara said fears that if the RNC leadership rules that members must cast public votes on whether to have a secret ballot, "then right away you give away whether you are going to vote against Martinez."

Mr. Mehlman, widely credited with making the Republican Party's 72-hour task force for voter turnout in the 2002 and 2004 elections successful, yesterday told the RNC that the way to "grow" its membership and popularity with voters is not to treat Democrats as "the enemy."

"Of course, there is still much about the Democrats that we disagree with," Mr. Mehlman said. "But when we do disagree, let us do so remembering that our political opponents are not our enemies."

He said that when Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said he hates Republicans and what they stand for, ordinary people scratched their heads.

"Outside this town, a Republican isn't an enemy to a Democrat -- she's a sister-in-law or another parent they see at the soccer field on Saturday mornings."

He said Republicans are "defined by how we treat others, not our political philosophy."

Mr. Mehlman said the midterm election losses taught the party that it "must hold its officials, candidates and staff to the highest ethical standards" and that "there is too much money and power in Washington, D.C., today."

"Thieves go where the money is, and scoundrels follow the power," he warned.

Two potential Republican presidential candidates held simultaneous dinners last night for RNC members. Some members said they got invitations to the one held by Sen. John McCain of Arizona and to the one held by former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney. Other said they got invitations to one but not the other. Some members said they were going to try to drop in on both dinners.

Also, a stream of members visited Mr. McCain in his Senate offices, some ferried there courtesy of RNC member Chuck Yob of Michigan.

Mr. Martinez held an evening reception for members at a ballroom in the Grand Hyatt Hotel, where the annual meeting has been taking place.

Departing Chief Warns G.O.P. On Outlook For 2008 Races (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 18 — Ken Mehlman, the departing chairman of the Republican National Committee, warned on Thursday that his party would suffer even more devastating losses in 2008 than it did in 2006 if it did not reach out to minorities and address voter concerns about ethics.

In his farewell speech after two years as chairman, Mr. Mehlman said that the 2006 elections, in which Republicans lost control of both houses of Congress, was not a fluke that could be attributed to the calendar, a few scandal-tainted candidates and the tough going in Iraq.

“Each of these factors combined to create an environment that was unfavorable for Republicans,” said Mr. Mehlman, one of the chief architects of President Bush’s two national election victories. “But, folks, these factors cannot be an excuse.”

He said that if Republican officials shrugged off the repudiation of the party in the 2006 elections they would lose the White House in 2008 and remain in the minority in Congress indefinitely. He said the party had to recommit itself to political reform, fiscal restraint and personal ethics.

Mr. Mehlman addressed the roughly 170 members of the Republican National Committee at their annual winter meeting, a rather glum affair at a downtown hotel here. Party members are still nursing the wounds of the mid-term elections and are riven by divisions over Iraq, immigration and other issues. Members are also beginning to take sides in the contest for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008.

On Friday, committee members are expected to ratify Mr. Bush's selection of Senator Mel Martinez of Florida as the party's new general chairman. Mr. Martinez, who emigrated from Cuba as a child, will be the public face and voice of the party as it tries to reach out to Hispanics and other minorities who have abandoned the party in large numbers in recent years.

Mr. Martinez is expected to win the job by a large margin, but a handful of dissidents plan to vote against him because of his support for liberalized immigration laws.

One Martinez opponent, Randall Pullen, Republican national committeeman from Arizona, said that illegal immigration was the biggest problem in Arizona "and it's not getting any better."

"It's such a huge issue and his past votes are not to the liking of Arizonans in general and the state party, for sure," Mr. Pullen said.

But he said he did not think more than a few national party officials would defy the president and vote against Mr. Martinez.

Mr. Martinez, who appeared at the meeting briefly Thursday morning before returning to the Capitol, said he believed that one of his chief jobs as general chairman would be to try to reconnect with Latino voters, whose support for the Republicans dropped to 29 percent in 2006 from 44 percent in 2004, in large part because many Republican candidates ran explicitly anti-immigrant campaigns.

"The president, in naming me to this position, was saying we need to speak with a voice that speaks to all Americans," Mr. Martinez said. "My job is to make clear that our door is open and we're reaching out to all Americans, speaking to their hopes and aspirations and dreams."

Robert M. Duncan, a longtime Republican lawyer and operative, is expected to be elected the party's chairman, responsible for day-to-day business.

Ed Gillespie, a former Republican Party chairman, attended in his capacity as the new Virginia state party chairman. He acknowledged that the last two months had been painful for the party.

"Fortunately," Mr. Gillespie said, "there are 12 months in a year."

Top Republican Calls For Bipartisanship (WP/AP)

By Liz Sidoti

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Republican Chairman Ken Mehlman on Thursday challenged his GOP brethren to work with Democrats and independents to defeat terrorism and solve the country's problems, a call for bipartisanship at a time of intense political polarization.

"Let's work to put aside our differences on other issues and march together to defeat this common enemy, who threatens our common values _ values that aren't red or blue, but red, white and blue," Mehlman told the Republican National Committee's winter meeting.

"This doesn't mean we abandon our philosophy. But on many issues, we can follow the example of Ronald Reagan, and think broadly about how to work better with Democrats and independents to accomplish our mission," he said.

The remarks, in Mehlman's final major speech as party chairman, were a nod to the new reality on Capitol Hill _ Democrats in charge of both the House and Senate while Republicans continue to control the White House, a potential recipe for legislative gridlock.

"Americans want us to try to work in a bipartisan way to solve problems," Mehlman said, adding that challenges facing the country don't just affect one party.

He said Republicans can reach across the aisle to tackle issues such as an immigration overhaul that "maintains America as a nation of laws and also a welcoming nation for immigrants"; eliminating the deficit; curbing entitlement spending; and achieving universal health care coverage while controlling costs.

"Of course, as we work together, there will be much about the Democrats that we disagree with," he said. "But when we do disagree, let us do so remembering that our political opponents are not our enemies."

Mehlman steps down Friday after a two-year stint as chairman and will be succeeded by Sen. Mel Martinez, R-Fla., and Mike Duncan, the RNC's current general counsel. The two will share the chairmanship duties.

The RNC is expected to vote to approve the two _ the White House's preferred successors to Mehlman _ on Friday. But roughly a dozen RNC members plan to vote against Martinez _ a Cuban-American _ because he supports not only stronger border security but also an eventual path to citizenship for some of the millions of immigrants living in the United States illegally.

In addition, the RNC formally approved its 2008 convention city selection of Minneapolis-St. Paul.

DOJ_NMG_0118963

The 2008 election was a hot topic. Two of the party's top contenders for the presidential nomination _ Arizona Sen. John McCain and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney _ were holding separate receptions and dinners for about 200 activists at two Washington restaurants.

Romney spent part of the day on Capitol Hill courting Republican lawmakers. Their aides, as well as advisers to other GOP presidential aspirants, including former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, mingled with RNC members throughout the day.

Meanwhile, the RNC adopted a resolution urging Congress to support "common sense reform" of the current campaign finance law, more commonly called McCain-Feingold after its co-sponsors _ McCain and Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis.

The resolution says the 2002 law has "made campaign finance regulations unbearably complex, which has deterred political participation by many average citizens and modest sized citizens groups." It also says the law "reduced the effectiveness of political parties."

Identity Of Edwards Home's Buyers Veiled (WP)

By John Solomon And Lois Romano

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

When former North Carolina senator and Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards finally succeeded last month in selling his imposing Georgetown mansion for $5.2 million after it had languished on the market, the names of the buyers were not publicly disclosed.

At the time, Edwards's spokeswoman told reporters that the house had been sold to an unidentified corporation. In reality, the buyers were Paul and Terry Klaassen, according to several sources and confirmed by Edwards's spokeswoman yesterday.

The wealthy founders of the nation's largest assisted-living housing chain for seniors, the Klaassens are currently cooperating with a government inquiry in connection with accounting practices and stock options exercised by them and other company insiders. They are also the focus of legal complaints by some of the same labor unions whose support Edwards has been assiduously courting for his presidential bid.

The grand 18th-century house had lingered on Washington's slowing real estate market for more than 18 months. The Edwardses paid $3.8 million in 2002 for the six-bedroom Federal-style house once owned by socialite Polly Fritchey, and they did substantial renovations. The final sale price was half a million dollars below the asking price but still $1.4 million more than the Edwardses paid four years earlier.

Edwards closed the deal in late December -- the night before he announced his presidential candidacy. Edwards aide Jennifer Palmieri said he left the details to real estate agent W. Ted Gossett. Gossett declined to reveal the Klaassens' identity but said the buyer decided to purchase the mansion as a "surprise Christmas gift" for his wife.

Edwards was told the Klaassens' name "in passing" around the time the offer came in on Dec. 18, Palmieri said last night, but he did not investigate further and had no knowledge of their business until a reporter's inquiry Wednesday. Palmieri said Edwards had not delved into the Klaassens' background: "They left it to be done at arm's length, real estate agent to real estate agent."

Asked about the allegations lodged against the Klaassens by their union stockholders, she added, "He believes all CEOs should follow the law, should protect their shareholders and should protect their workers, and he expects that will happen in this case as well."

The Klaassens declined to comment on the sale.

The paperwork for the sale was handled in such a way that it kept the Klaassens' names off the public deed documents, which show that the buyer was P Street LLC. That limited-liability corporation was created Dec. 22, public records show. Palmieri said the Klaassens used it to purchase the house. Such corporations are frequently created by large real estate buyers to protect themselves from lawsuits by shielding buyers' other personal assets.

Ellen S. Miller, head of the nonpartisan Sunlight Foundation, which studies public officials' real estate deals, said presidential candidates should go the extra mile by determining who they are doing business with, especially when "a substantial amount of cash is changing hands on the eve of his campaign."

The house sale comes at a time when the Securities and Exchange Commission has opened an inquiry into allegations that the Klaassens, founders of Sunrise Senior Living, and other company insiders cashed $32 million in stock options before Sunrise announced in May an accounting problem that caused its stock to dip.

SEC insider-trading notifications show that the Klaassens withdrew $20 million from their company in the year before they bought the house. Some of that money was taken out the week before the company announced an accounting review in May.

A letter to the board from the Service Employees International Union states that after Sunrise announced the accounting change and filing delay in May the stock value plummeted 34 percent and that the cumulative impact of company restatements will reduce net income for 2003 through 2005 by 26 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0118964

The Klaassens sold 600,000 shares, worth about $20 million, in 12 transactions from Dec. 19, 2005, to May 2, 2006 -- the last sales coming one week before the company's accounting troubles came to light and the company's stock plunged, according to public records confirmed by Sunrise sources.

Several stockholders in Sunrise, including two large unions whose support Edwards has courted, have pressed for action.

The 1.8 million-worker SEIU alleges its pension fund lost significant money in its investment in Sunrise, and the union asked for an independent investigator to take over the internal probe of the stock trades and accounting practices. Pension funds for the United Food and Commercial Workers Union filed a class-action lawsuit against Sunrise this week, seeking to recover losses from the stock's fall.

"What went on there is totally inappropriate. It is very clear that very important insiders traded in this stock before it [the accounting problems] became known publicly and before the stock took a hit," said Stephen Abrecht, the SEIU's pension chief. "The pattern of stock-option grants seen here pretty much follows the pattern we've seen in other companies that were hit by corporate-governance issues."

Abrecht said he was unaware of the Edwards home deal and would reserve judgment on it.

Sunrise officials declined to address the house sale, saying the deal was a personal matter of the Klaassens, and said any insider trades were conducted according to securities rules. "We are cooperating fully with the SEC," company spokeswoman Meghan Lublin said yesterday.

Paul Klaassen started Sunrise in the Virginia suburbs in 1981, saying he was inspired by his visits as a child to his grandparents' nursing home in the Netherlands to try to create a more pleasant living opportunity for seniors. Today, Sunrise operates 436 senior communities in more than 37 states as well as Canada, Britain and Germany.

Before public service, Edwards was a successful trial lawyer who in 2003 reported assets between $14 million and $45 million.

Edwards has run into controversy once before on a house sale. In 2002, he reached a deal to sell a Washington house to a U.S. lobbyist for Saudi Arabia and then refused to give back the lobbyist's $100,000 earnest money when the deal collapsed. At the time of the sale, the Saudis were trying to improve their image in Congress after the Sept. 11 attacks, and Edwards was serving on the Senate intelligence committee.

Edwards said he did not know the buyer was a Saudi lobbyist until after the deal had fallen through.

Balanced Priorities (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

Ask yourself which politician you trust more.

On the one side, a president who campaigned on a balanced-budget pledge, then dug the country hundreds of billions of dollars deeper into debt with huge tax cuts and an unpaid-for war, and now promises a balanced budget four years after he leaves office.

On the other side, a former senator who says that while he wants to contain the deficit, he has higher priorities than a perfectly balanced budget, specifically universal health insurance coverage and substantial investments in alternative energy.

That is the choice offered by George W. Bush and John Edwards, the North Carolina Democrat whose left-of-center presidential candidacy will have the salutary effect of challenging Barack Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton to respond with specifics of their own.

Edwards's ideas on the budget have the additional virtue of reminding us that the argument over arriving at a balanced budget by 2012 is largely phony. The real issue, given the burgeoning costs of health care and the retirement of the baby boomers, is how to put policies in place now that achieve sustainable fiscal balance -- meaning low if not zero deficits -- over the next 30 years.

What needs to be done? Hint No. 1: Extending President Bush's tax cuts to eternity will make the long-term problem much worse. Hint No. 2: The hardest part will be how -- simultaneously -- to meet the fiscal need to rein in health costs and the social need to get health insurance to everyone. Hint No. 3: Most Democrats don't like to talk about it, but somebody's taxes are going to have to go up.

Edwards, at least, is willing to say which taxes he would raise to keep the deficit from going through the roof. He would start by eliminating Bush's tax cuts for the top 2 percent of income earners, which he defines roughly as those earning more than $180,000 to $200,000 a year.

DOJ_NMG_0118965

He wants to increase the capital gains tax for an interesting reason: In an interview this week, he argued that it's wrong to tax income from work at a higher rate than income from capital -- an extension of his long-standing theme that the country should not value "wealth over work." He also favors a windfall-profits tax on oil companies.

But since health coverage and "transforming the energy economy of this country" are first on his to-do list, Edwards says he is prepared to disappoint voters who make a balanced budget their top priority.

Edwards deserves points for honesty and for stating the politically difficult truth that both fiscal and social balance demand a comprehensive health-care fix.

But his argument doesn't do much to help Democrats on Capitol Hill who have to govern with Bush for the next two years and produce budgets right now that don't worsen the deficit or deepen inequalities. They also need to do something about long-festering social problems. These have been aggravated by declines in health coverage and in the number of families receiving federal help for child care. There is also evidence that many poor people aren't getting the nutrition assistance they need.

Worse: Having watched a Republican president and a Republican Congress run deficits year after year, Democrats will now endure the false piety of born-again Republican deficit hawks who will say they care about a balanced budget more than anything -- except, of course, their sacred tax cuts for the wealthy.

"It's a huge mess," Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said of trying to pass a decent budget. "It's one of the worst things we have to do." Schumer, vice chairman of the Senate Democratic Conference, argued that even when Democrats propose increased spending for widely shared goals, such as homeland security, Republicans "are going to say 'you're spending too much,' even though it's . . . a mess they created."

Democrats should first do no harm. That means they should resist the temptation of new tax cuts -- including repeal of the alternative minimum tax. The AMT should be fixed, but only as part of comprehensive tax reform that raises revenue. If, as is likely, Bush's path to a "balanced budget" combines tax cuts with freezes or reductions in programs for the needy, Democrats should risk being accused of "class warfare" by pointing out that the president's recipe will produce not fiscal health but further social decline.

And if they want to trump Edwards's candor, Sens. Obama and Clinton should take the lead in showing how they would begin to clean up the mess they hope to inherit in 2008.

Black Leaders Still Sizing Up Obama (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

WASHINGTON — As pastor of the Mt. Zion Missionary Baptist Church in Sumter, S.C., the Rev. James Blassingame feels pride at the thought of electing the country's first black president. But Blassingame, one of his state's most prominent black ministers, will not support Sen. Barack Obama's bid to achieve that historic goal.

Instead, the minister will campaign for one of Obama's white rivals for the Democratic nomination, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina. Obama, he said, is a "stranger" with a faraway home and little-known biography, whereas Edwards — "he's a homeboy."

Other black leaders are wary that the relatively untested senator from Illinois might prove weak in the general election.

"Obama's ambition could bring all of black America down," said state Sen. Robert Ford of South Carolina. "If the Democrats lose control of Congress, we're going to go back and struggle and struggle and struggle."

A supporter of black candidates Shirley Chisholm and the Rev. Jesse Jackson in decades past, Ford said he would choose between Edwards and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) this time around.

Excitement is spreading among Democratic Party activists that Obama might have a shot at winning the White House, but black opinion leaders are still sizing him up — and some are already expressing greater kinship with other candidates.

Half-black and half-white, a U.S. senator for a mere two years, Obama boasts that his life story transcends racial lines. But he is unlikely to win the Democratic nomination without substantial support from black voters. Blacks remain one of the party's most loyal voting blocs. They are expected to make up more than half of the electorate in South Carolina's first-in-the-South primary next year and to play a crucial role in other key states.

Stronger ties

Obama is the only top-tier African American seeking the nomination, but he will have to fight for black votes along with other candidates, some of whom have far stronger ties to black leaders than he does.

Edwards, for example, is expected to have an advantage in his native state of South Carolina, and his pledges to fight poverty and bring troops home from Iraq are popular with black leaders. Clinton, the presumed Democratic front-runner, has decades-old ties with scores of black preachers and civil rights leaders who remain close to her husband, former President Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0118966

A Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg survey in December found that all three were popular among black voters, but that Clinton received the highest marks.

Blassingame speaks fondly of Edwards, who, like the pastor, was born in Seneca, S.C. "I know where he came from, because I came from there," Blassingame said. "I can identify with him, and he can identify with us."

The actor Bill Cosby told the Chicago Defender, a black newspaper, that the country was ready for a black president, but he suggested that Obama might not be the best candidate in the 2008 race.

"I see the African American voter having to study both Hillary Rodham Clinton and Mr. Obama," he wrote in an e-mail that the newspaper quoted Thursday. "It goes without saying that President Clinton and Mrs. Clinton have embraced the African Americans…. By studying both politicians deeply, the African American voter for the first time will not pick a candidate because of any particular idiosyncrasy."

Obama has plenty of room to improve his standing, both with black community leaders and with black voters, who in the end won't necessarily follow the lead of clergy and others. Despite a growing national profile and two best-selling books, recent polls show that he remains unknown to many voters.

Even Blassingame, the South Carolina pastor backing Edwards, said that some of his church members would embrace the possibility that their votes could make history and would support Obama once he campaigned in the state's primary election.

Still, some black leaders just don't think Obama can win a general election, and they want to put their support somewhere else. Others worry about his lack of experience, particularly on foreign policy.

"It's nothing against Obama, but we have to weigh all those factors," said David Mack, a South Carolina state legislator and former chairman of the state's black legislative caucus, who is backing Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.).

Ford, the state senator, said Obama "wouldn't have a snowball's chance in hell of winning one state" in a general election. He pointed to the 2006 Senate campaign in Tennessee, in which a black Democrat lost to a white Republican after a racially tinged campaign ad.

"I'm just being real," Ford said.

Relative rookie

As a rookie on the national stage, Obama does not have an established nationwide network of fundraising and personal connections. And whereas the traditional black leaders in Democratic Party politics are identified by their connections to the old civil rights struggles of the South and of Northern cities, Obama was raised by a white mother in Hawaii and Indonesia. His ties to the black church and to the urban struggles of many blacks were solidified only when he moved to Chicago after college.

A spokesman for Obama said Thursday that the senator's voter-outreach effort was just beginning. Still, there are signs that he has embarked on a quiet campaign to woo influential black leaders.

He placed a call this week to Rep. James E. Clyburn, the third-ranking Democrat in the House and one of the most powerful black politicians in South Carolina. Obama also addressed a breakfast in Chicago honoring the late civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr., hosted by Jackson. Appearing at a black church in a poor suburb of Chicago, he offered hints that he viewed his political rise as a natural extension of King's dream.

"The torch has been passed to this generation, but we haven't always taken it up," Obama said in an account on the WBBM CBS2 television station. "We haven't pushed the boundaries of what is possible. We have much more work to do."

Obama received standing ovations that day.

Jackson has stopped short of endorsing Obama, but he told CNN on Thursday that he probably would back him. "All of my heart leans toward Barack," he said. But he added that Obama would have to compete for the black vote. "I don't think it will be hostile, or nasty, but it will be a very competitive campaign."

While he is talking to the black voters and leaders, Obama is making sure his public image rests on a broad foundation. A new biographical video, released this week on Obama's website, features several images of him working with blacks as a civil rights lawyer and community activist. But equally prominent images show him speaking intently with white constituents. Two people offer testimonials of their admiration for the senator: a white woman and a man who appears to be Latino.

If nothing else, Clyburn said in an interview, Obama's candidacy would undercut the old "monolithic notion" that blacks will automatically vote for a black presidential candidate, or that whites will never do so.

"I'm surprised at the number of African Americans I talk to who are just very much for Edwards," Clyburn said. "I'm also surprised at the number of well-heeled, wealthy white South Carolinians who tell me they're for Obama."

Obama formed an exploratory committee Tuesday, a step toward formally entering the presidential race, and says that on Feb. 10 he will announce a final decision on whether to run. Few doubt he intends to mount a campaign.

Rice Aims For Talks With Israeli, Palestinian Leaders By Mid-February (AFP)

By Sylvie Lanteaume

DOJ_NMG_0118967

AFP, January 19, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she hoped to meet Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas by February 15 in a bid to revive the peace process.

"The next couple of weeks will be pretty intensive on the diplomatic front," Rice told reporters traveling with her to London before meeting with British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Rice held talks with Blair late Thursday, Downing Street said.

But the talks here risked being clouded by an outspoken attack on Washington by one of Blair's cabinet ministers, Northern Ireland Secretary Peter Hain, who blasted Washington's "failed" foreign policy in a newspaper interview.

On February 2 Rice will host talks with her counterparts from Russia and the European Union and UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon to agree steps on how to revive the peace process. The four represent the Middle East quartet.

The following week Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Abul Gheit will travel to the United States with Egyptian intelligence chief Omar Suleiman. Other officials from the region could also travel to Washington, Rice said.

David Welch, the US State Department's top Middle East envoy, and Elliott Abrams, the White House national security adviser on the Middle East, will then travel to the region to prepare for informal trilateral talks.

Rice announced Monday such talks would take place soon, without specifiying a date.

"I plan to try to go back in the first half of February," Rice said.

Rice arrived from Germany after talks with Chancellor Angela Merkel earlier in the day before heading home.

Her spokesman Sean McCormack said here that Rice "intends to brief both (Blair and Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett) on her trip to the Middle East and will also discuss the next diplomatic steps to help move the process forward."

He expected they will also discuss Iran, Afghanistan, and other issues such as Sudan.

During her stop in Berlin, Rice and Merkel focused their talks on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, seen as crucial for the stability of the whole region.

"There is no doubt that there could be a very important effect on the entire region if we are able to make progress on Middle East peace," said Rice before leaving the German capital.

Germany, as the current EU president, has made revitalizing the quartet one of its priorities. It held its last full meeting in September.

The chief US diplomat came to Berlin after a six-country Middle East tour during which she announced she would hold a summit with Olmert and Abbas within a month.

Rice said it would take "a few weeks" to organize the summit but added Thursday that both the Israelis and Palestinians were ready to work toward a lasting solution.

The London talks risked being clouded by Hain's comments.

"The neo-con mission has failed," Hain told the New Statesman left-of-centre weekly. "It's not only failed to provide a coherent international policy, it's failed wherever it's been tried," he said.

There was no immediate comment by Blair's Downing Street office on his minister's comments.

But they run clearly counter to the British leader's strongly pro-Washington stance.

Hain's comments were widely interpreted in London in the context of the upcoming race to succeed the British prime minister, who is due to stand down before September.

The Northern Ireland secretary is expected to run for Deputy Prime Minister John Prescott's job, and his comments savaging Washington will play well to traditional Labour Party members, frustrated at Blair's cosiness with Bush.

Hain also called openly for Blair's New Labour to realign itself with the US Democrats, following the years of Blair's close ties with Bush's Republicans.

Rice also said on Thursday she was "sorry" that Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki was offended by her comments that his government was "on borrowed time", blaming translation problems.

"I am sorry if he took offense. I did not mean any offense," she told reporters in London.

Rice Says Time Is Ripe For New Mideast Peace Push (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, January 19, 2007

LONDON — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday that she will return to the Middle East early next month to help launch a new Palestinian-Israeli peace process.

She said conditions were better for a deal now than they were six years ago when President Bush first took office.

Rice was in Britain after wrapping up a trip to the Middle East designed to restart the process and to persuade Arab countries to support U.S. policy in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0118968

VIDEO: Secretary looks for support in Europe

Rice has said a peace agreement between Israelis and Palestinians would help the U.S. position in the region because of the priority America's Arab allies place on creation of a Palestinian state.

The "underlying circumstances are better now" for reaching an agreement, she said. She cited the removal of Saddam Hussein in Iraq and greater Israeli willingness to cede land to the Palestinians.

The Bush administration has said Saddam's ouster removed a threat to Israel and would begin a process that would lead to the spread of democracy and stability in the region.

However, both Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas — with whom Rice plans a three-way discussion next month — are weaker than their predecessors. That makes reaching a peace agreement more difficult.

"Leadership on both sides (of the Palestinian-Israeli dispute) is mediocre and lacking in imagination," said Zbigniew Brzezinski, who was national security adviser to President Carter when Carter mediated peace between Israel and Egypt.

Olmert is facing sharp criticism in his country for how the military performed in last summer's war with Hezbollah in Lebanon. An independent commission is examining the management of the war. A recent poll by the Haaretz newspaper found only 14% of Israelis have confidence in Olmert's leadership.

The Palestinian leadership, meanwhile, is divided. Abbas faces competition from Hamas, which won parliamentary elections a year ago. Hamas, designated a terrorist group by the United States, Israel and European Union, has clashed with Abbas' party, Fatah.

During the Middle East trip, Rice won qualified Arab support for the U.S. strategy of bolstering Iraq's fragile government with 21,500 additional U.S. troops.

Some of those same Arab leaders expressed worries, however, that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, would not crack down on Shiite militias, which have been targeting Sunnis in Iraq. Saud al-Faisal, the Saudi foreign minister, was among those questioning al-Maliki's ability to treat Iraq Sunnis and Shiites fairly.

On Thursday, Al-Maliki said more than 400 fighters from a powerful Shiite militia had been arrested. Al-Maliki has said he will take on militias even if they are among his own political supporters.

The administration has been encouraging al-Maliki to make concessions to Sunnis and take other political action to reduce violence. Rice apologized for a remark she made before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last week in which she said al-Maliki's government was on "borrowed time."

The Iraqi prime minister criticized Rice Wednesday, saying the comment "boosted the morale of terrorists." Rice said that al-Maliki had misinterpreted the remark, perhaps because of a poor translation, and that the two governments "want the same thing" — a crackdown on sectarian violence. "I'm sorry that he took offense," she said.

Rice Has Loose Agenda For Mideast Talks (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, January 19, 2007

Israel and the Palestinians can pick any agenda they want for a preliminary peacemaking summit with the United States, but it is too early to tackle the toughest issues, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday.

"We're not yet at the point where I think we can determine what we would do about formal negotiations, when and if" they can occur, Rice said at the close of a week's trip to the Middle East and Europe. "It's really a time to try to get the parties into more of a confidence-building phase and we'll see what comes after that."

Rice said her three-way meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas probably would take place in the Middle East in the first half of February.

Speaking to reporters traveling with her, Rice said that session will follow a gathering in Washington of the international sponsors of a dormant, step-by-step peace plan called the "road map" that was to have led to Palestinian statehood by 2005.

She acknowledged that the 2003 plan's requirements had become something of an obstacle in restarting talks between the two sides, but she said it remains the guideline.

"Everybody understands the obligations in it, but we'd gotten to a place that it was stalled," Rice said, "because if they weren't making progress on the first phase of the road map, then you couldn't talk about the end of the road map and what might lead to the establishment of a Palestinian state."

Rice said her talks with both leaders last weekend "broke through that." Olmert and Abbas agreed to the three-way meeting, a symbolic advancement both of their relationship and the involvement of traditional peace broker Washington.

Olmert and Abbas are both politically compromised: Olmert by last summer's disappointing war in Lebanon and allegations of political corruption in his ranks; Abbas by his yearlong internal power struggle with Hamas radicals.

Rice hopes the meeting will be part of a wider effort to support Abbas in that fight.

DOJ_NMG_0118969

Both Abbas and Olmert inherited the 2003 plan agreed to by others. U.S. officials say it may be time to fine-tune some requirements in the plan, and that an agreement between Abbas and Olmert about how to do that could be a first step toward larger accords.

"It really should be up to them to put anything on the agenda that they'd like," Rice said, but she made clear that she hopes to discuss more than the outlines or borders of an eventual Palestinian state.

"There's always been a lot of concern about what the borders of the state would be, but there wasn't much attention given to its internal composition — its democratic processes, its institutions," Rice said. She added that Abbas is interested in those subjects.

Assessing he prospects for progress on the Palestinian questions, the chief U.S. diplomat met in Berlin and London with European leaders who are keenly interested in an issue with wide public appeal.

In between, Rice tried to sell skeptical Arab governments on the rationale for President Bush's strategy in Iraq.

Some Arabs saw the tasks as related.

"Every time the Americans are in trouble in Iraq, they remember that Arabs have a cause named Palestine," Saudi columnist Dawoud al-Shriyan wrote in the Saudi-owned Al-Hayat newspaper. "Therefore, they float some statements to create the impression that they continue their efforts in the peace process."

Rice briefed Arab leaders and diplomats about the Bush plan at stops in Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, arguing in part that Western-leaning or secular Arab states have much to lose if Iraq fails. A large part of that appeal involves the growing fears among Sunni Arab states that Shiite Iran is already gaining influence in Iraq and beyond.

In Kuwait, Rice sat down with foreign ministers from eight Arab states, including the three U.S.-allied heavyweights Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia. The grouping encouraged by the United States excludes Iran and fellow U.S. outcast Syria, but Rice has avoided comment on the perception that she is forging an anti-Iranian alliance.

Rice's second in command planned another round of diplomatic calls in the region next week.

Some Arab media depicted Rice's visit as a failure. "The whole jet-setting trip turned out to be yet another stage-managed, futile diplomatic exercise. ... In effect, Rice returns to Washington empty-handed with a lot of false promises rather than optimism," the Doha, Qatar-based Peninsula newspaper wrote in editorial.

Jordanian analyst Labib Kamhawi said that besides their doubts over the plan itself, Arab leaders had a difficult time throwing support behind it "when there has been a total failure in Iraq and the Palestinian territories with no attempt to soften the anger that is seething in the Arab and Muslim countries."

Perhaps Thinking Of Legacy, Bush Has Rice On The Move (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 18 — Two years from the end of his second term, President Bush — perhaps with his legacy in mind — sent his secretary of state to try to restart moribund peace talks between Israelis and Palestinians and to create a foundation of Muslim support for the administration's new strategy in Iraq.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice flies home on Friday, after a quick trip across the Middle East and Europe, with just enough progress to shield herself from criticism that the trip was a bust. The Palestinian president and the Israeli prime minister promised to join her for three-way talks within a month, with a meeting in Washington in advance by the so-called quartet — the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations — that has been trying to promote Middle East peace.

And powerful Arab states gave their blessing, however reserved, to Mr. Bush's initiatives to try to snatch victory from the growing chaos that is Iraq — even though these wealthy nations committed nothing of their own to that effort.

Throughout a week of long flights and long nights of negotiations, Ms. Rice carried the message that the moment was right for progress and that the Bush administration's accelerated efforts could succeed in a region where past American presidents, Democratic and Republican, also sought to burnish their late-term legacies, but usually fell short.

With chaos across the region offering a loud and bloody counterpoint to her argument, Ms. Rice cited an oft-quoted Chinese aphorism that crisis and opportunity are a couple. But it is clear that crisis currently rules.

Ms. Rice's Israeli and Palestinian negotiating partners have been weakened — the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, by the victory a year ago of the militant group Hamas in legislative elections, and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel by perceptions that the war with Hezbollah militants in Lebanon during the summer was bungled.

So even if Ms. Rice has the vision to peer through the fog of regional conflict and see what she labeled a "political horizon" for Israelis and Palestinians, her Israeli and Palestinian partners may not be around long enough to move in that direction with her.

DOJ_NMG_0118970

(Ms. Rice, a scholar of Soviet affairs, is no doubt aware of the Brezhnev-era joke in which a Kremlin party leader intones, "Comrades, global Communism is on the horizon," to which a reply is whispered from the back of the hall, "Doesn't the horizon always move away exactly as fast as you move toward it?")

The White House, of course, is also struggling. Mr. Bush's new plan for Iraq is meeting deep resistance from Democrats in Congress and even from the Iraqi prime minister. In a political sense, though, the opposition could help the administration lay blame for any ultimate failure in Iraq far from the White House.

Administration officials already contend that past errors in setting troop levels were made by generals, not the White House; that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki may have neither the ability nor the will to quash sectarian militias and forge a unity government; and that the Democrats on Capitol Hill are not willing to give their plan a chance.

Ms. Rice spoke at length on this trip about historical determinism, about how great presidents and prime ministers divined the moment when geopolitical stars aligned, and rushed in then to take advantage.

"I tend to place a lot of emphasis on the fact that people see their interests differently now than they did 5 years ago or 10 years ago," she said. "They see their interests less as continuing or having maximalist positions about this conflict and are more concerned about the kind of broad strategic picture."

She said that the Israeli-Hezbollah conflict in Lebanon "was a major contributor to that shift in alignment" and that it made a Middle East peace deal more promising, and that toppling Saddam Hussein, despite the current violence within Iraq, removed what she called an "eastern front" against the Israelis.

Looking more broadly across the region, in particular to the nations bordering Iraq and along the Persian Gulf, Ms. Rice said she was trying to construct a geopolitical framework of moderate Sunni and Shiites into a stronger, and more active, alliance against extremist Sunni and Shiite states — meaning Syria and Iran.

But tensions emerge. America's Muslim allies in the region do not like being called moderate, as they see themselves as fervent in their religious belief, though mainstream, perhaps, in their view of the world. There are also divisions over how and whether to negotiate with Iran.

"There's still a tendency to see these things in Sunni-Shia terms," Ms. Rice said. "But the Middle East is going to have to overcome that." She added that neighboring Sunni-led Arab states should understand that Iraq's Shiite-led government primarily saw itself as Arab and that the only way it would ally itself with Iran, which is Shiite but not Arab, would be "if people deny the Shia-led Iraq a place in the Arab world."

Some critics have said that the Iraq war has sidetracked, or even derailed, the Bush administration's efforts for a Middle East peace deal and that the administration's renewed focus on the region is an effort to change the channel from images of Iraq as the Bush administration enters its final two years.

But Ms. Rice said her efforts had nothing to do with legacy building.

"I don't think about it in terms of my reputation," Ms. Rice said. "I am going to be concerned about what we can get done, when, and how."

Rice Highlights Opportunities After Setbacks On Mideast Trip (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 19, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 18 -- As Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice flew to Europe on Wednesday after four days of talks in the Middle East, her Boeing 757 jet passed high over Baghdad. On a cloudless day at 37,000 feet, the city seemed sparkling and calm; the U.S. military presence and the sectarian violence below could only be imagined.

The moment was an apt metaphor for Rice's latest -- and her 12th -- visit to the region in the two years she has been the nation's top diplomat.

Through much of her trip, she seemed to cruise at a very high altitude as she pitched President Bush's new plan for Iraq, tried to revive peace talks between the Israelis and the Palestinians and sought to organize an Arab coalition against "violent extremists" such as Iran. But her results after six stops on the ground in the Middle East did not match her lofty rhetoric.

Rice announced that she had arranged a three-way meeting to discuss the contours of a Palestinian state, sidestepping questions about the political weakness of the Israeli and Palestinian leaders who would make a deal. She found generally tepid support from Arab leaders in the region for Bush's proposed military buildup in Iraq. She shrugged off a request from the emir of Kuwait that the United States engage directly with Iran and Syria to prevent the Iraqi conflict from spilling over its borders.

Even so, Rice told reporters traveling with her that, despite the day-to-day headaches and setbacks, she thinks that conditions are right now for a fundamental reordering of the Middle East.

"You aren't going to be successful as a diplomat if you don't understand the strategic context in which you are actually negotiating," she said Tuesday. "It is not deal-making. It's not. There are a set of underlying relationships, underlying balance of power, leverage on different sides, and you have to recognize when you are in a position to then, on top of that, find a solution given the underlying balance."

Under Rice's formulation, the time is not ripe to deal directly with Iran and Syria, both of which are causing problems in Iraq, because they have not indicated they are ready to change their behavior. While the Shiite-dominated Iraqi government is trying to build ties to Iran, which Rice said she does not oppose, the administration is ratcheting up the pressure, sending a second aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf. The United States has negotiated with seemingly implacable adversaries in the past -- the Soviet Union and Serbia's Slobodan Milosevic among them -- but Rice rejects those historical analogies as irrelevant.

By contrast, Rice said she thinks the opportunities for Middle East peace have suddenly turned brighter, even though Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas has struggled against the Hamas movement, which has day-to-day control of the Palestinian government and which remains committed to Israel's destruction. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert also faces political peril from a financial scandal and lingering controversy over last summer's war between Israel and the Lebanese Shiite group Hezbollah.

"A lot has happened in the Middle East in the last several years, and a lot has clarified in the Middle East," Rice told reporters traveling with her after she arrived here Thursday, on the last stop of her week-long trip, for meetings with British officials.

Rice argues that there is a constellation of forces, such as growing fear of extremist groups by "mainstream" Arabs in the wake of the Lebanon war, that now gives historical antagonists such as Saudi Arabia and Israel common strategic objectives.

"With that shift in alignment, I think you now have a chance to perhaps make progress on this issue in ways that you didn't before," Rice said.

As a result, Rice on this trip shifted six years of Bush administration policy to encourage Olmert and Abbas to begin discussing vexing "endgame" issues, such as the shape of a Palestinian state, the status of Jerusalem and the claim of Palestinian refugees, as well as their descendants, of a right to return to homes in Israel that they fled or were forced to flee in 1948.

The administration of President Bill Clinton had grappled with such topics, but the Bush White House previously argued that they could not be raised until a series of incremental confidence-building measures had been addressed.

The Arab media was highly skeptical of Rice's efforts. The Arab News, a Saudi newspaper, asked the day after she left Riyadh, "To what extent is Rice just another siren, mesmerizing the Middle East with pleasing songs while dragging it onto the rocks of fresh conflict because of her own country's incompetence?"

At one point, Rice said that the difficult circumstances in the Middle East could represent opportunity. "I don't read Chinese but I am told that the Chinese character for crisis is wei-ji, which means both danger and opportunity," she said in Riyadh. "And I think that states it very well. We'll try to maximize the opportunity."

But Victor H. Mair, a professor of Chinese at the University of Pennsylvania, has written on the Web site http://pinyin.info, a guide to the Chinese language, that "a whole industry of pundits and therapists has grown up around this one grossly inaccurate formulation." He said the character "ji" actually means "incipient moment" or a "crucial point." Thus, he said, a wei-ji "is indeed a genuine crisis, a dangerous moment, a time when things start to go awry."

How Rice Uses History Lessons (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, January 19, 2007

LONDON -- U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice often calls herself "a student of history." And increasingly, she is using history -- or her chosen slice of it -- both to explain and justify the Bush administration's Middle East policy.

When Ms. Rice talks about the challenges the U.S. faces across the Mideast, she points, somewhat surprisingly, to Europe after World War II and to the West's decades-long face-off against the Soviet Union, which happens to be her area of expertise. It is a penchant that has scholars scratching their heads.

Citing the Cold War's denouement as context for today's bloodshed and tumult may seem far-fetched to some. But Ms. Rice uses the analogy both to beg for patience -- the Cold War, after all, consumed decades -- and to try to elucidate a diplomatic strategy that is increasingly assailed for its lack of assertiveness.

While traveling this week through the Middle East and Europe, Ms. Rice engaged in several long historical tutorials with reporters in tow. Her point in referring back to the Cold War, she said, isn't to argue that history repeats itself or that the analogy is exact.

"The reason that I cite some of these other times, like Europe, is that it is so clear in everybody's mind that the United States and its allies came out victorious at the end of the Cold War," she said in Kuwait. "But if you...look at the events that ultimately lead to that, you would have thought that this was failing every single day between 1945-1946 and probably 1987 or 1988."

Her contention is while things may look bad now in Iraq and elsewhere in the region, history is on the administration's side. She pushed a similar argument to reporters last month. The Middle East is "moving toward something that I am quite certain will not have a full resolution and that you will not be able to fully judge for decades," she said.

Critics dismiss Ms. Rice's references to the Cold War as both convenient and a sign of her limited frame of reference. The challenges facing Europe in 1946, they say, bear little similarity to those of the Middle East in the 21st century.

"The administration's reservoir of historical analogies seems limited to the 1914-1991 period. And it's all about Europe," said Adam Garfinkle, a former Rice speechwriter who edits the foreign-policy journal The American Interest. "No one in a senior position in this administration seems to have even the vaguest notion of modern Middle Eastern history."

When asked this week about what moments in Arab history inform her thinking, Ms. Rice said she had read about "the British experience" in Mesopotamia in the 1920s, which led to the founding of modern Iraq and the withdrawal of British forces. "I know a number of things that went right, and I know the things that went wrong," she said.

But Ms. Rice cleaves to her Cold War history to try to drive home a bigger point about the administration's diplomatic approach, which is seen by many as detached and lacking urgency. For six years, the administration has stayed out of direct efforts to push a peace accord between Israel and the Palestinians. Today, despite widespread calls to talk with Iran and Syria, Ms. Rice rejects such action as ill-timed.

She tends to portray events, particularly the clash between what she calls "moderation" and "extremism" in the Middle East, as driven by huge, almost inevitable forces that make diplomacy impractical, or even irrelevant. Critics say such a view has made Washington's top diplomat less flexible in policy making -- and less adept in old-style negotiation and hand-holding, whose results also can be hard to quantify in the short term.

Those who clamor for sitting down with Syria and Iran are out of touch with what Ms. Rice calls "the underlying forces."

"There's a tendency to think about diplomacy as something that is done untethered to the conditions underlying it or the balance underlying it," she said. "In fact, that's not the way that it works. You aren't going to be successful as a diplomat if you don't understand the strategic context in which you are actually negotiating. It is not deal-making."

On this trip, which wrapped up in London, Ms. Rice has portrayed her main mission as firming up what she calls "a new alignment" of moderate states allied with the U.S. to push back against Iran. Ms. Rice also has shown a new interest in trying to promote an Arab peace deal with Israel after years of inactivity.

Four years ago, the administration theorized that the U.S. invasion would spawn a democratic Iraq, on good terms with Israel, that would break the regional mold and compel erstwhile enemies to end hostility toward the Israelis. Now, Ms. Rice says it is the Iranian ascent wrought by the war that makes Arab states more open to negotiations.

To her thinking, there has been a shift in underlying forces -- as opposed to events the U.S. might have influenced. Again, she points to a favorite historical analogy: the reunification of Germany. "If you had tried to negotiate German unification for any period of time until 1990, you would have not been able to do it because the underlying circumstances were not there," she said.

Diplomacy Is Deal-making (LAT)

By Aaron David Miller

The Los Angeles Times, January 19, 2007

HAVING WORKED for six secretaries of State on Arab-Israeli negotiations, I nearly fell off my chair the other day when I read Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's comment to reporters that diplomacy wasn't about making deals.

Maybe "making deals" is too glib a phrase for her, but it's precisely what effective American diplomacy in the Middle East is mostly about. Her legacy may well be judged by that standard.

The secretary is absolutely correct in asserting, as she did, that diplomacy is more than deal making. Success or failure depends on a good reading of the circumstances and on a strategic grasp of whether and when to engage as a mediator. There's a big difference between taking the initiative and wanting a U.S. initiative. This is particularly true in the Arab-Israeli arena, where changing regional conditions have preceded every major breakthrough.

Henry Kissinger's successful "disengagement" diplomacy — separating Syrian, Israeli and Egyptian forces in the early 1970s — followed the 1973 war, which had overturned every major assumption of U.S. policy and forced the combatants to consider negotiations. Jimmy Carter's success in brokering Egyptian-Israeli peace flowed from Anwar Sadat's historic trip to Jerusalem; and Jim Baker's success in putting together the 1991 Madrid peace conference grew out of the Persian Gulf War and the collapse of the Soviet Union.

Shifting tectonic plates, however, is a necessary but not sufficient condition for diplomatic achievement. In these cases, what was also required was Washington's willingness and determination to broker a deal.

Kissinger's success, for example, required 18 months of listening to Arab and Israeli grievances, coaxing, reassuring them, and balancing their interests. His 34-day shuttle to consummate the agreement between Israel and Syria is the longest time a secretary of State has spent outside the United States on a diplomatic mission, with the exception of Robert Lansing at the Versailles peace conference.

The issue today, of course, is not what to do when you're faced with an obvious historic opportunity but how to make progress on a smaller scale. President Clinton faced such a situation in 1996. He confronted the challenge of a tough Israeli prime minister and a suspicious PLO chairman who had fundamentally different views on peace and no trust or confidence in the process. In a display of masterful deal making, Clinton spent more than a week pulling and pushing Yasser Arafat and Benjamin Netanyahu into an agreement that was hardly perfect but did save lives and kept the process going. That summit was preceded by nine months of nonstop stage-setting by Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and her team.

Rice faces a tougher situation . Weak Israeli and Palestinian leaders, non-state actors (such as Hamas and Hezbollah) and Iranian troublemaking have produced a volatile mix. She's also constrained by an administration that, in the face of 9/11, the war on terror, the Iranian challenge and the battle between Islamist radicals and moderates, views diplomacy as ineffective.

Yet now is precisely the time to exercise that instrument of American power. The situation between Israelis and Palestinians, as hopeless as it appears, cries out for serious American attention. A solution to their conflict won't fix Iraq or end the threat of radical Islam, but it will enhance our credibility, strengthen our friends and reduce the opportunities for our enemies to mobilize Arabs and Muslims against us.

Rice's decision to make the Israeli-Palestinian conflict a priority is a good beginning. To have any chance of succeeding, the administration will have to change its software, develop a sustained two-year effort and a strategy that — for both sides — is balanced, tough and reassuring. In the end, it will require Rice to accept the obvious fact that diplomacy — and its hundreds of hours of problem solving — is really about making deals after all.

Report: Cheney Rejected Iran Concessions (AP)

AP, January 19, 2007

An Iranian offer to help the United States stabilize Iraq and end its military support for Hezbollah and Hamas was rejected by Vice President Dick Cheney in 2003, a former top State Department official told the British Broadcasting Corp.

The U.S. State Department was open to the offer, which came in an unsigned letter sent shortly after the American invasion of Iraq, Lawrence Wilkerson, former Secretary of State Colin Powell's chief of staff, told BBC's Newsnight in a program broadcast Wednesday night. But, Wilkerson said, Cheney vetoed the deal.

"We thought it was a very propitious moment" to strike a deal, Wilkerson said. "But as soon as it got to the White House, and as soon as it got to the vice president's office, the old mantra of 'We don't talk to evil' ... reasserted itself."

A spokesman for the State Department said Thursday he wasn't aware of any letter from the Iranians to the U.S. government in 2003.

"Far as I know, there's never been an offer from the Iranian Government on those kinds of concerns," said Tom Casey, the state department's deputy spokesman.

Wilkerson said that, in return for its cooperation, Tehran asked Washington to lift sanctions and to dismantle the Mujahedeen Khalq, an Iranian opposition group which has bases in Iraq.

Iran also offered to increase the transparency of its nuclear program, according to Wilkerson.

Wilkerson has been a frequent critic of the Bush administration in general and Cheney in particular, holding the vice president responsible for the mistreatment of detainees and the failure of Iraq's postwar planning.

Iran Takes Tough Stand Over Nuclear Row (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, January 19, 2007

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad lashed out at a U.S. military buildup in the Gulf, saying Thursday that Iran is ready for any possibility in the standoff over its nuclear program.

The president made clear he was not backing down in his tough rhetoric toward the United States, despite criticism at home. Conservatives and reformists alike have openly challenged Ahmadinejad's nuclear diplomacy tactics, many saying his fiery anti-Western remarks are doing more harm than good.

Ahmadinejad said their calls for compromise echo "the words of the enemy."

At the same time, Ahmadinejad's top national security official, Ali Larijani, sharply denounced U.S. policy in Iraq, saying Washington is fueling Shiite-Sunni hatred.

DOJ_NMG_0118974

Washington has accused Iran of backing militants fueling Iraq's violence, increasing tensions amid the dispute over Iran's nuclear program, which the U.S. says aims to produce nuclear weapons.

The United States sent an aircraft carrier to the Gulf this week — the second to deploy in the region — a buildup that Defense Secretary Robert Gates said was intended to impress on Iran that the four-year war in Iraq has not made America vulnerable.

In an apparent reaction to the deployment, Ahmadinejad vowed Thursday that Iran would not back down over its nuclear program, which Tehran says is being developed only to produce energy.

"Today, with the grace of God, we have gone through the arduous passes and we are ready for anything in this path," state-run television quoted the Iranian leader as saying.

The U.N. Security Council recently imposed limited sanctions to punish Iran for defying a resolution demanding that it suspend uranium enrichment, a process that can produce material to fuel nuclear reactors or, at purer concentrations, the core of nuclear weapons.

Amid growing domestic questioning, two Iranian newspapers have pointedly criticized the president's handling of the nuclear issue.

"Your language is so offensive and contains not very nice words that inculcates that the nuclear issue is being dealt with a sort of stubbornness," the conservative paper Jomhuri-e-Eslami said in a recent editorial.

Last Saturday, the reformist newspaper Aftab-e-Yazb said the nuclear policy was hurting Iran's ability to gain nuclear technology. It added: "Some current leaders act as if any person criticizing (the government) is an agent of the enemy."

In Paris, the head of the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency, Mohamed ElBaradei, said he was concerned the sanctions could escalate Iran's standoff with Western powers.

"I don't think sanctions will resolve the issue ... Sanctions in my view could lead to escalation on both sides," he warned.

ElBaradei said the pressure has failed to break a consensus in Iran that the oil-rich nation needs to master the complex process of uranium enrichment. Iran this week said it is moving toward large-scale enrichment involving 3,000 centrifuges, which spin uranium gas into enriched material.

A diplomat and a U.N. official in Vienna said Thursday that much, but not all, of the hardware needed for the installation of the centrifuges was now in place at the Natanz facility designated to house Tehran's industrial-scale enrichment program.

The two — who requested anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss confidential information — emphasized that the facility had been ready for some time, and there was no sign that actual work on putting in the centrifuges would begin at any particular date.

ElBaradei called for a resumption of talks with Tehran, including the possibility of a French negotiator. "My worry right now is that each side is sticking to its guns," the International Atomic Energy Agency chief said. "We need someone to reach out."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said this week that now is not the time for the United States to talk to Iran, adding that Tehran does not appear ready to accept a conditional U.S. offer to join European talks over its nuclear program.

ElBaradei warned that only applying pressure could prompt the Islamic republic to follow the path of North Korea, which kicked out U.N. inspectors and pulled out of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty in 2003 and then conducted its first nuclear weapons test last October.

"My priority is to keep Iran inside the system," he said.

An Iranian Foreign Ministry delegation arrived in North Korea on Thursday, the communist nation's media reported. North Korea, like Iran, is facing intense international pressure to give up its nuclear weapons programs.

Larijani, the top national security official, kept up criticism of the United States in an interview with journalists from several Lebanese papers.

Larijani, who was in Lebanon on a tour of Arab nations seeking to build alliances with Iran, accused Washington of "stirring up Sunni-Shiite disputes" and "inciting Arab-Iranian discord."

The papers said Larijani was "encouraged" by his visit to Saudi Arabia — a pro-American, predominantly Sunni Arab kingdom considered a rival of overwhelmingly Shiite Persian Iran.

Ahmadinejad said he had sent a message to Saudi King Abdullah proposing the countries cooperate in trying to ease the violence in Iraq — a message apparently delivered by Larijani. Saudi officials have not commented on the message.

Gates Says U.S. Has Few Options To Halt Iran's Atomic Plans (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 19, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0118975

MANAMA, Bahrain, Jan. 18 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates on Thursday played down the possibility of American military action against Iran but said it was not the right time for diplomatic engagement, either.

"Frankly, right at this moment there's really nothing the Iranians want from us, and so in any negotiation right now we would be the supplicant," Mr. Gates told reporters after talks with allies in the Persian Gulf.

His comments were a blunt acknowledgment that the Bush administration, despite its increasingly tough comments toward Iran in recent weeks, has limited options to compel its leaders to halt their nuclear program or to play a more supportive role in Iraq.

Mr. Gates said he told the emir of Qatar, Sheik Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani, over lunch on Thursday "that the Iranians were being very aggressive" because they believed that "they have the United States at some disadvantage because of the situation in Iraq."

He said he had told the emir that the United States did not intend to retreat from its commitments to defend the region's Sunni Arab governments.

In meetings late Wednesday with King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia, Mr. Gates said the United States viewed Iraq, despite the close ties between some in its Shiite-dominated government and Shiite Iran, as a bulwark against Tehran, said a senior Defense Department official.

"Our Arab friends tend to see Iraq in the context of the new challenge from Iran," the official said. "That's clearly the Saudi perspective. So the secretary was able to reassure them that we want an Iraq that is a barrier against Iranian expansionism."

Mr. Gates also met with Bahrain's leader, King Hamad bin Isa al-Khalifa, on Thursday night.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran said Thursday that Iran was prepared for anything in the standoff with the West over its nuclear program, which Iran says is for peaceful energy purposes and the United States contends is aimed at producing nuclear weapons.

"Today, with the grace of God, we have gone through the arduous passes and we are ready for anything in this path," Iran's state-run television quoted Mr. Ahmadinejad as saying, The Associated Press reported.

He was apparently referring to the United Nations decision to impose sanctions on Iran for its nuclear activities and to the American decision to move a second aircraft carrier, the John C. Stennis, to the Persian Gulf and to extend deployments of Patriot antimissile defense systems in Kuwait and Qatar.

Commodore Keith Winstanley of Britain, who is second in command of coalition naval forces in the region, told reporters at a briefing on Thursday that the carrier deployment should not be seen entirely as a move aimed at intimidating Iran, but he added, "I'm sure there's a message there for Iran."

Mr. Gates, who also met with the top American Navy and Air Force commanders in the region, said the deployments were meant to show that, for all its problems in Iraq, the United States could still fulfill its security commitments in the Persian Gulf.

He added: "Nobody wants another conflict in this region. My view is that there are many courses of actions available that do not involve a conflict with Iran. There is no need for that."

He acknowledged that the United States' troubles stabilizing Iraq had given Iran an opportunity to seek to expand its influence in the region but that the Iranians were "overplaying their hand."

Even though Iran is worrying its neighbors, he said, he disagreed with critics, including the Iraq Study Group, who have called for the Bush administration to hold talks with Iran and enlist its support in stabilizing Iraq. Mr. Gates had been a member of the group before resigning to become defense secretary.

Perhaps seeking leverage, the White House late last year approved a stepped up campaign of going after Iranian operatives inside Iraq, who United States officials say have been involved in supplying materials for the homemade bombs that are the largest killer of American troops in Iraq.

Gates: Iranians 'Overplaying Their Hand' (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, January 19, 2007

The Iranians are "overplaying their hand" on the world stage in a belief that setbacks in Iraq have weakened the United States, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Thursday.

He said that now is not the time to negotiate with Iran because the U.S. lacks leverage but that talks probably would make sense at some point.

The U.S. has been applying growing pressure on Iran, blaming Tehran for providing bombs and other help used against American troops by militants in Iraq. President Bush has warned the U.S. will "seek out and destroy" the networks providing that help.

DOJ_NMG_0118976

In addition, American raids inside Iraq have netted Iranian prisoners, and the U.S. is sending a second aircraft carrier and missiles to the region.

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended including Iran in regional talks on ending the violence in Iraq, a path the Bush administration has so far declined to take.

Gates said he had told the leaders of U.S. allies Saudi Arabia and Qatar that the Iranians "believe they have the United States at some disadvantage because of the situation in Iraq."

"To be precise, I told them both that I thought the Iranians were overplaying their hand and that one of the consequences of that is that they have raised real concerns on the part of a number of countries in the region and beyond about their intentions," he told reporters.

Many Gulf nations are worried about a rising Iranian influence — a concern made more acute by the prospect for a further slide toward civil war in Iraq.

With regard to U.S. failure thus far to achieve stability in Iraq, Gates said, "I think that our difficulties have given them (the Iranians) a tactical opportunity in the short term, but the United States is a very powerful country."

Asked about the prospects for military conflict with Iran, whose nuclear program is seen by the Bush administration as a growing threat to U.S. interests, Gates said, "There are many courses of action available that do not involve an open conflict with Iran — there's no need for that."

Gates said that although he had publicly advocated negotiating with Iran as recently as 2004, he now advises against that.

"Right at this moment, there's really nothing the Iranians want from us," he said. "And so, in any negotiation right now we would be the supplicant," asking Iran to stop doing such things as enriching uranium for its nuclear program.

"We need some leverage, it seems to me, before we engage with the Iranians," Gates added. "And I think at some point engagement probably makes sense."

Until the Iranians are persuaded that, despite being bogged down in Iraq, "the United States is in fact a formidable adversary, there's not much advantage for us in engaging with them," he said.

That assessment may explain, at least in part, the decision announced last week to send a second U.S. aircraft carrier into the Persian Gulf region, along with a Patriot missile battalion capable of shooting down shorter-range ballistic missiles of the type Iran has in its arsenal.

In Bahrain, a British Royal Navy officer who is the No. 2 commander for coalition naval forces in the Central Command area of responsibility told reporters that the exact role and missions of the aircraft carrier USS John Stennis, which is due to arrive in the Gulf area next month, have not yet been worked out.

British Commodore Keith Winstanley said the Stennis deployment should not be seen entirely as a move aimed at Iran, but he added, "I'm sure there's a message there for Iran."
